TRIPOLI, the metropolis of the kingdom, was formerly divided into two parts, the old and new; the former, which was the native country of the emperor Severus, is supposed to have been built by the Romans, and was since conquered by the Vandals, and at last destroyed by the Mohammedans, under the Khalif Omar II. since which time it hath never recovered itself; or, if it ever did, it hath been suffered to run into decay, and is now almost gone to ruin: the latter, which stands at a small distance from it, though of no great extent, is populous and in a flourishing condition. It stands on a sandy ground by the sea side, and is surrounded with high walls and stout ramparts, flanked with pyramidal towers, but not kept in good repair, and without any fosse. It hath but two gates, one towards the inland on the south, and the other towards the sea on the north, where it expands itself in form of a crescent, near a spacious and commodious haven. The point by the east is little else now than a group of scarp'd rocks; on which are to be seen some antient forts, now gone into decay; but that to the westward is defended by a strong castle, surrounded with fortifications after the modern fashion; and furnished with some large cannon.

THE new Tripoli was, it is supposed, built by the natives, who gave it the name of Tarabalis, or Trebilis, whence the Latins have called it Tripolis. Some authors pretend that it was once a place of vast trade, on account of its neighbourhood to Numidia, Tunis, &c. and resorted unto by vessels from Malta, Venice, Sicily, Marseilles, and other parts; there being hardly such another commodious sea-port along this whole coast, till you come to Alexandria<sup>c</sup>: by which means it became so opulent, that it was filled with rich merchants, abounded with fine mosks, hospitals, and other public buildings, and excelled Tunis in beauty and wealth. And though it retains now but few traces of its antient splendor, having little else inviting to the eye except the outside, whilst its houses in the inside are low and mean, its streets narrow, dirty, and irregular, there are in it, nevertheless, some monuments still standing, which will not permit one to doubt of its having formerly made a much nobler appearance; particularly a triumphal arch, one half of which now lies buried in the sand; though what is still to be seen above it is a sufficient witness of its former grandeur.

decayed from its former splendor;

NEITHER shall we need to wonder at this extraordinary decay, if we consider the two great inconveniencies which this city labours under; viz. first, the want of sweet water, here being neither rivers, springs, nor wells, nor any other means of supplying it with that useful element but the common one of cisterns, and reservoirs of rain water; and, secondly, the great scarcity of corn, and other product of the ground, occasioned by the dry sandy soil that surrounds it for miles together on the land side; especially if we add to these what some authors affirm, that all that land was formerly arable and fertile ground, producing great abundance of corn and other grain, till the sea overflowed it, and left those vast quantities of sand which now cover the whole surface of it (C), and render it incapable of bringing forth any thing but palm-trees; which, we are told, grow in great plenty, notwithstanding the barrenness and dryness of the soil, and yield the most delightful dates, which is a considerable part of their food<sup>f</sup>: besides these, they have the lotus, or lotus; a tree of which we have spoken in a former part<sup>g</sup>, whose fruit is reckoned still finer than the dates, and makes a most excellent wine; so that the plant serves them for meat and drink, from which they have been stiled by the antients Lotophagi<sup>h</sup>. But, upon the whole, were it not for the continual supply of provisions brought in by their corsairs, and

(C) We are accordingly told, that the sea, being higher along all these coasts than the land, hath incroached a good way into it, which plainly appears from those spots where the cities stand, and which are all covered with deep sands up to the arm pits for above a league together. To which we may add, that there were still to be seen, in Marmol's time, if they are not so now, houses buried in those sands, and quite covered with the sea; so that the inhabitants have been forced to retire more to the south, in proportion to the incroachments which the sea made upon them on the north side of these towns (7).

a other trading vessels, Tripoli could never subsist by the product of its own territories, but must soon be starved; and hence we may infer the cause of its present decay.

ADJACENT to the walls of the city is a famous burying ground, in which are found Antient relics. coffins, urns, medals, and other curious relics of antiquity. The Franciscan friars have here a very handsome church, convent, and hospital; the last of which is the more necessary, as the city is so often and so severely visited by the plague. Other orders of monks were likewise settled in it, who have been since obliged to abandon it, probably on account of its decay above-mentioned. The country about it is, however, adorned with a multiplicity of handsome villas, cultivated chiefly by Christian slaves, and much like those about Algiers and Tunis, spoken of in the two foregoing chapters. It is observable, with respect to those unhappy wretches, that there is but a very small number of them here, in comparison to the many thousands that swarm in those two capitals, insomuch that they have but one bagnio in the whole city to lock them in at night. They just keep a sufficient number to serve them in the lowest offices, and cultivate their villas, and make a traffick of the rest. The people here carry on a great trade in linen cloths, great quantities of which are wrought by the inhabitants; but their chief dependence is on their own corsairs, and those of other nations which resort to it. They keep, indeed, few of their own, six or seven at most; yet those are so desperate, and make so good an advantage of their situation, as being within the reach of those merchant ships which trade into Egypt, Italy, and the Archipelago, that they can greatly infest those seas, and do a deal of mischief among them<sup>1</sup>.

c CAPES, or Capez, called by the Moors Cabes and Gabs, is, as we have lately seen, situate on the northern banks of the river of its name, supposed the Triton of Ptolemy<sup>k</sup>; and, as that is the boundary between Tunis and this kingdom, should of course belong to the former<sup>l</sup>; but is, nevertheless, reckoned by the generality of geographers among the cities of the latter<sup>m</sup>. It stands on the bay of its name, and is large, and well defended by an old wall and a strong fort. Near it are the ruins of the old city, called by the Romans Tacape, and one of the first that was built by them on those coasts. This last was built on a little rising ground, about half a mile from the new, and shews still some marks of its antient grandeur; particularly some square pillars of a peculiar granate, not to be met with in any other parts of Barbary, or perhaps of Africa. It was formerly washed by the sea, which grows daily shallower, by the addition of sand on the one hand, and the mud and other filth which is washed into it by the river Capez; a thing very common on all the coasts of Barbary, and owing chiefly to the indolence and carelessness of the inhabitants. And hence, probably, the cause of the decay of the new town, which is now but thinly inhabited, and that only by poor fishermen and husbandmen, who cultivate a little barley, and great quantities of palm trees round the place; but whose dates are so soon dried, that they will not keep the year round, like those that grow in Numidia; to supply which defect, they make use of a root which grows here in plenty; and, when boiled like a potatoe, hath the taste of an almond, and yields them a good nourishment. The inhabitants here are quite black, and so poor, that they esteem him a wealthy man among them who hath a bushel of barley in his possession: so terribly are they oppressed by the regency on the one hand, and by the Arabs on the other<sup>n</sup>. As to what particularly relates to the river Capez, or Triton, and to the lake of the same name, we shall refer our readers to the description we have given it in our Antient History<sup>o</sup>.

MAHARA, or Machres, is now a poor village, situate on the mouth of the Capes, remarkable only for a modern citadel, which was built on purpose to guard the entrance into that gulph.

EL HAMMAH is another antient town, long since gone to decay, and about four leagues from Capez. It is remarkable only for its Roman walls of square stones, and some inscriptions, mentioned by Leo Africanus, Dapper, &c. but since so defaced, that they are not now to be seen<sup>p</sup>; and for its hot sulphureous springs, which are conveyed to it by an old aqueduct, of which we have spoken in a foregoing chapter<sup>q</sup>. In other respects it is now a poor miserable town, inhabited only by some few fishermen and husbandmen, whilst the greatest part of them, as well as of the adjacent country, seek for a better livelihood from the piratical trade; in which they are neither so oppressed by the government, nor infested by the plundering Arabs.

ZOARA, or Zara, is another ruined town, surrounded by an old decayed wall, and situate near the sea, about thirteen leagues from the island of Jerba, or Zerbis: some think it to be the antient port Pisidan. At present it is inhabited by poor people, who live either those along the gulph and eastward still poorer. by burning of quick-lime and pot-ash, or follow the piratical and fishing trade. All these stand on the western coasts of the gulph of Sidra. Those that are within it, and on the eastern side of it, are still in a much more ruined condition, as we have had occasion to observe a little above; and whosoever compares their antient flourishing state with their present miserable plight, the many dreadful vicissitudes they have undergone under the Goths and Vandals, the Arabs, Mohammedans, and other barbarous nations, to say nothing of the Europeans, who likewise put a helping hand in spreading the devastation still farther, but still more the tyranny of their government, which hath not only given the finishing stroke to it, but hath put an invincible obstacle to their recovery, notwithstanding their advantageous situation for commerce, and the once known valour and industry of the native inhabitants, will have more cause to wonder that any of those should still chuse to live among so many dreadful ruins, under such a grievous load and variety of misery and oppression, than if he saw them wholly abandoned to the wild beasts, fowls, and venomous insects, and quite turned into a perfect barren wilderness. b

BUT what hath contributed most to the ruin of all these maritime towns, and their piratical trade, on which, like their neighbours, they chiefly subsisted, is their neighbourhood to the island of Malta, which, lying conveniently over against these coasts, hath enabled the noble knights of it to have a more constant watch over them, and, by suppressing their frequent excursions, obliged them to take up with the fishing trades, and the cultivating of as much land about those ruined places as will just serve them from hand to mouth. And we make no doubt, but that those brave Maltese have likewise prevented the corsairs of Tripoli from being either so numerous or hurtful as they would have been otherwise, though they are not able totally to suppress them*. c

The town and district of Derne.

THE only place of note on the west of the gulph abovesaid is Derne, now a small town, but heretofore in a much better plight, and built by the Moors, after they were driven out of Andalusia. It stands about half a mile from the sea, and is surrounded with some fine springs of sweet water, one of which runs quite through, and others around the walls of it; so that it is a territory capable of bearing some corn and garden-stuff; but is so poorly inhabited, that little advantage is reaped from it. This town is still the capital of a district of its name, which extends itself, and reaches from Cape Bomb east, to the gulph of Bengasi west, above 100 leagues, and still farther towards the inland. This district is chiefly inhabited by wandering Arabs, to the amount of 30,000 families, who pay a small tribute to the Bey of Tripoli. This tract is almost every-where covered with a kind of plant or shrub, which bears a thick downy leaf, and thick bunches of a yellow flower, which gives an excellent taste to their honey. As for the road, it is very bad and unsafe near three parts of the year<sup>d</sup>.

District of Mefrata.

ON the western side of the Sidran gulph is the canton or district of Mefrata, containing what was antiently called Cyrenaica, and Pentapolis, from its five cities<sup>e</sup>, and now called Mefrata from its capital, hath still some towns and villages, both on the sea-side and inland, which drive a kind of commerce with the Christians for European commodities, which they sold to the Negroes, and exchanged for slaves, musk, and civet, which they carried into Turkey, and sold at good prices<sup>e</sup>. The inhabitants were rich and warlike, ever impatient of the Tunesian yoke, as now of the Tripolitan; but this large and once flourishing tract is likewise reduced to a low ebb by the corsairs, who plunder their coasts, and the Arabs, who ravage the inland, when they join with the Berebers. They can muster up about 10,000 men fit to bear arms, and are often at war with the Arabs, but are nevertheless forced to submit now to the Turkish yoke and tribute, in spite of all their valour and number<sup>e</sup>.

Other inlands still more barren.

THE other countries and districts in the inlands are still more desert and void of towns, as well as more unknown to us. All that we can say is, that they are inhabited by much the same people with the two last-mentioned, who live after the same manner, and strive alike to free themselves from the tribute exacted from them. The land is for the most part dry and barren, and so sandy, that one cannot travel through it without sinking above the middle in sand; so that were it not for the abundance of dates which grow in it, and for some mountains that afford a kind of pasturage for their cattle, it would be impossible to subsist. On the farthest extremes, south and east of this kingdom, in particular towards the desert of Barca, lies the country called Auguela, Augela, or Onguela, which, though for the most part sandy and barren, hath, nevertheless, some spots so well watered as to afford great plenty of dates; and the mount Meys, which divides it from the Barcan kingdom, affords excellent pasturage. In this territory, besides the town of Aguila, from which f

<sup>a</sup> the canton takes its name, is another, seated at the foot of that mount, called Si-wah, Siouah, al. San Rey, which is the very last on that side that belongs to the government of Tripoli<sup>a</sup>. And it is remarkable, that the inhabitants have preserved their name ever since Ptolemy's time, who makes mention of the Augile, as inhabiting these parts<sup>b</sup>.

THE coasts afford no natural curiosity, except the gulph of Sidra, which is, indeed, the chief and only one, and hath its name from a small island at the bottom of it. It was antiently called the Syrtis Magna<sup>c</sup>, in opposition to the lesser one, of which we have spoken in the last chapter<sup>d</sup>; both are very dangerous to mariners, but this is more so of the two, because it draws with greater violence, and the sands are here deeper, and of a quicker nature. It had, nevertheless, no less than 16 towns, according to Ptolemy<sup>e</sup>; of which <sup>The greater Syrtis.</sup>
<sup>b</sup> there remain only some ruins, or poor villages. It has but few rivers that discharge No rivers of themselves into it, and those of no great note. Nor are the Gafarnacar, Rufalmabes, Magra, great note. and others, that empty themselves into the Mediterranean, and are supposed to spring from the Gibel, or Atlas, of greater consequence, except that they serve to nourish an infinite number of palm trees, by being distributed into canals, without which it would be impossible for them to grow in such vast and numerous sandy deserts<sup>f</sup>.

ANTIQUITIES and artificial curiosities are no less scarce in a country where the inhabitants are such professed destroyers of them. The only one to be met with is the triumphal arch of white marble we have already given some account of, which lies almost buried in the sand and earth; and even this had not been now to be seen, had it not been for a tradition, which <sup>Antiquities and artificial rarities.</sup> <sup>c</sup> passes for current among the inhabitants, that the very attempt to demolish it would be infallibly attended with some dreadful misfortune. In confirmation of which, they still shew a stone half loosened from the rest of the fabric, and confidently assure you, that, a prince having begun to remove some of the stones, the workmen were at first scared with a terrible earthquake, but persisting still in their work, in spite of that supernatural warning, they were all buried under a cloud, or, as they stile it, a prodigious rain of sand. It is probable, that there was some magnificent structure built near this elegant arch, seeing one cannot dig far under the ground about it, without finding some of the largest marble stones that are to be met with any where<sup>g</sup>.

As to what is still to be seen of this famous work, the architecture and the bas reliefs are <sup>d</sup> exquisite. There are four busts of Roman consuls, but very much defaced. The four corners of the building are supported by an equal number of pilasters, adorned with vine leaves. Over each of the four gates is seen a triumphant chariot, in one of which is represented Alexander drawn by two sphinxes, with some slaves under it. As for the inscriptions over the gates, they are all worn out, except one on the north-side, which is still legible, is of a round figure, and hath some fine ornaments in bas relief. The stones are all of fine marble, between five or six feet thick, and all fastened to each other with leaden plates and iron cramps, without either mortar or cement.

AMONG other artificial trifles, that are to be found among the monuments out of the walls of Tripoli, of which some have the form of ovens, but larger and higher, and about <sup>e</sup> two or three fathom deep, cut into the rock, with niches around them, our author tells us, he found a wooden coffin, adorned with platted lead scolloped, the human bones therein almost consumed. At the foot of the coffin was a large earthen urn set in the rock, and round the coffin dishes and plates of different sizes, that had been filled with some sorts of meats, the bones of which were not consumed. There were likewise, several sorts of neat drinking glasses, a cupping glass, and a copper lamp almost eaten up with rust; but nothing of any value, except two silver pieces as thin as paper, and about two inches broad, and three long. In most, if not in all these tombs, are found a large glass urn and human bones, and the bottom is covered with a reddish water, but insipid to the taste<sup>h</sup>.

THE government, religion, laws, customs, &c. of this kingdom, being in a great <sup>f</sup> measure the same with those of Algiers and Tunis, we shall have the less need to expatiate upon them, after what has been said on these heads in the two foregoing chapters. Only, with respect to the first of these articles, it will not be amiss to observe, that the Beys of Tripoli are not mere titular vassals to the Porte, like them, but are really under some kind of subjection and tribute to it; and this, joined to the other exigencies of the regency, the avarice of the Turkish Basbas sent thither from Constantinople, and the general decay of <sup>Revenues, how raised.</sup> <sup>g</sup> commerce, obliges them to load the subjects with such heavy taxes and extortions, as have reduced the greatest part of the kingdom to the lowest degree of indigence and misery. The revenues of this kingdom, like those we have already spoken of, arise chiefly from their corsairs, who are nevertheless but few, they seldom amounting to above seven or eight, and of these one only can properly be stiled a ship, the rest are commonly small galleys, poorly manned and equipped. The next is the duty on imports and exports, and on the

Jews, who are very numerous, and severely taxed, as they drive the greatest share of the Italian commerce; and on the natives, who, though ever so poor, must yet pay part of the product of their ground, or other manufactures; and lastly, on the country Moors and Arabs, among whom the Bey sends his flying camp of Janissaries, if he doth not go himself at the head of them, to levy it; for these last, as well as the Moors, who are no less resty and impatient under the Turkish yoke, are kept so poor by those heavy taxes, that nothing but force, and sometimes exemplary severity, can extort it from them<sup>1</sup>. For, as their commerce is greatly dwindled of late, by reason of the heavy imposts laid upon it, and the exigencies of the government increased, by their being tributary to the Porte; so they are forced to exact greater taxes from the subjects to supply them, though they are in continual apprehension of their putting themselves some time or other under the protection of some Christian power, to alleviate their misery. And, indeed, there is hardly any tie but that of religion could have prevented their doing so long ago, in spite of the vigilance of the regency over them<sup>k</sup>. However, the Bey, by means of his protection from the Porte, makes shift to keep up a kind of despotic power, as he is besides generalissimo of all the forces, and, by appointing of such officers to act in all capacities under him, hath also made himself so absolute over the Douwan, that it is now kept only as a matter of form, they having nothing to do but to approve and ratify whatever he pleases to lay before them; neither doth the Porte, or its Basha, concern themselves in the government, provided he doth but punctually pay his tribute to the one, and satisfy the avarice of the other, they leave him to govern the rest with as arbitrary a sway as he pleases.

As for their commerce, it chiefly consists in slaves, either such as are taken by their corsairs, or such as they traffick for with their neighbours; the greatest part of both which they send into Turkey, where they can dispose of them to the best advantage. The next branch is that of ashes, which they buy from the Arabians, and sell to the Europeans to make glass and soap: the rest of their traffick is not worth mentioning. But one thing is worth taking notice of with respect to this regency; viz. that they are here more scrupulous observers of their treaties with other nations, and punish the breach of them with greater severity than any of their neighbours; which punctuality, whether it proceeds from real probity, or a consciousness of their own weakness, is nevertheless of no small advantage to navigation and commerce<sup>l</sup>. What revolutions this kingdom hath met with, since the decline of the Roman empire to the reduction of it into the present form of government, and what else relates to their modern history, will be seen in the following section.

SECTION II.

The history of Tripoli to this present time.

THIS state, as well as the rest of Barbary, after being freed from the Romish yoke, passed consecutively under that of the Vandals, Saracens, and thence under that of the kings of Morocco, Fez, and Tunis, by turns; till, weary of their slavery and oppression, they resolved to have a monarch of their own, whom they chose from among themselves. It is true indeed that we do not read of any of them that have signalized themselves by any remarkable exploits. Neither was Tripoli looked upon as a kingdom of any great consequence, till it became a bone of contention between some of the Christian princes, and the kings of Tunis, who had been the longest possessors of it, since the expulsion of the Vandals out of Africa. We have already taken notice, that the old city had been taken and totally destroyed by the Arabs, under their Khalif Omar II. after a siege of six months, the greatest part of the inhabitants either butchered, or sent slaves into Egypt and Arabia<sup>m</sup>. A long while after which, the Africans rebuilt it, and called it Tirabilis, and the Europeans, New Tripoli. But whether upon the same spot, or a little farther to the south, by reason of the incroachments of the sea, is not certain. However, it became subject to the kings of Tunis in time, and it was under one of them, named Bucamen, whose predecessors had joined the Tunesian crown to their own of Fez, that the Tripolitans, to whom his tyranny and oppressions were become insupportable, chose one of their fellow citizens king over them, in his stead, and made him master of his treasury and revenue. The new king governed them at first with great equity and moderation; on the other hand Bucamen sent a considerable army against him, the command of which he had given to a general in whom he knew he could confide; but he being poisoned by the intrigues of some of the principal inhabitants, the army returned home without doing any thing. The new king no sooner saw himself out of danger, than he began to play the tyrant in his turn to such

- a a degree, that the citizens conspired against him, and he was murdered by his brother-in-law. They chose in his room one Abubacer, who had been formerly an officer under him, but had since retired, and turned marabout or hermit, and who was easily persuaded to take the reins of the government upon him; but he had not reigned many months, before Ferdinand, king of Castile and Arragon, sent thither Peter, count of Navarre, with a powerful fleet, and above 15,000 armed men on board, and a great quantity of ammunition and other stores, who came and laid siege to the capital. Abubacer, who had had private notice sent him of this vast descent by some Genoese merchants, above a month before, had taken all proper measures to make a vigorous defence. But neither the great number of forces he had got with him, nor the artillery which he had planted at proper places, could
- b prevent their landing, and laying close siege to the place; whilst Don Diego Pacheco, at the head of 4,000 men, was ordered to prevent the approach of the natives, who came in shoals from all the adjacent parts, both on foot and on horseback, to his assistance, during the time of the attack. The assault began, accordingly, about nine of the clock in the morning, and, in spite of the vigorous opposition from within, a great number of Christian soldiers were got upon the ramparts by eleven, many of whom were thrown back, and those that ventured down into the place fared still worse, both from the besieged, and excess of heat and thirst. At length some of them, having refreshed themselves at the wells that were near the ramparts, found means to force open the gates, and give a free entrance to the besiegers; upon which the Moors abandoned the place, and Abubacer, with his family
- c and friends, retired into the castle; thither the Spanish count followed him closely, lest he should fall thence upon his men, whilst they were busying themselves about the plunder of the city, which in gold, silver, and jewels, amounted to an immense value. Abubacer, however, finding himself unequal to so powerful an enemy, surrendered himself the next morning on honourable terms; and was sent with his wife, two sons, and an uncle, to the emperor Charles V. then at Palermo, who soon after gave them their liberty, and sent them back to Tripoli, and restored him to his former dignity, on condition that he should become his vassal and tributary. In the mean time, the count seized on the treasure he found in the castle, which proved still more considerable than that of the city (D); and, having caused the latter to be garrisoned and fortified, by the addition of a smaller one nearer the
- d port, sailed away. Soon after this Abubacer returned to Tripoli, and caused the city to be rebuilt and repopled, and held it in the emperor's name till the year in which the knights of Rhodes were driven out of that island, and forced to retire into Syracuse, when application was made to that monarch, who was pleased to bestow the island of Malta upon them, together with the city and castle of Tripoli, which lay just over against it. These sent accordingly and took possession of it, and made one of their order governor, and put a garrison into it of their own. They were hardly settled in it before Barbarossa made himself master of it, together with Tunis, Bizerta, &c. but it was soon after retaken by the emperor, and restored to them, as we have seen in the Algerine history.

With this fleet, which carried 12,000 fighting men, Sinan sailed directly for Tripoli, and landed his forces, artillery, and ammunition, at the Anguils point, whence he sent his summons to the governor to surrender, promising him, on that condition, to grant him and his garrison their liberty, but threatening, in case of a refusal, to put them all to the sword. To which arrogant message the governor, by the advice of his council, returned an answer to this effect: That he was sent thither by the grand master to defend the city, and that he would never surrender it without his order; upon receipt
- f of which the Basha ordered immediately the principal fortress, in which the governor commanded, to be battered with 40 pieces of ordnance. But that side was so strongly fortified with ramparts and outworks, that it would have been next to impossible to have succeeded

(D) This plunder, which, like that of the city, is said to have amounted to an immense value in gold, silver, jewels, and other costly things, is so much the more remarkable, as we are told, that both the prince and the inhabitants had, upon the advice sent them by the Genoese, conveyed away above 5,000 camel loads of their richest goods, before the siege began. The number of their slain, and those that were made prisoners, were no less considerable, the former amounting to 6,000, whose bodies were either flung into the wells of the city, or into the sea; and of the latter 15,000; besides above 180 Italian slaves, whom they set at liberty (8).

in it, had not a traitor (E) slid down the wall, and directed him to a weaker place, where a he might attack it with more success, which he immediately did, and, turning his battery against some towers which he had shewed him, made such a dreadful havock amongst them, that in two days he had brought them to the ground, killed four cannoneers, and a great number of Christians, though not without a much greater loss on his side. This so alarmed the governor, if he did not hold a treacherous intelligence with the enemy, that he proposed a capitulation to the officers of the garrison, the greater part of whom opposed it, alleging, that whilst the walls were still standing, and the garrison in so good a condition, it were shameful and unjustifiable to surrender. However, this declaration had no other effect upon him, whether through cowardice or treachery, than to make him pursue his own base measures more closely; and being informed that there was, in the enemy's b army, a French gentleman named Aramont, who had been sent ambassador to the Porte, he went privately to him, and proposed the surrendring of the place, upon the conditions offered at first to him. Some authors pretend, indeed, that the Basha refusing to consent to them, he withdrew, but was arrested by him in his way to the garrison. But others, with more appearance of reason, maintain, that there was a secret treaty between the Basha and him; and the event doth but too evidently confirm it; for the place was no sooner surrendered, than Gambars, and all that were of his faction and nation, were set at liberty, and conveyed to Malta in two galleys; whilst the rest of the garrison, who were by far the more numerous, were detained prisoners, and stripped in the usual form, in order to be sold for slaves.

THE Basha lost no time to summon the garrison of the other fort to surrender; but these sent him word, that they were Spaniards, and resolved to die sword in hand, rather than yield themselves prisoners to him; unless he would promise them, in the presence of all his chief officers, to convey them safe to Malta, with their arms and baggage, and give them a sufficient assurance of his performing it. These conditions Sinan readily agreed to, and sent them, in the presence of all his Sangiacs, his ring as a pledge; upon which they immediately delivered up the fort, and were conveyed to Malta in the manner stipulated, and without delay or molestation (F). Thus was Tripoli delivered up to the Turks on the

(E) This villain was a native of Provence, but had, on account of his unlawful intrigues with the Moorish women, been obliged to turn Mohammedan; after which he had listd himself in the service of Aga Morat, and served him as a spy in the city. Morat was a Turkish officer, who had made himself lord of Tachoras, a place not many leagues from Tripoli, where he had entertained Sinan in a most magnificent manner, as he was going to lay siege to that place; and, in consequence of some promise obtained from that Basha, had listd himself under him, and met him at the siege at the head of 200 horse, and 600 musqueteers. For which service, as well as for the treacherous advice that his favourite renegado had given him, Sinan intrusted him with the government of the place, as soon as it was surrendered to him (9).

(F) This is the most received and most rational account that is given of the surrender of that important place; but which is point blank contradicted by the partizans of France, who lay the whole blame of it on the Spaniards and Catalonians that were in garrison in it, and who, they pretend, obliged the governor to it, contrary to his inclination, and the opposition of all his countrymen.

This gentleman, to whom they give the name of Caspar de Vallier, and the title of mareschal, was, they say, an old experienced knight of Malta, whose merit and valour might have intitled him to be at the very head of that order, but who, on that very account, was become obnoxious to the grand master of it, a Spaniard by birth, and too jealous of the glory of his nation, not to endeavour to draw such an aspersion from it, and throw the whole blame on the French governor and his partizans; so that, according to them, the cowardly Calabrians and Spaniards were the first movers of the sedition in the place, by their daily clamours, that the governor delayed the surrendring it with no other view, than to have them all butchered, or made slaves by the besiegers; whilst he, on the other hand, was sure to make his own terms with the Basha, both for himself, and those of his nation. They add, that when the governor, to appease their mutinous complaints, ordered some of their own officers to go and view the state of the fortifications, they made such a dreadful, though false report of them to the rest of their compatriots, as put them out of all farther patience; the event of which was, that the tumult increased to a greater degree, and the governor, to avoid some more fatal consequences, was forced to capitulate. They go on, and tell us, that, upon their arrival at Malta, D'Omedes, the grand master, acquitted the Spaniards of every thing that was laid to their charge, and ordered the mareschal, and most of his partizans, to be arrested as the betrayers of Tripoli.

The mareschal was thrown into a dungeon, in order to be tried with the rest of his accomplices; and the French ambassador D'Aramont was traduced in most of the courts of Christian princes, as acting in concert with the mareschal; and it was even insinuated, as if Henry II. his master, had sent him thither to negotiate that treasonable project with the Turkish Basha. His friendship to the Turk, and hatred to the emperor, to whom Tripoli was of the greatest importance, as it covered his other dominions in Italy, were pretended to be the main spring of the whole. In a word, the French treachery was, by D'Omedes's private emissaries, become the common subject of such loud complaints in most Christian courts, that Henry found himself obliged, in order to clear himself and his ambassador from those scandalous rumours, to send Villegagnon, a knight of St. John, to Malta, to make a strict inquiry into the behaviour of his ambassador, as well as of the late governor of Tripoli, and to oblige the grand master to send him an account of what they had to allege against the former, and of their proceedings against the latter. Villegagnon executed his commission with great courage, fidelity, and prudence, whilst D'Omedes strove, by the basest artifices, and foulest intrigues, to a the 14th of August, after it had continued in the possession of the Christians a little above 40 years, from the time of its being taken by the count of Navarre. Sinan committed the government of it to the Aga Morat, mentioned in the last note, upon condition that he should hold it under the Grand Signor, and to resign it whenever he should appoint a governor of it.

It was not long, however, before the famed corsair Dragut, of whom we have spoken more fully in a former chapter †, got possession of it; and, being repulsed on his attempt upon Malta, came and made it his place of arms, not indeed with the title of Basha of it, which title, as well as that of high-admiral, the Grand Signor had absolutely refused him, but only under that of governor of it. This did not hinder him, however, from fortifying Fortified by Dragut. both city and castle with strong walls, and other outworks, and the addition of two stout forts nearer to the sea-side, and a new supply of artillery and ammunition, by which it was, though not without prodigious expence, become one of the strongest cities in Africa, and the common retreat of most of the corsairs that roved under Turkish colours, from whence they infested the coasts of Italy, Sicily, Naples, and Spain. Dragut had likewise made from thence a successful descent on the island of Ferba, Gerba, or Gelves, on the mouth of the gulph of Gabbs, or Capez, near the Lesser Syrtis, and had obliged the Cheyk or lord of it to become tributary to the Porte. Not long after this, John de Lacerta, duke of Medina Lacerta pro- Cali, being sent viceroy of Sicily by the king of Spain, thought that nothing would signalize poses the re- his new dignity so much, as the suppression of all those Turkish corsairs, and that the most taking of effectual method was making himself master of Tripoli, their general rendezvous. His design Tripoli. was highly approved by the king his master, and several other crowned heads, and particularly by John de la Valetta, grand master of Malta, who all promised their assistance in it. But Lacerta was no sooner informed of the strong posture of defence which Dragut had put it in, and of his commanding in it, than his courage failed him, and he proposed the retaking the island of Ferba, before the attempting of Tripoli. The grand master, who saw through the artifice, gave him several weighty reasons against it; but finding him still determined to pursue his wild project, told him in plain terms, that he might do as he thought proper, but that, if he did not give him assurance of his sailing directly to Tripoli, he must not expect any succour from the Maltese order. Upon which Lacerta swore to him, by the d life of the king his master, and the head of his own son Gaston, whom he had with him, that he would sail directly thither, and lay siege to the place, and embarked accordingly on the tenth of February, the grand master furnishing him, besides the gallies and forces he had promised him, 200 Maltese pioneers to assist him at the siege.

DRAGUT no sooner heard of this fleet being got near the island of Querkynefs, than he failed out towards them with two of his gallies, against whom Lacerta sent a greater number of his own; but whilst these, instead of engaging him, were busy in rifling two merchantmen from Alexandria, Dragut got clear of them, and sent one of his gallies immediately to acquaint the Porte with the news, and to desire a speedy succour, whilst he went and fortified himself in Tripoli. Thither sailed soon after the duke Lacerta, after having tried in e vain to take in water at the island of Ferba; and, coming near the dry sands of Palo, sent defeat all his measures, and fix the treason on those two great personages, one of whom was still kept in fetters, and the other had left the island, and was gone to Constantinople. In spite of all which, he was at length forced to clear both, by a letter to the French monarch, dictated by the grand council of Malta, and which he was forced to sign. Copies of this letter were immediately sent to all his ministers at every court, and Villegagnon wrote, moreover, a full account of the whole transaction, which he dedicated to the emperor. So easy a thing it was for the most Christian king to justify himself, and his minister, from so foul an aspersion as that of joining with the Turk against the emperor. Thus far the French account, in justification of that governor and ambassador, in which we have omitted many other heinous crimes laid to D'Omedes's charge, though without any farther proof than their own bare word, but which to explode would draw this note to too great a length. In the mean time, neither what they have said in vindication of their two countrymen, nor the letter, written by the grand council of Malta to the French king, and signed by the grand master against himself, have been yet able to clear two material objections against the light in which they have represented the whole transaction, or, to speak more properly, against the variety of misfs they have endeavoured to throw over it. The one is, if the governor had no sinister views in giving the French ambassador the private meeting, why did he repair to him alone, and not rather take some of the officers of each nation, that were then in the place, along with him? and how dared he to leave his government, to go in that private and solitary manner into the enemy's camp? The other is, if his partizans had so far justified his behaviour in it, and his capitulating immediately after, and had made it appear to the grand council of Malta, that the chief cause of this sudden surrender of the place was owing to the grand master's neglect of providing it with all proper necessities for a siege, and of sending such supplies as they wanted, when closely besieged, why was he not immediately released out of his hard confinement, as well as the rest of his countrymen? And why did the grand master's strange misconduct go not only unpunished and unceñsured, but even unmentioned any-where but in this account (10)? But there needs little more than a bare reading of it to be able to judge at whose door to lay the loss of that important city, as well as of the artful ways used in it to lay it at the wrong one.

Suffers by a great storm before it ; some of the crew to land, where they dug several wells, and found the water very clear and sweet, which nevertheless proved so unwholesome, that many of his great officers, as well as sailors, died of it, and a much greater number fell ill and became useless. They were soon after forced to weather out a violent storm, which shattered several of their ships, among which the Sicilian Capitana foundered and sunk.

Sails to the isle of Jerba ; THE storm was no sooner over, but the Maltese admiral, according to his instructions, proposed to remove to Languir, which was a healthier and more commodious harbour, where their ships might be safer from any attack from the Turkish fleet, which was in full sail, as he was well informed, to come and attack them ; but Lacerta, quite sick of such dangerous expeditions, ordered his armada to return to the isle of Jerba, where they landed without opposition, but found the wells filled up ; and, after having with much labour opened them, the waters had contracted an intolerable bitterness, by the quantity of aloe leaves which the Jerbites had flung into them, so that they could not drink them. The Cheyk, or lord of the island, sent to beg an interview with the duke, in order to come to some capitulation, as he found himself unequal to so great a force, but the motion was opposed by his fiery troops ; upon which notice was given him by two Christian slaves, that he would be attacked early on the next morning by the Jerbites. Lacerta, resolving to be beforehand with them, ordered his army to meet them ; upon which 2,000 of the enemy, sallying out from behind a hill with their usual noise, fell upon them, but, having neither horse nor fire-arms, were easily put to the rout with great loss ; upon which the Cheyk came and delivered up the keys of the castle to him, and acknowledged himself a subject of Spain. Lacerta, elevated beyond measure at this success, was so solicitous of preserving this island as a monument of his good fortune, that he set immediately about building a fort with four bastions, and some other fortifications in it, to keep the Jerbites in awe, as well as to suppress the incursions of the pirates.

defeats the Jerbites at land. IN the mean while Soleyman, who, upon the first news sent him by Dragut of this expedition, had caused a powerful fleet to be equipped, consisting of 85, some say 94 galleys, commanded by the famous Kara Mustapha, each of which carried 100 Fanissaries, under the command of Piagli Basha, the Sultan's favourite ; of all which Doria, who was then one of the chief officers in this expedition, and Tessieres, the Maltese admiral, had had repeated notice. On the other hand, the heat and unhealthiness of the country, joined to the badness of the waters, and the unwholesomeness of their food, had bred a great sickness both in the Christian army and fleet, of which many were already dead, and Doria himself was confined to his bed with it. These two generals in vain endeavoured to persuade the duke to leave the island for a while, and meet the Turkish fleet near the Archipelago, and not stay till it was joined with the Barbary corsairs. But he, more intent upon building a fort in Africa that should bear his name, than to their salutary counsel, slackened not the work till news was brought him on the 10th of May, that the Turkish fleet, consisting of 85 sail, had been seen on the coasts of Gosa island three days before. Neither did he then desist till it appeared on their own, at which time the brave Doria cried out, One man's obstinacy hath ruined us all ; however, we shall not be defeated without having foreseen our danger.

surprised by the Turkish fleet. IN the confusion that reigned at their approach, both in the army and fleet, but especially in the latter, whose ships, it being low water, stuck so fast in the sand, that the Turks boarded them with sword in hand, took 20 of their galleys, and 14 large ships, with all their tackle, arms, &c. without any opposition (G). One only, commanded by Macdonalt, a brave and experienced commander, tho' pursued by three of the enemy, escaped to Malta, to bring the melancholy news of this defeat ; whilst the Turks made the air and sea resound with their rejoicings and firing. Under this desperate dilemma Lacerta repaired to Doria, who still kept his bed, and addressed himself to him in these words : " O Doria, the only person who hath shewed so much foresight and conduct upon this occasion, what would having sheltered themselves under the castle of the island, were quickly burnt by the Turks. The French, on the contrary, lay the whole fault on the duke, whom nothing could prevail upon to suspend the building of the fort, to go and attack the enemy in the Archipelago, nor to pursue their design upon Tripoli, instead of attacking this inconsiderable island, which, had they once made themselves masters of, that important city must of course have fallen easily into their hands. The most that we dare say upon the whole, for want of a proper umpire, is, that a national jealousy misled both sides into some wrong measures, in which, however, the young viceroy was too servily suffered, by the officers of his nation, to bear too great a sway on his side (11).

(G) There is some contrast in the account of this transaction, between the Spanish and French authors ; and no wonder, considering how natural it is to them to eclipse each other's glory to advance their own. Marmol accordingly tells us, that the confederates put to sea, and left the duke and his forces on the island to make the best defence they could, at the first approach of the Turkish fleet, by which they were easily thrown into confusion ; and, being attacked in the rear, became an easy prey to the enemy ; which not only extenuates the ill conduct of the new viceroy, but throws the blame on the Maltese commanders, who were mostly French. He likewise makes the loss of the vessels to amount to 21 galleys and 14 ships, besides nine others, which,

a “you advise me to do?” To which he replied, “Sir, you command the land forces, and it behoves you to take the best precautions you can for their safety. As for me, I design to be carried this night into a light brigantine, and to endeavour in the dead of the night to make my way through that vast forest of ships that surrounds us, and pick up as many of our scattered vessels as I can meet with, and sail directly to Messina.” Upon which the duke, more solicitous for his life than his honour, resolved to follow him; and leaving the care of the troops that were in the island, and amounted still to about 5,000, to Don Alvarez de Sunde, a famed commander, got on board the brigantine with several other general officers; and Doria had the good fortune to conduct them safe through the enemy’s fleet to the isle of Malta, whence Lacerta sailed soon after to Sicily. Doria’s advice to him.

b BUT it fared much more dreadfully with those who were left in the island, upon whom the Turks poured down their numerous troops, and laid close siege to the castle, which Don Alvarez defended as nobly and long as was possible for a commander to do, considering that he had not only the victorious Turk to encounter with, but want of water and all sorts of provision, and a grievous sickness, which had impaired the greatest part of the army, through the violent heats and excessive drought of the weather. They had neither water in the cisterns, nor wood to dress their victuals, and laboured under such excessive thirst, that great numbers of his men deserted daily to the enemy. The place was all the while battered with 18 pieces of cannon, which had at length dismounted those of the besieged, and destroyed most of the outworks. The siege had lasted near three months, by which time The remaining forces destroyed or made slaves;

c the garrison was, through famine, sickness, and desertion, reduced to less than half of what it was at first. In this extremity the brave governor proposed to the rest of his soldiers to make a bold sally, when the enemy least expected it, and either save themselves by their valour, or die with sword in hand, to which they readily agreed. But, unfortunately for him, the Turks had notice of it by some deserters; so that he was no sooner got out, but he saw himself surrounded on all sides by such numbers, as at once not only deprived him of the honour of dying in the attempt, but took him and the poor remains of his garrison prisoners. Immediately after which the Basha entered the castle, and ordered all the fortifications to be razed, to prevent the Christians returning thither after his departure. Thus ended this unfortunate expedition, in which the Christians lost near 14,000 men, either and the fortifications razed.

d killed, made slaves, or dead by sickness and want. The king of Spain alone lost 28 galleys and 14 transport ships, besides those of the Pope, of the Maltese, and of the duke of Tuscany. Kara Mustapha sailed soon after with his victorious fleet to Constantinople, and Dragut and his corsairs back to Tripoli, where he resumed the reins of that state under the Grand Signor’s protection, with additional favours from him for his timely services and vigilance, till a grievous wound, which he received at the siege of Malta, put an end both to his life and it, about six years after it, as we shall see in its proper place. Dragut returns to Tripoli.

AFTER his death the Porte continued sending either a Sangiac or Basha to Tripoli, the castle being garrisoned with Turks, and the city inhabited by Moors, and the kingdom kept still under tribute to the Grand Signor. The piratic trade went on still with success; the renegadoes met with the usual encouragement from the Turks, and were promoted to the command of their corsairs, and even of their whole fleets, and sometimes to the Bashaship; these recommending themselves to the regency, not only by their desperate behaviour, but much more by their peculiar barbarity to the Christian prisoners, which often provoked the Christians to use the same severity to theirs by way of reprisal, and were carried on both sides to such an excess, as can hardly be repeated or thought of without horror.

IN this condition the kingdom continued, till the Turkish government, becoming more and more heavy and intolerable, by the avarice and tyranny of those Bashas, a certain marabout, named Sid Hajab, about the close of the 16th century, found means to raise a general revolt both in the city and country, not doubting but he should be assisted therein by some A revolt raised by a marabout.

f Christian princes abroad, as well as by the Moors and Arabs at home, to drive all the Turks out of the kingdom; after which he might mould the government of it as well as he was able, and, in case of need, put it under the protection of those who had assisted him in carrying on this new revolution. But, unfortunately for him, he did not take care to secure a foreign assistance, before he broke out into this open rebellion; so that Hascen Basha, the then Turkish admiral, came suddenly upon him, at the head of 60 galleys, and a number of other ships and forces, which he had procured from Tunis and Algiers, and gave him so many signal overthrows, that he was at length abandoned by his troops, and assassinated by his own partisans, which put an effectual end to the revolt. Hascen sent the marabout’s head to Constantinople, and had hardly settled the government on the old footing, and taken His defeat and death.

g all necessary precautions to secure the authority of the Turkish Bashas from the like attempts, when a new governor, sent thither from the Porte, found a much more effectual way totally to suppress it as long as he lived. This man was a renegado Greek, of the antient family of the Justiniani, and known then by the name of Mahmet Beygh, who, by his intrigues and bribes, A renegado gets the banner of Tripoli, bribes, had obtained a banner or government from the Grand Signor, sailed directly to Tripoli, and, having got possession of the castle of it, refused to acknowledge or receive any Basha from Constantinople, and took the reins of the government wholly upon himself, not indeed as independent, but as vassal and tributary to the Porte, to whom he obliged himself to pay a tribute and homage, as an acknowledgement of his subjection and dependance. And it is not unlikely, that the matter was compromised in that manner between the grand vizier and him, if not the Soltan, before his setting out of Constantinople, and with the same politic views as that court agreed it with the Deys of Algiers<sup>a</sup>. However that be, Mahmet kept himself secure in his castle, which, besides its other fortifications, was guarded with a strong garrison of soldiers, whom he had taken into his pay. And these he kept, as he said, as a guard to his person, and to avoid the fate of so many other Baschas, whom the Porte had caused to be strangled or banished, upon the least umbrage or pretence.

THE tribute he paid to the Porte consisted chiefly in slaves, and such other curious or rich presents as were most acceptable to that court, and were carefully sent at all proper seasons, by which means Mahmet kept himself firm in his despotic government, which he established much after the same manner that we described at the close of the last section, except that, some time after his death, the Tripolitans were again obliged to receive a Basha to be a check on their Deys, which last were chosen by the militia, and mostly by the same tumultuous and bloody methods, as we have seen practised at Algiers<sup>b</sup>.

His successors continued paying the same acknowledgements; though it sometimes happened, that both he and they had the mortification to see those ships intercepted and carried off by the Maltese cruizers, who lay in wait for them. Thus, at one time, they took from the former three large vessels laden with Moors, Negroes, and some valuable commodities, in their way to Constantinople; and a few years after another Maltese commander, named Charolt, among other prizes he made on the coasts of Barbary, took three large ships belonging to Tripoli, together with a considerable number of other vessels, which they were escorting to Constantinople. The fight was very obstinate on both sides; Ibrahim Rais, who commanded the Turkish convoy, had 450 soldiers on board his three ships; but, being attacked on all sides by the Maltese fleet, was forced to yield, after a most desperate defence. The Christians made above 300 Turks prisoners in this action, and their commander, and entered the port of Malta with 20 ships, laden with the richest spoil.

S E C T. III.

Of the bombardment of the city of Tripoli by the French fleet, and the disadvantageous peace they were obliged to submit to.

The Tripolitans a faithless piratic crew.

THE next remarkable transaction relating to the history of this piratic republic (for we omit those of lesser moment, such as their frequent domestic broils and revolts against their Deys and Douwan, upon every discontent, their good and ill success in their piratic excursions), was the dreadful bombardment it brought upon itself by their breach of faith to the late French king Lewis XIV. a prince no less known for his severity in punishing that crime in others, than for his own particular disregard to it in himself. The various instances we have given in the history of the two neighbouring republics of Algiers and Tunis, in the preceding chapters, evidently shew, how ready those piratical states are, we may add, how often they have been obliged by a proud, lazy, and starving populace, to violate the most solemn treaties with Christian powers; and what an encouragement the protection of the Porte, which they buy by a small homage and yearly tribute, hath been to their principals to do so, whenever their interest or safety gave them an occasion or pretence for it. But, however such breaches might go unpunished with some Christian powers, the French court never stood enough in awe of that of Constantinople, to decline taking a severe revenge of them for such infringements against it<sup>c</sup>.

Incur the displeasure of France.

WHAT gave occasion to the present dreadful execution we are going to relate, was a capture made by a Tripolitan corsair of a ship under French colours, and that republic's detaining a great number of French subjects in a state of slavery, the restitution of both which had been in vain insisted upon by their consul; which insolent refusal the French monarch so highly resented, that he ordered all his captains, who cruised on those seas, to make reprisals on them wherever they met them<sup>d</sup>.

PURSUANT to these orders the marquis D'Anfreville, who was dispatched by commodore Quésne to convoy two small prizes he had taken at the island of Hiera, on the north coast of Sicily, meeting with six vessels belonging to Tripoli, near Cape Sapienza, immediately

- a attacked them; three of them, however, making all the sail they could, had the good fortune to get out of his reach, whilst the other three, venturing to stand the engagement, were so terribly shattered, that they were forced at length to sail away, with the utmost Tripolitan speed, to the island of Chios to be refitted. The commodore Du Quesne had no sooner notice <sup>ships forced into Chios:</sup> of it, than he came with a squadron of seven ships, and surprised them there; but, before he began any hostilities, he sent to acquaint the Aga who commanded in that place, that he came as a friend, but that he had express orders to come in quest of some Tripolitan pirates, who, by the tenor of treaties still in force, were stiled rebellious subjects, and given up to the just vengeance of the EMPEROR OF FRANCE. This specious declaration did not, however, meet with the favourable answer he expected from the Aga, the Tripolitans being at that time
- b masters of the port and city; upon which, having called a council, he immediately drew <sup>bombarded in that port:</sup> nearer to the place, and began to cannonade it with such fury, that the Tripolitans, who were then employed in refitting their shattered vessels, and in no condition to defend themselves, betook to the water, and swam, with all possible haste, to the two forts belonging to the town. Du Quesne tried in vain to enter the port, being prevented by a strong staccado which they had laid in his way. A furious combat ensued, which lasted three hours and a half, the castle all the while firing their artillery upon his squadron, who, in their turn, threw no less, we are told*, than seven thousand bombs from theirs against it, few of which failed of making some dreadful execution, either on the Tripolitan ships, or on the city, a great number of whose houses were either thrown down
- c or terribly shattered, and many of the inhabitants killed or wounded. On the next day the city sent to demand a parley, and to engage either to oblige the Tripolitans to accept of a peace, or to drive them out of the port. Du Quesne, instead of giving any answer to these proposals, removed with his squadron farther off, in order to block up those corsairs more easily. This hostile infringement of the French on the Chions, and their ill treatment of the Tripolitans, soon reached the Ottoman court, and the complaints made of it both to the Grand Signor and Douwan so greatly exasperated them against the French, that the ambassador of Lewis XIV. M. de Guilleragues, then at that court, who had express orders <sup>The Sultan incensed against the French commodore:</sup> not to relax or recede in the least from his master's pretensions in this affair, found it a difficult task to maintain his honour and interest in so delicate a point, and was forced to make
- d use of all his politics, bribes, and cabals, to prevent a rupture between these two monarchs. At length, after a long and strenuous contest between the grand vizier and him, the Ottoman court agreed, that the captain Basha and M. du Quesne should terminate the affair by a treaty of peace, of which the articles were as follow:
1. "THAT all the French, who were on board any vessel, whether of the Tripolitan corsairs, or any other that were sailed out from that city, since the year 1681, should be set at liberty.
  2. "That the ship of captain Cruvillier, which they had taken under the French banner, and carried to the port of Chio, should be restored, with all its artillery, arms, equipage, &c.
  3. "THAT the vessel taken under Majorcan colours should be detained in the same port, e "under the authority of the captain Basha, with all its rigging, cannon, arms, &c. till it be decided whether it ought to pass for a French vessel.

  4. "THAT the ships belonging to Tripoli should not pretend to visit any trading vessel under French colours, nor attempt to seize upon them, or the men or effects, in case they were provided with passports from the French admiral.
  5. "THAT all strangers, on board any French vessel, shall pass free and unmolested in their persons and effects; as likewise all Frenchmen, of what rank soever, who shall be found on board any vessels under strange colours, even those of an enemy.
  6. "THAT no French prizes, and their prisoners, shall be sold in any port belonging to the kingdom of Tripoli.

f 7. "THAT France shall have a consul at Tripoli.

  8. "THAT no corsair, belonging to Tripoli, shall make any prize on the French coast, at a less distance than ten leagues<sup>d</sup>."
- THE reader may see by these articles, what a strange influence the French court had over that of the Grand Signor; but the regency, who paid not the same regard to it, rejected them with the utmost indignation on that account. This was no more, probably, than Lewis XIV. expected, who had taken care by that time to provide such a powerful armada against that republic, as could scarcely fail of forcing them to submit to more disadvantageous articles than those which had been imposed upon them by the Porte.
- g ACCORDINGLY on the 15th of June of the very next year 1685, the marshal D'Estrees, <sup>A fleet sent to bombard Tripoli.</sup> vice-admiral of France, appeared before their capital at the head of his fleet, and was there joined by the marquis of Anfreville and captain Nesmond, who had been cruising in that neighbourhood, expecting his arrival. Some days were spent in reconnoitring the place, <sup>a</sup> and chusing a proper spot where to cast anchor, whilst M. Tourville, followed by some armed long-boats, went every night to sounding, as far as the walls of the city, till he had found one about a league distance from them, and there they formed their line of battle, and the plan of the siege. On the 22d orders were given to the bombardeers to get all the mortars ready; whilst the shallops, belonging to the men of war, went and anchored within gun-shot of the town, and, about eight at night, they began the attack; and Mr. Tourville, who had the command of it, having ordered three armed gallies before the port, to prevent any obstruction from the enemy, they began to throw some bombs in the place about ten of the clock, with great success, and without any molestation from the Tripolitan sloop all that night, though they had kept a constant firing of their musketry the two foregoing nights <sup>b</sup> on the bombardeers, though much nearer to them. They continued plying their work till six the next morning, by which time they had thrown 500 bombs into the place. They resumed it on the night following about midnight, and made such terrible execution, that they could see the spreading flames in several parts of the town, without receiving one shot from it; and, on the morrow, the marshal D'Etrees caused the port to be every-where founded, in spite of all their fire, in order to find a proper place to raise a fresh battery, which might destroy both the town and its fortifications. In the mean time some of the bombs having fallen on a place where the people were assembled, and killed about thirty or forty of them, threw the whole city into the utmost consternation, and filled the air with the most dreadful outcries. At length, finding the enemy resolutely bent on their ruin, and <sup>c</sup> pursuing their work with so much intrepidity, they agreed to dispatch a herald to the marshal to obtain a peace from him at any price.

THE person they made choice of for that purpose was a venerable old man, 94 years of age, who, being introduced to the vice-admiral, addressed him in words to this effect: "I am <sup>d</sup> the unfortunate Trik, the father in-law of Baba Hassan, driven out of Algiers after a reign of 24 years, during which time I had been their Dey, and always behaved as a fast friend <sup>e</sup> to the French. I am now sent to you by the Douwan of Tripoli, to know what your demands are, and to mediate a peace between you and them." To this the vice-admiral answered in such terms as expressed his satisfaction; and, having acquainted him with the motives which had induced the king his master to begin the war against the Tripolitan republic, proposed to him the most effectual means of putting an end to it, promising him, at the same time, a cessation of hostilities till the next day, that they might have time to take their measures about the articles which he should send to them. Trik assured him, that no time should be lost about it, the city being wholly inclined to peace; and leaving one of the principal members, who had accompanied him, as an hostage, returned with Mr. Raymond, a major of the French army, and Mr. La Croix, who was to serve as interpreter; upon which orders were given to fire five pieces of cannon, to assure the city of the cessation of the bombardment.

THEY met with a very civil reception from the Dey, who on the next day, being the 25th, caused the articles to be read before the Douwan; the principal of which were, <sup>e</sup>

1. THAT they should pay 200,000 crowns as an equivalent for all the captures they had made of French merchantmen: and 2. To restore all the Christian captives they had taken fighting under French colours. The first of them was greatly excepted against, on account of the impossibility of raising such an exorbitant sum; but, after some debates, they agreed to pay down 500,000 livres, and to release all the French captives; and as to the money, they promised that one part of it should be sent that very night, and the remainder within 20 days; which term the vice-admiral reduced to 15, and that on condition that they should furnish his fleet with a daily supply of beeves for their maintenance, and that of the slaves. And as to the Christian captives, they engaged to release 200 of them, which, they said, were all they then had within and in the neighbourhood of their city. And as to the 400 <sup>f</sup> more, which were then rowing in the seven gallies belonging to their republic, and at that time in the service of the Grand Signor against the Venetians, they would send ten of their principal citizens as hostages for their release, upon the return of those ships. An hundred and eighty of the former were accordingly restored by the very next morning, together with two other hostages for the remainder; but they raised several difficulties about the payment of the 150,000 livres agreed on; yet not being able to obtain any abatement on any pretence, and being on the contrary threatened by the marshal with fresh showers of his destructive bombs, the Dey saw himself obliged, not only to lay a tax on the citizens, but even to order the heads of five ringleaders of the malcontents to be struck off. This execution, joined to the admiral's menaces, so terrified the mutineers, that they immediately <sup>g</sup> complied with his severe terms; insomuch that on the next morning, which was the 27th, and the day on which they were to pay the above-named sum, they brought but a small moiety of it in coin, and the rest in ingots, rings, bracelets, necklaces, gold chains, diamonds,

was paid.*

- a monds, pearls, and other jewels, which they said they were obliged to strip their wives of, and at the same time released a merchantship belonging to the port of Marfeilles, which they had taken a little before this rupture.

THEY did not complete the payment of the stipulated sum till the 9th of July following; at which time they had stripped the Jewish synagogue of all its rich lamps, the Janissaries of their mitred caps, their horses of their richest harness, and their grand standard of its gilt silver ball; the admiral protesting, that he would not sign the peace till full payment of the sum was made, and threatening the citizens with a fresh bombardment at every delay; inso-much, that the fear of it had driven great numbers of them out of the city into the adjacent fields, to avoid being buried under the ruins of their own houses. At length, Mr. La Croix, b the interpreter, having translated the articles of peace into the Turkish language; went in and read them before the Dey and Douwan; where, being solemnly signed and sealed, public notice was given of it by a double discharge of twenty-five cannon; the one to express their joy, and the other to return thanks to the marshal D'Etrees for his services done to their republic; which, besides the large sum above-mentioned, and exacted with so much rigic nefs, consisted in the destroying of a vast number of houses, and the death of 300 persons buried under the ruins. The regency begged in the next place, that a consul might be appointed to reside at Tripoli, which was readily granted; and M. Martinel nominated to that office, until his majesty's further orders arrived. Upon his coming to the house appointed for his residence, the French flag was hoisted up on the top thereof, and saluted by a third discharge of the same number of cannon †. Thus ended this dreadful expedition, to the great satisfaction of the French monarch, and his trading subjects in those parts; and which, how severe it may appear in its execution, must be owned by all that knew the avarice and perfidy of that piratical nation, to have been the only effectual way of bringing it to reason, and of deterring, if any thing will, all those miscreant corsairs from committing the most cruel, audacious outrages on those seas, in violation of the most solemn oaths and treaties with Christian princes and states: a task which the great Charles the Vth, the English, Dutch, and other maritime nations, had attempted in vain in their turns.

By this treaty of peace the republic was farther obliged to send an ambassy to France, which was to consist of two of the chief officers belonging to either of the three states; viz. the Dey, the Douwan, and the militia, and those were to go and offer a kind of homage, or tribute, in their names, to the French monarch. The persons nominated to that office were the Khalil Aga, lieutenant to the Basha, and Heister Aga, an officer of the marine. The presents they were to carry were to be some of the most curious birds and beasts that their country afforded, as lions, tigers, leopards, dromedaries, Barbary horses, ostriches, &c.

THEY landed at Toulon on the 3d of May, 1687, accompanied by eight domestics, besides the son of Khalil Aga above-mentioned, and were received there by the intendant of the marine, and maintained there and every-where else at the king's expence. They were obliged to stay there forty days, to recover themselves and their wild creatures from the fatigues of their voyage, notwithstanding their eager desire to get to Paris, and have the honour, as they expressed themselves, of being presented to the greatest monarch in the world. They were no less liberal of their compliments on him, whilst they were shewn, during that interval, the several rarities of the place; such as the arsenal, dock, port, and vessels riding in it. And much the same thing they did at every city through which they passed, and especially at that of Lyons, where they halted some days, and were visited by all the quality of both sexes in their richest dresses and equipages. The same honours were paid to them at Gharenton, where they halted thirteen days, before they were conducted to Versailles, where the king and court then were, and where they were presented to them on the day after their arrival, in the usual form, just as his majesty was going out of his chapel. The speech they addressed him in, if their interpreter hath done them justice, was in the same low flatter-f ing stile with all their other encomiums on him. It was to the following purpose:

“ GREAT monarch of the earth, the envoys of the Dey, Douwan, and the militia of Tripoli, are come to present to your majesty some horses, dromedaries, and other animals of their country, as an homage and tribute which they offer to your majesty; and they shall return home highly satisfied with the honour done to them of appearing before the greatest king in the world.” Their reception was suitable to their high swollen compliments; and, upon their leaving Paris, where they had been invited to view the rarities and curiosities of that city, and especially of the louvre, or royal palace, they expressed their admiration in words to this effect. Surely gold must be the most common of metals in this kingdom; and, by all that we have seen, we are fully persuaded, that his majesty need only form any one wish to have it immediately accomplished; so worthy did his sweet and affable temper render him of the empire of the world. The royal academy, observatory, the various manufactures they were shewn, particularly that called the Gobelins, or tapestry weaving, and many other such curiosities, produced still some fresh encomiums on the French nation; and this in particular, upon the whole, that nothing was impossible for it but the avoiding of remarks on the opera;

BUT that which raised them to the highest pitch of wonder was the opera; the music, actors, dresses, scenes, and machinery, appeared to them to be nothing but a continued series of the most surprising enchantments; but so charming and attractive, that the old surly corsair being asked how he liked it, could not forbear expressing his admiration; and, at length broke forth into this apposite allusion. Were we, said he, attacked by ever so powerful an enemy, we should not fail of making the best and stoutest defence, as long as our strength and ammunition lasted: but if attacked by those that compose the opera, with all this noble equipage and irresistible charms, we could do no other but lay down our arms and surrender ourselves to admitted to see the king dine;

THEY were at last admitted to the long wished for honour to see his majesty dine; and were no less surprised at the magnificence of his table, and the grandeur of his attendance and retinue on the occasion, if not still more at seeing that great monarch of the world eating and drinking like other mortals. Here they were presented each with a rich gold chain and medal, with his majesty's effigy curiously stamped; and their retinue were likewise gratified with some suitable donative: after which they received their audience of leave and returned to Toulon, extremely pleased at the kind, and at first unhopd-for, reception they met with on this occasion. For, from the treatment their city and republic had received from the French vice-admiral, the severe articles imposed upon and exacted from it, but more especially from some expressions which Khalil Aga let fall at the unexpected honours which were shewn to them at their first landing, that they rather feared they should be forced to undergo many reproaches and mortifications from that resenting monarch, as this embassy of submission and tribute was in some measure extorted from their regency. But now, from the opposite treatment he had met with, could, upon his return, experimentally acquaint his piratical countrymen, that the French monarchs were no less polite and generous towards their steadfast and submissive allies, than severe and vindictive against those who presumed to break their treaties with them. Experience hath since sufficiently shewn how effectual two such ties as those have been to keep that perfidious nation firm to their treaties with France, though no other maritime power hath been able to do the like by them. <sup>d</sup> return home highly satisfied.

SOMETHING, however, like this policy, the Soltan hath been often obliged to use towards them, by treating them either with kindness, indifference, or even with severity: sometimes also he is obliged to bribe the heads of the regency, particularly a new Dey, in order to secure their fidelity, to procure their assistance, or, as it often happens, to express his approbation of their choice; but oftener still to reward any singular service done to him by some considerable presents; but most commonly that of some fine large ship, well manned and equipped, because the benefit of it extends more to the good of the community, lays of course a greater obligation on all the subjects, especially as they have so few of their own, and those small, and poorly manned and equipped; though it often happens, that those presents, but more especially those state vessels, with all their men, cargo, equipage, &c. become a prey to their irreconcilable and ever wakeful enemies the Maltese knights. Of this extraordinary bulk and equipage was that which was presented to the new Dey, anno 1724; which, though capacious enough to carry forty-eight large guns and fourteen pate-reroes, and 400 men, was, nevertheless, so fine and excellent a sailer, that it was with no difficulty that the chevalier de Chambray, who commanded the Maltese frigate, could come up to and engage it; neither did he make himself master of it till after a continual firing on both sides, which lasted four hours <sup>e</sup>.

To pursue the history of this kingdom still farther, would be both a needless and irksome labour, were we better acquainted with the transactions of it by land and sea, than it is possible for us to be; we should find little else in it but either the same scenes of piracy and cruelty in one, and of ambition, perfidy, rebellions, and murders in the other, as we have already seen in Tunis and Algiers, only done by different actors; so that a great part of it would be a dull repetition of sundry events which we have had occasion to mention in the two foregoing chapters. We shall, therefore, close their history with what is more interesting to Englishmen to know; viz. the treaty of peace and commerce concluded by the regency of that piratical republic with our British vice-admiral Baker, anno 1716;
 and is as follows:

* LA CROIX, ubi sup. sect. iv.

† VERTOT in fin. lib. xiv.

a ARTICLES of peace and commerce between his most sacred majesty king George, &c. and the most excellent lords Mahamed Bey; Yusef Dey, the Douwan, and the rest of the officers and people of the city and kingdom of Tripoli, renewed, concluded, and ratified, on the 19th of July, A. D. 1716, by John Baker, Esq; vice-admiral, &c.

b 1. In the first place, it is agreed and concluded, that, from this time forward for ever, there shall be a true and inviolable peace between the most serene king of Great-Britain and the most illustrious lords and governors of the city and kingdom of Tripoli in Barbary, and between all the dominions and subjects of either side; and if the ships and subjects of either party shall happen to meet upon the sea, or elsewhere, they shall not molest each other, but shall shew all possible respect and friendship.

2. THAT all merchant ships belonging to the dominions of Great-Britain, and trading to the city, or any part of the kingdom, of Tripoli, shall pay no more than three per cent. custom for all kinds of goods they shall sell; and as for those they shall not sell, they shall be permitted freely to embark them again on board their ships without paying any duty whatsoever, and shall depart without any hindrance or molestation.

c 3. THAT all ships and other vessels, as well belonging to the said king of Great-Britain, or to any of his majesty's subjects, as those belonging to the city and kingdom of Tripoli, shall freely pass the seas, and traffick where they please, without any search, hindrance, or molestation from each other; and that all persons and passengers, of what country soever, and all manner of monies, goods, merchandizes, and moveables, to whatsoever people or nation belonging, being on board any of the said ships or vessels, shall be wholly free, and shall not be stopped, taken, or plundered, or receive any harm or damage whatsoever from either party.

d 4. THAT the Tripolitan ships of war, or any other vessels thereunto belonging, meeting with any merchant ships or vessels of the king of Great-Britain's subjects (not being in any seas belonging to his majesty's dominions) may send on board one single boat with two fitters, besides the ordinary crew of rowers, and no more than the two fitters to enter into the said merchant-ships, or any other vessels, without the express leave of the commander of every such ship or vessel; and then, upon their producing to them a pass, under the hand and seal of the high admiral of England, or of the commissioners for executing the said office, the said boat shall presently depart, and the merchant-ship or ships, vessel or vessels, shall freely proceed on its or their voyage: and though the commander or commanders of such merchant-ship or ships, or vessels, produce no pass from the high admiral of England, or, &c. yet, if the major part of the ships or vessels company be subjects of the said king of Great-Britain, the said boat shall presently depart, and the merchant-ship or ships, &c. shall freely proceed on their voyage: and any of the said ships of war, or other vessels of his said majesty, meeting with any ship or ships, &c. belonging to Tripoli, if the commander or commanders of any such ship or ships, &c. shall produce a pass, signed by the governors of Tripoli, and a certificate from the English consul residing there, or, if they have no such pass or certificate, yet, if the major part of the said ships or vessels company be Turks, Moors, or slaves belonging to Tripoli, then the said Tripoli ship, vessel, &c. shall freely proceed on their voyage.

5. THAT no commander, or other person, of any ship or vessel of Tripoli, shall take out of any ship or vessel of his said majesty's subjects any person or persons whatsoever, to carry them any where to be examined, or upon any other pretence; nor shall use any torture or violence unto any person of what nation or quality soever, being on board any ship or vessel of his said majesty, upon any pretence whatsoever.

f 6. THAT no ship-wreck belonging to the said king of Great-Britain, or to any of his subjects, upon any part of the coasts belonging to Tripoli, shall be made or become a prize; and that neither the goods thereof shall be seized, nor the men made slaves; but that all the subjects of Tripoli shall do their best endeavours to save the said men and their effects.

7. THAT no ship, nor any other vessel of Tripoli, shall have permission to be delivered up, or to go to any other place at enmity with the king of Great-Britain, to be made use of as corsairs against his majesty's subjects.

8. THAT if any ship or vessel belonging to Tunis, Algiers, Tetuan, Sallee, or any other place being at war with the said king of Great-Britain, bring any ships or vessels of his said majesty's subjects to Tripoli, or to any port or place of that kingdom, the governors there shall not permit them to be sold within the territories of Tripoli.

g 9. THAT if any of the said king of Great-Britain's subjects shall happen to die in Tripoli, or any of its territories, his goods or monies shall not be seized by the governors, or any ministers of Tripoli, but shall remain with the English consul.

10. THAT neither the said consul, nor any other subject of Great-Britain, shall be bound a to pay the debts of any other British subject, unless they become surety for the same by a public act.

11. THAT the subjects of his said British majesty in Tripoli, or its territories, in matters of controversy, shall be liable to no other jurisdiction but that of the Dey or Douwan, except the difference be between themselves; in which case they shall be liable to no other determination than that of the consul.

12. THAT in case any subject of his Britannic majesty, being in any part of the kingdom of Tripoli, shall happen to kill, wound, or strike a Turk or Moor, if he be taken, he shall be punished in the same manner, and with no greater severity than a Turk ought to be for the like offence; but if he escape, neither the English consul, nor any other British subject, b shall be in any sort questioned or troubled on that account.

13. THAT the English consul now, or at any time hereafter, residing at Tripoli, shall be there at all times with entire freedom, and safety of his person and estate, and shall be permitted to chuse his own interpreter and broker, and freely to go on board any ship in the roads as often as he pleases, and to have the liberty of the country, and shall be allowed a place to pray in, and that no person shall do him any injury, in word or deed.

14. THAT not only during the continuance of this peace and friendship, but likewise if any breach or war happen to be hereafter between his said British majesty and the city and kingdom of Tripoli, the said consul, and all others his majesty's subjects inhabiting in the kingdom of Tripoli, shall always, and at all times, both in peace and war, have full and absolute liberty to depart, and to go into their own, or any other country, in any ship or vessel of what nation soever they shall think fit, and to carry with them all their effects, goods, families, and servants, though born in the country, without any molestation or hindrance. c

15. THAT no subject of his Britannic majesty, being a passenger from or to any port, shall be molested or meddled with, though he be in a ship or vessel at war with Tripoli.

16. THAT if any of his said Britannic majesty's ships of war come to Tripoli, or to any other port or place of that kingdom, with any prize, they shall have liberty to sell it, or otherwise dispose of it, at their own pleasure, without any lett or molestation; and that his said majesty's ships of war shall not be obliged to pay any customs whatsoever; and that if d they shall want provisions, victuals, or any other things, they may freely buy them at the market price.

17. THAT when any of his Britannic majesty's ships of war shall appear before Tripoli, upon notice thereof given to the English consul, or by the commander of the said ships to the chief governor of Tripoli, public proclamation shall be immediately made to secure the Christian captives; and if, after that, any Christians whatsoever make their escape on board any of the said ships of war, they shall not be required back again; nor shall the said consul or commander, or any other British subject, be obliged to pay any thing for the said escaped Christians.

18. THAT all the merchant-ships coming to the city or kingdom of Tripoli, though not e belonging to Great-Britain, shall have free liberty to put themselves under the protection of the British consul, in selling and disposing of their goods and merchandize, if they shall think proper, without any molestation.

19. THAT all the British ships of war carrying his majesty's flag, upon their appearing before the city of Tripoli, after due notice given of it by the British consul, shall, in honour of his Britannic majesty, be saluted with twenty-seven cannon fired from the castle of the city, and that the said ship shall return the same number to it.

20. THAT no merchant-ship belonging to Great-Britain, or any other nation under the protection of the British consul, being in the port of Tripoli, shall be detained from proceeding f to sea on her voyage longer than three days, under pretence of arming the ships of war of this government, or any other whatsoever.

21. THAT no British subject shall be permitted to turn Moslem in the city and kingdom of Tripoli (being induced to it by any surprise whatsoever) unless he voluntarily appear before the Dey, or governor, with the English consul's interpreter, thrice in twenty-four hours, and every time declaring his resolution to become Mohammedan.

22. THAT his Britannic majesty's consul residing in Tripoli shall, at all times when he pleases, have liberty to put up his said majesty's flag on the top of his house, and there to continue it displayed as long as he pleases; and likewise that the said consul shall have the like liberty of putting up and displaying the said flag in his boat when he passes on the water, and no man whatsoever to oppose, disturb, or injure him therein, either by word or deed. g

23. THAT whereas the island of Minorca and city of Gibraltar have been yielded to his Britannic majesty by the king of Spain, as well as several other powers of Europe engaged in a in the late war, it is agreed and concluded, that, from this time forward for ever, the said island of Minorca and city of Gibraltar shall be esteemed in every respect by the government of Tripoli to be part of his Britannic majesty's dominions, and the inhabitants thereof shall be deemed his natural subjects, as if they had been born in Great-Britain; and they, with their ships carrying British colours, shall be permitted freely to trade and traffick in any part of the kingdom of Tripoli, and shall pass without any molestation, either on the seas or otherwise, in the same manner, and with the same freedom and privileges, as have been stipulated in this and all former treaties in behalf of the British nation and subjects.

b 24. AND whereas, in the treaty concluded in the reign of king Charles II. ann. 1676, by Sir John Narborough, an article was inserted, by which the ships of Tripoli were excluded from cruising before, or in sight of, the port of Tangier, then belonging to his majesty, it is now ratified and concluded, that none of the ships or vessels belonging to Tripoli shall cruize, or look for prizes, before or in sight of the island of Minorca and Gibraltar, to disturb or molest the commerce thereof in any manner whatsoever.

25. THAT all and every article in the treaty shall be inviolably kept and observed between his sacred British majesty and the most illustrious lords, &c. of the city and kingdom of Tripoli; and all other matters, not particularly expressed in this treaty, and provided for in any former, shall still remain in full force, and shall be esteemed the same as if inserted here.

Dated, in the presence of Almighty God, in the city of Tripoli, on the 19th day of June, ann. 1716 of the Christian æra, and of the Mohammedan Hejira 1128.

The history of the kingdom of Barca.

c WE have by this time nearly finished our African history, and taken the round of all Barca, its exits coasts, as well as of its principal inland kingdoms, and are happily arrived at the tent, name, country, or, as it is more commonly stiled, the desert of Barca, situate between Egypt, and barren whence we set out at first<sup>a</sup>, and the kingdom of Tripoli, described in the foregoing chapter, soil, &c.
and contiguous to both; extending itself in length from east to west, that is, from the confines of the former to those of the latter, from the 37th to the 44th degrees of long. from Paris, and in breadth, from north to south, about<sup>b</sup> thirty leagues; though its confines on the south side are various, and at best very uncertain. Leo Africanus and Marmol give this country a still more extraordinary length and breadth*; but it is plain they both included within them the Regio Syrtica, on the south side of the Syerna gulph; seeing, according to d them, the whole length amounts to 1300, and its breadth to 200 miles, from the Libyan sea to the confines of Numidia: whereas our most modern geographers compute its length only from the eastern coast of the gulph to the Alexandrian confines, or from the 37th to the 60th degree of longitude from east to west, whatever it may be in its breadth from north south.

e WE have given an account of its antient state in a former part of this work<sup>c</sup>. It retains still its old name and sterility, being, for the most part, especially the middle, nothing but a tract of dry and barren sand; on which account the Arabs, its chief inhabitants, stile it Sabart, or Ceyrart Barka, that is, the desert or road of whirlwinds, or hurricanes (A). It labours almost every where under a great scarcity of water; and, except in the neighbourhood of towns and villages, where the ground produces some small quantities of grain, such as corn, millet, and some maize, the rest is in a manner quite barren and uncultivated, or, to speak more properly, incultivable; and even of that small quantity, which those few spots produce, the poor inhabitants are obliged to exchange some part with their indigent neigh-

(A) Some authors have derived its name of Barka from the verb barac, to bless; and will have it to signify blessing: but, besides that it is differently spelt in the Arabic, and can bear no other signification than that we have given it from Leo Africanus, Marmol, and other Arabian writers (1), the dry, sandy, and barren nature of the country (in which, to use the words of Quintus Curtius (2) and Arrian (3), a traveller seems to wage war with nature, the ground sinking under his feet at every step, his eyes being blinded by the sand which covers it, blown in clouds about him by the wind and air) plainly shews, that the name of Elefiring could not belong to it in any but an ironical sense.

hours for dates, sheep, and camels, which they stand in greater need of than they, by reason of their great scarcity of grass and other proper food; for the want of which, those which are brought to them seldom thrive or live long. But the most desert and dangerous canton of all is that in which the temple of Jupiter Ammon stood; which, though in other respects so pleasantly situated<sup>a</sup>, is surrounded a great way round about with such quick and burning sands, as are very detrimental to travellers, not only as they sink under their feet, but being light and heated by the rays of the sun, are easily raised by every breath of wind; which, if it chance to be in their faces, almost burns their eyes out, and stifles them for want of breath; and, if vehement, often overwhelms whole caravans. We have formerly seen the sad catastrophe of Cambyfes and his army, in his bold attempt against that temple and oracle<sup>b</sup>, as well as Alexander's more successful, though difficult, expedition to it<sup>c</sup>. But, upon the whole, the country may justly be termed a sandy desert, through which there is no travelling without the help of a compass, or the direction of the stars; and tho' it was once the thoroughfare for the caravans from Barbary and Morocco to Mecca, yet it has been since so infested with wild Arabs, that they are obliged to steer fifty leagues about to avoid being plundered by them.

THE French geographers divide the country of Barca into that which they stile the kingdom, and the desert; the former of which hath some considerable ports, towns, and villages; and is, according to them, under the protection of the Porte, and governed by a Cadi, who is the Basha of Kayro<sup>b</sup>, and hath his residence at Tripoli: but this seems to be said without any good authority. According to Sanfon and Baudrand, this other part, which spreads itself along the eastern coast, and which they stile the eastern shore of Tripoli, extends itself from the port of Solomon, or Solyman, to the gulph of Sydra; but this coast is most commonly known by the name of Derna, from one of the most considerable towns and ports upon it; besides which it has several others, and the ruins of a much greater number, which are now reduced to poor villages. The most remarkable ones are the Cape Raccallino, stiled by Ptolemy the great Chersonesus, because it forms a peninsula; and the farthest towards Egypt is the town of Angela, or Onguella, which name it seems to have preserved ever since the time of Ptolemy, who calls the inhabitants Angelians<sup>d</sup>. Its territory, though mostly desert, hath good water, and produces dates. Between those two are many others, but differently placed and named by those geographers, which shews that this coast was but little known to them, as the Porto Tabarca, formerly Batrachus, Batracha, and Patriarcha, Cape de Lucco, or Loco, antiently Promontorium Carylionum, Porto Mesulman, the haven of Salonef, or Salona, supposed by some to be the antient Portus Panormus and Galinus, and by others the Portus Catabathmus; but none of them with any certainty. Our latest geographers agree in placing it on the most eastern verge of the Barcan coast, next to the confines of Egypt. To these we may add some few more out of La Croix; viz. the great valley of Carto Sappires, the antient Catabathmus, which extends itself quite to Egypt<sup>e</sup>, overgainst the spot where stood the temple of Jupiter Ammon. The Arab pilgrims, who go through it to Mecca, call it in their language Hesackbir, or the ruined places. From these one comes to Porto Albertene, or the Soltan's port; that of Caguxi, formerly Trifachi; the cape and haven of Raxa, antiently Paretonium; and, lastly, the city of Barca or Barce, which gives name to the whole province, and lies farther up into the inland, on the eastern coast of the gulph of Sydra above-mentioned. Ptolemy, who gives it the name of Ptolemais, tells us, that it was a celebrated city in his days<sup>f</sup>; and Pliny and Strabo, who give it the same name, tell us, it was a famed sea port in the Pentapolis Cyrenaica. It still retains that name with a small change, and is called Tolemata to this day<sup>g</sup>; but from the different situation which these latter give it from Ptolemy, who places it higher in the inland, as well as from Scylax, who places the port of Barca at the distance of 100 and the city 500 stades from the sea, one may reasonably conjecture, that Ptolemais did not stand where the city but where the port of Barca did. And this will at once reconcile the difference between those antient geographers<sup>h</sup>.

Thus much must suffice for the towns and most considerable places in this vast tract. What condition they are in, what commerce they drive, or how and by whom governed, we cannot find any satisfactory account of; and it is most likely that the maritime towns are under the protection of the Porte; but whether under the government of the Basha of Egypt or Tripoli, or whether they have formed themselves into free states like those of Algiers and Tunis, we cannot say; only we are told, that the inhabitants of the maritime towns are more civilized and conversible than those of the inland. The first profess Mohammedism, and have imbibed the notions of humanity and justice; whilst the latter, those especially of the desert,

- a who have neither religion nor any sign of worship among them, are altogether as savage and brutish, and live wholly upon theft and plunder, like all other wild Arabs; of whom we have had frequent occasion to speak in some of the foregoing chapters: for it was by them that this tract, till then a continued barren desert, was first inhabited; who, at their first coming into it, settled themselves in the best cantons; but as they multiplied, and were at frequent wars, one hord or tribe with another, the strongest drove the weakest out of the best spots, and sent them to wander in the desert parts, where they live in the most abject and miserable condition; their lot scarcely yielding any one necessary of life, food, or raiment. Hence it is that they are said to be the ugliest of all the Arabs<sup>o</sup>, their bodies having scarcely any thing but skin and bones, their faces meagre, looks fierce and ravenous; their garb, which is commonly what they take from the passengers and pilgrims who go through those parts, tattered with long wearing; whilst the poorest of them have hardly a rag to cover their middle.

- THEY are likewise reported to be the most resolute and expert robbers and plunderers, that being their chief employ and livelihood; both which frequently yield them so lean a harvest, that necessity forces them to lengthen their excursions as far as into Numidia, Libya, and other southern parts for fresh supplies<sup>p</sup>. Our author adds, that they commit the most unheard of cruelties on those that fall into their hands, making them drink plenty of warm milk, and then hanging them up by the feet and shaking them, in order to make them bring up any ducats, or other small coin, if any such they had swallowed to conceal from them.
- c They will even rake in their excrements, in hopes to find something to recompense their trouble and indelicacy; it being usual, it seems, among those merchants and pilgrims, who travel through this desert, to take that method to save what gold they carry about them; and whether any be found so concealed or not, they never fail stripping them of every thing they have, even to the last rag of their cloaths: in which, however, they come short of that inhumanity which is commonly practised in other parts of Africa by that plundering nation, who murder as well as rob their prey, unless they can get more by selling them for slaves than eating them; of which we have seen several instances in the foregoing volumes*. And yet so poor, indigent, and famished are these Barcans, that they commonly let, pledge, and even sell their children, to procure the necessaries of life, to the Sicilians, and other
- d neighbouring Christians, from whom they have most of their corn, especially before they set out for any long excursion: and it often happens, that after a successful one, they are enabled to redeem them again, but find that they have been converted and baptized; of which our author tells us he saw many instances in Sicily<sup>q</sup>: but whether converted or not, they all partake of that sullen taciturnity or stupid ignorance about their country, which is common to all the Africans that are forced out of it, that there is no possibility of extorting any intelligence from them concerning it.

- HERE, therefore, we shall put an end to this chapter, reserving the further account of the few Arabian dynasties which have flourished in this kingdom, as well as those of Numidia, Libya, Nubia, and Scene, or Upper Egypt, to the supplement we have elsewhere promised†, where the reader will have them all at one view; and where we shall likewise supply any
- e material omissions which may have happened through the course of this extensive work; and shall also take care to insert such other discoveries as have been lately made by some learned travellers, on the antiquities, and other valuable rarities, both natural and artificial, of this kingdom, especially of that part of it called Scene, or Upper Egypt; but which are not numerous enough to make a separate section of in this chapter.

THIS little island, known to the Romans by the name of Melita<sup>a</sup>, and famed chiefly for the hospitable reception which its inhabitants gave to the great apostle of the Gentiles, and to the rest of his shipwrecked companions<sup>b</sup>, lies in the Mediterranean sea, between the coasts of Tripoli and those of Sicily; and tho' distant only 18 leagues south from the latter, and about 50 north of the former, is nevertheless reckoned among the African islands by Ptolemy, and rightly enough, seeing the Punic<sup>c</sup> corrupt Arabic, which was formerly spoken by the inhabitants, shews them plainly enough to have had their origin from thence. It is situate under the 36th degree of north latitude, and between the 15th and 16th of east longitude, having the southern coasts of Sicily on the north, those of Tripoli on the south, the Morea and island of Candia on the east, and, on the west, the islands of Pantabarea, Linosa, and Lampadosa. Its south coast consists of little else but rocks and shelves, without one port or creek to sail into; but on the eastern side it hath some commodious havens, particularly those called Cala di S. Marco and Cala di S. Paulo; but the two most considerable ones in the island are those on the south-east side, the one called Marza Muzet, and the other only Marza, which signifies a port, and is the larger of the two, and lies on the right hand of port Muzet. These two are divided only by an oblong peninsula, on which is built a stout fort or castle called St. Elmo, which defends the entrance into both. Within that of Muzet lies a small island, near which the ships suspected of infection are obliged to perform quarantine<sup>d</sup>. Those of St. Nicolao, Seatu, and Siroco, have little or nothing worth notice, and more need not to be said of them (A).

THIS isle is commonly computed to be about 19 or 20 leagues in length, 9 or 10 in breadth, and 60 in circumference, little less or more<sup>e</sup>. But though it had been antiently in the possession of the Carthaginians, Romans, and other polite nations, yet it seems to have been little better than a barren place, partly sandy, partly rocky, the latter having hardly any depth of earth, and that so stony, as to be scarcely capable of producing corn, or any other grain, except cummin, and some other such-like seeds; its chief produce being figs, melons, honey, cotton, and some few other commodities and fruits, which the inhabitants exchanged for corn; and in this barren state it seems to have continued, till it came into the possession of the Maltese knights. It laboured likewise under great scarcity of water and fuel: upon all which accounts it was till that time but thinly inhabited, there being only about 30 or 40 boroughs, or other villages, scattered about in poor hamlets, and no city except the capital of its name, and the town and fort of St. Angelo, which defended the port, of which we shall give an account in the sequel; so that the whole number of its inhabitants scarcely amounted to 12,000, women and children included, and the greatest part of them very indigent<sup>f</sup>. In a word, it was so barren, poor, and uninviting, that when the emperor Charles V. offered it to the knights of Rhodes, after their being driven out of that island, their commissaries, who were sent to take an exact view of it, brought back such a discouraging account of it, that it was not without great difficulty that they were prevailed upon to accept of it<sup>g</sup>. How it hath been improved since their settlement in it, we are now going to shew.

(A) According to this situation, which the generality of modern geographers (1) unanimously give it, it is plain, that it is different from another island of the same name, Melita, but now Meleda, on the coasts of Dalmatia, near the city of Ragusa. Maltha is supposed by Cluverius (2), from its situation, and other particulars, to be the antient Hiperia mentioned by Homer (3); whence the Pheaces were afterwards driven by the Phœnicians, and retired into Scheria and the island of Corfu, which is the more probable, as the antient poet places

the mountain Melita in that island. He hath likewise brought some very probable arguments to prove, that Melita or Malta is the antient Ogygia, in which the famed nymph Calypso, daughter of the Ocean and Thetis, received the shipwrecked Ulysses, and detained him seven years at bed and board (4); but these being out of the limits of our modern history, we shall content ourselves with the bare mention of it here, as no notice had been taken of it in the antient.

- a THE island of Maltha hath now four considerable towns, surrounded with stout walls, and other fortifications; viz. Citta Valetta, Citta Vecchia, or old city, or antient Maliba, the town of St. Angelo, called also Citta Vittoriosa, or the victorious city, and St. Michael, all of them well inhabited, and in a thriving condition. Besides, these poor hamlets have grown into stout and populous villages, the old ones into considerable boroughs or towns, well built and inhabited, and the ground every-where so well cultivated, as to be able to supply the inhabitants with plenty of all necessaries. The ports and havens on the coast have likewise received their respective improvements, as the whole island every-where is so strongly fortified, that it hath been enabled to resist and baffle all the power and efforts of the Ottoman emperor to this very day. It is true, indeed, that the strength and success of this place, and its having proved such an effectual bulwark to Christianity, hath been chiefly owing to the singular bravery and zeal of that noble order; but still it is as plain, that they have spared neither pains nor cost to render this new settlement as impregnable as art and diligence could make it. They have likewise added not a little to its strength by the training up the inhabitants, who are naturally very stout and brave, to their martial discipline, so as to be ready to appear in arms upon any invasion, or other emergency; and these were grown so numerous, that in the year 1632, when an account was taken of them under their grand master Antonio de Paulo, they were found to amount to 51,750 souls, exclusive of the knights of the order, the clergy, which are also pretty numerous, and of those they stile familiars, or officers of the inquisition<sup>b</sup>.
- b THE natives are very robust and healthy, notwithstanding the excessive heat occasioned by the refraction of the sun's rays from such abundance of high rocks that cover the island; but those are so well refreshed by the westerly and north-westerly winds, which commonly blow during the best part of the afternoon, that they are seldom incommoded by them, and even strangers easily accustom themselves to the climate. There was a time, indeed, when most part of the country was afflicted with a contagious fever during the hot months, more especially that of August. This was then attributed to some particular inclemency of the air at that season; but it being afterwards found to proceed from the vast quantities of flax which used to be then thrown into the water to soak, and a prohibition issued out against it, the distemper wholly ceased<sup>c</sup>. There are no rivers in the island, but here and there some excellent springs of fresh water, and, where these fail, they are forced to dig wells in the rock; but their cities are most commonly supplied by rain water, which they preserve in their cisterns<sup>d</sup>.
- c THE city of Maltha, or antient city, formerly called Melita, on account of the great quantity of honey which the island produced (B), was once the capital and only city of it. It is very antient; and its cathedral, dedicated to St. Peter, is the first that ever was built in it, soon after St. Paul had converted its inhabitants; and the common tradition is, that the prefect Publius, who so kindly received that apostle, was converted by him, and made the first bishop of it. It hath not any thing else worth notice; and that which is now the most considerable upon all accounts is that called
- d CITTA VALETTA, by the Italians Terra Nova, and by the French Ville Neuve, or the new city. Some give it likewise the title of Citta Notabile, or the notable city, upon what account we cannot find; but its first name was given to it by the famed John de Valetta, grand master of the order, who caused it to be rebuilt immediately after it had been sadly battered, or rather almost ruined, by the Turks, from the castle of St. Elmo, which is situate just before it, and of which they had made themselves masters, as well as of the greatest part of the island. The city is built upon a rocky ground, high and craggy, which makes its streets very unpleasant and uneven, being mostly up and down hill, though otherwise strait and large. The handsomest of all is that which reaches from castle St. Elmo to the royal gate; it is about a mile in length, and here it is that the finest races are run by horses and asses on rejoicing days. The ground on which the city stands parts the great port of Marza from the lesser one called Marza Muzet, or Mussetto, which forms a kind of peninsula, open to the sea-waves at three different places, by means of a deep ditch cut into the rock, which lous, well-built, and commercial city, full of tradesmen, and famed for the manufacture of a fine sort of light cloth, which they had learned from the Phœnicians (6). It was also made a bishoprick from the earliest times of Christianity (7).

(B) It will not be amiss to observe here, that the natives, who still retained their antient Arabeſk, call it simply Medina, which signifies a city, or The city, by way of excellence; whence some conclude it to have been built by the Carthaginians, if not before their coming into the island (5). Diodorus Siculus speaks of it as a popu-

Fortifications. seems in some measure to separate it from the rest of the island. It is reckoned a very strong place, not only on account of its advantageous situation above-mentioned, but much more for the stout walls flanked with bastions, and other modern works, and surrounded by a deep and large ditch, cut likewise into the solid rock, and some other fortifications added to it occasionally at different times by the grand masters of the order, of which we may have occasion to speak in the sequel of this history <sup>1</sup>.

Fine Buildings. NEITHER is its beauty within the walls inferior to its strength without, the streets of it being wide, long, and strait, adorned with handsome houses, and noble public buildings of square stone, stately and spacious, particularly that called Strata Reale, or high-street, and the Strata de Merchanty, or merchant-street. The houses amount to above 2,000, are strong and lofty, flat on the top after the eastern manner, and for the most part provided with cisterns and reservoirs for rain water; but they have been since much better supplied with it from a delicious spring that hath been conveyed thither by proper aqueducts from the Porta del Monte, near the sea side, under the reign of their famed grand master Alof de Vignacourt; by which means not only the city is supplied with plenty of it, but the ships that ride in the haven may have it conveyed into their casks, by help of canes or pipes, with great ease and expedition.

Gates. BESIDES the Porta del Monte, towards the sea above-mentioned, the city hath two other gates leading into the adjacent territories, on the inland side, viz. that called Porta Reali, or royal gate, and Porta Boucheria, so called from its neighbourhood to the butchers slaughter-house. The country about the city abounds with delightful gardens, some of them cut out of the solid rock, and made productive of all manner of fruits, flowers, and herbage, and kept in excellent order by dint of labour and industry; that in particular called Boscheta, or pleasure garden, belonging to the grand master, and situate on an eminence on the west side of the city, yields the most beautiful prospect, from the great quantities of stately trees which grow upon it, as orange, lemon, citron, pomgranate, olive, peach, nectarine, and other fruit-trees. One part of this delicious spot is made into a warren, and breeds a great quantity of hares and rabbits; another, planted with olive-trees, abounds with stags, deer, &c. The whole is finely variegated with springs, cascades, and other water-works, and adorned with a most stately palace, whose apartments and lofty walls are magnificently furnished and adorned. The top of it is a noble platform, which hath some pieces of mounted cannon, and commands as well as yields a most charming prospect, particularly that of the bishop's garden, situate between that and the city.

Churches. HERE are seven stately churches, the most considerable of which is the cathedral, dedicated to St. John, the patron of the order, whose right hand they pretend to shew as a most valuable relic. The other six are those of St. Austin, St. Dominic, St. Maria Jesu, St. Paul, the Madona, or lady of victory, the Madona del Carmine, and the college of Jesus, besides chapels belonging to the monasteries, nunneries, hospitals, and other religious houses. Here are likewise, besides the grand master's palace, of which we shall speak in its place, seven others, commonly called by the knights Borgia, and by the French Auberges, or inns, as they were at their first institution, but are since stiled more commonly courts or palaces, from their subsequent magnificence, designed for the seven nations, or, as they affect to call them, tongues, of which their order at present consists; they had formerly an eighth, which was called that of Angleterra, or England, but this hath been abolished since the reformation. The names of the others are Provence, Auvergnia, France, Italy, Arragon, Germany, and Spain or Castile. Each of them have their great halls, where they hold their national councils, before they meet in the great one, in which every thing relating to the order is deliberated, the grand masters chosen, peace and war resolved, ambassadors received, and the like; of all which we shall have further occasion to speak when we give an account of that order, and its institutions and rules <sup>m</sup>.

Palaces and inns for the seven tongues. THE grand master likewise always resides in this city, and hath his palace built between the castle of St. Elmo and the cathedral of St. John. It is a most sumptuous edifice, and by far the largest and most magnificent in the whole island; and in it is the great hall, in which is held the general chapter or assembly of the knights of the first order, or, as they are stiled, the knights of the great cross; of whom we shall speak more fully in the sequel. Near the same castle of St. Elmo is a very noble hospital, which was greatly enlarged and enriched in the year 1664; in which every sick person hath a separate room, within a spacious hall, 30 yards wide, and 10 in breadth. There are 25 of these chambers on each side of the hall, divided by a wide gallery, which runs through it from end to end. In these each sick person is lodged in the most commodious manner, and not only attended with the utmost care by proper physicians, surgeons, &c. but, what is more, is served by the knights themselves, though all of them persons of the greatest rank and quality, none but such a being admitted into that order; and one would have been struck with the deepest admiration, to have seen with what tenderness and readiness those noble knights did attend, and even emulate that kind of hospitable charity towards their respective wards. These sick persons The patients served in plate by the knights. are all served with silver; not a plate, dish, cup, spoon, &c. but is of that metal; and in these utensils are brought their victuals to their bed-side by those knights, as likewise the medicines and other things that are ordered to them by the physicians; of which there are commonly four kept in pay, who regularly visit them every morning and evening<sup>n</sup>. But They are now become remiss. we must here observe, that the Maltese knights have greatly degenerated from the rules, and, within this last century, from the observance of those of their first institution, and have given themselves more to luxury, gallantry, and other modish vices, than to the observance

b of the primitive practice of the canons of their order, or the imitation of their predecessors, whole extraordinary valour and undaunted bravery abroad, when fighting against the enemies of Christianity, joined to the most zealous observance of their religious discipline, had justly gained them the universal admiration and esteem of all Christendom<sup>o</sup>. However, with respect to the hospital we are now speaking of, though they have quite relaxed from that antient humility and condescension in performing the lowest offices to those patients, yet they still take care that they shall be attended with the same care and diligence by persons of a lower rank.

NEAR this place, and the grand master's palace, is a large market-place, where all manner of provisions are brought and sold by the country people, in great abundance; such as

c corn, and other grain, fruits and greens of all sorts, wild and tame fowl, hogs, goats, oxen, sheep, and other necessaries of life. Most of the dead commodities are brought upon asses, which the natives of those mountainous parts are forced to use instead of horses. This market is kept every day, and in summer, when the heat is excessive, begins several hours before sun-rise. But the greater part of the corn and other provisions is brought thither from Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, &c. besides what is got by the prizes they make upon the Turks and other enemies at sea.

THERE is likewise another spacious square before the banjert, or prison, where their slaves are kept; which last is a very large building, suitable to the vast number of those slaves Other public edifices. they are continually bringing in from the coasts of Barbary, and the Turkish and other dominions; and this piazza is the place where they are exposed to sale. We have no room to describe their other public buildings; such as the bishop's palace, the custom-house, treasury, chancery, foundery, vast magazines for corn, wine, and other provisions, and many others of the like nature. But we cannot omit here a short account of their arsenal, which is not only a sumptuous edifice without, but is perhaps one of the best-furnished with the greatest quantity of arms, and other warlike weapons, machines, engines, &c. of all sorts, and kept in the most elegant regularity and order of any in Europe; it being always under the inspection of one of the order, and adjoining to the palace of the grand master<sup>p</sup>.

THIS huge pile consists of a spacious hall, in the middle of which stand five wooden The grand arsenal. machines, of a square figure; on all the four sides are hung, with great symmetry and neatness, all sorts of armour; such as helmets, shields, breast-plates, coats of mail, swords, Great quantities and variety of arms. halberds, pikes, half-pikes, daggers, muskets, pistols, and others of the like nature, of various shapes and sizes. The walls and beams across the cieling, are likewise covered with long and cross-bows, and other such warlike weapons, as were in use in former times, and which were brought hither from the isle of Rhodes; the whole containing as great a quantity of arms as would completely equip an army of 30,000 men. Adjoining to and across that hall is another, which is likewise filled with all kinds of arms, which were for the most part brought thither from Holland by the then grand master Lascharis, who made a present of them to the order. Besides these, every knight hath his own armoury for himself and his retinue, within his own house; and so hath every burgher and peasant throughout the

AT the entrance into the bay, one meets with two large rocks, which advance into the sea over-against Citta Valetta, like the two fingers of a hand; on the point of one of which, Castle of St. Angelo. near the mouth of the bay, stand the town and castle of St. Angelo, and on the other that called Citta Vittoriosa, both built on the rock and strongly fortified. The former of these had formerly some strong outworks, arsenals, magazines, a palace, and apartments for the knights, and an hospital for sailors; but was almost totally ruined by the Turks, anno 1565. Since which it is inhabited but by a handful of people, mostly belonging to the dock where the gallies are built, and wherethe commander of them hath a house not far from the water-side.

THE other, which stands further in, and called Citta Vittoriosa, from the siege it main- Citta Vittoriosa. tained against the Turks, was built by one of the grand masters, named Philip de Villiers Isfe

Adam, soon after the order had taken possession of the island; and is still very well fortified. <sup>a</sup> It is about a mile and a half in compass, and contains about 1200 houses, which are mostly inhabited by Maltese natives, and mariners. It hath five or six small churches, one of them belonging to the Greeks, and a palace, which serves for a court to the officers of the inquisition. The town and harbour of St. Michael, commonly called the Single Island, from one of the grand masters of the order, who caused it to be built anno 1560, is only parted from the land by a deep ditch. It is about a league in compass, and well fortified after the modern manner; and is chiefly inhabited by the corsairs of the order, who are sent to cruize against the Turks. Between this port and that of St. Angelo is another, to which all the corsairs and galleys come to anchor with their prizes and plunder, whether taken from Turks or Christians. This port may be shut up by the means of a strong chain, to prevent <sup>b</sup> the Turks, or any other enemies, entering into it; and here the standard of the city and castle are displayed, when any gally or other vessel is sailing in. Behind that of St. Michael is the place where the Dutch vessels usually come to anchor<sup>c</sup>. And thus much may suffice with respect to the most considerable sea-port towns.

THE villages, or adhamets, as they are called by the natives, or casales by the Italians, though, as we have elsewhere hinted, they were reckoned by authors of older date to amount to no more than between thirty and forty<sup>d</sup>, yet they have so far increased in number, as well as bulk, since the settlement of the order in the island, as to amount to above sixty; some of which are likewise become very considerable<sup>e</sup>. These were divided soon after into parishes, as the whole island is, for the better regulation of their several districts; whilst the directions and encouragement they have given those mountaineers, and the example they have set before them, how to improve their lands to the best advantage, and the training them up under their martial discipline, in order to defend themselves against invasions, have at once enabled them to live more happily and safely under their new masters, than they did before their coming, under their former government.

THIS island never was noted for any natural rarities worth notice; if we except the cave or grotto where St. Paul and his company took shelter from the rains, when the viper fastened to his arm; on the roof, sides, and floor of which, we are told, are found in the solid stone, which is of a soft nature, the eyes, tongues, heads, and other parts, of that reptile kind, in great abundance, and so lively represented, that no art can exceed them. <sup>d</sup> The like of which we are also told are to be found in many other parts of the island; and all of them are said to be, and are used accordingly, as an efficacious antidote against the bite of poisonous creatures, and even against all kinds of poison. And this, the tradition adds, is a quality which was given to them by the miraculous blessing and prayers of that apostle, inasmuch that no venomous creature could live in that island ever since that time (C). Near that place is a well of excellent water, which they likewise pretend was at first miraculously brought out by the same apostle's smiting the rock, to quench the thirst of his companions after their shipwreck; and some other virtues are likewise ascribed to the water by the superstitious inhabitants, not worth repeating; only it may not be improper to observe, in general, <sup>e</sup> that the island is almost every way, but more particularly on the south coast, surrounded with such a quantity of rocks, the greatest part of which scarcely rise above the surface of the water, that we need be the less surpris'd at any of the circumstances related by St. Luke concerning the apostle's shipwreck there<sup>f</sup>. But the most singular rarity we read of in this island, is a spot at some small distance from the village and church of St. Matthew, where there stood formerly a little church, which suddenly disappeared, whether blown up or sunk in the ground by some small earthquake; in whose place there is now to be seen only a large hollow or precipice, between forty and fifty fathom deep, and about five hundred yards in

(C) We are farther told, that the converts whom St. Paul made during his abode in that island, built a little church on that spot of ground, which, by reason of its being exposed to the winds and waves, was often blown down and rebuilt. That which is now to be seen upon it was built by the famed Alof de Vignacourt, grand master of the order, anno 1606, and is a very handiome, tho' small structure. On the altar-piece is a curious piece of painting, representing the apostle's shaking off the viper, without receiving any hurt from it, and surrounded with men, women, and children, all drawn to the life, and in attitudes of admiration and surprise, and in the old Maltese garb; and the whole very well executed.

On the top of the painting is the following Latin inscription:

*Vipera ignis astra calore frustra Pauli
Manum invadit; is insulae benedicens
Anguibus & herbis adimit omne virus.
M. DC. V. (8).*

a circumference : but what the most surprising of all is, that the bottom of it is flat, and like an orchard, having sundry fruit trees, and other plants and vegetables, growing in it <sup>w</sup>.

Among the few artificial rarities, except the noble buildings and gardens above described, Artificial rarities. which are to be met with in this island, we may reckon the two marble heads in half-relief, much larger than the life, which were discovered in it anno 276, and are now seen fixed into the hinder wall of the grand master's palace; the one inscribed to Zenobia Orientalis Domina, and the other to Penthesilea. Heads of Zenobia and Penthesilea. In the church dedicated to St. Agatha is a most noble statue of that female saint in white marble, placed upon the high altar, and exquisitely wrought. St. Agatha's statue. When the Turks laid siege to the city, the superstitious inhabitants fetched it out of the church, and placed it upon the ramparts, where the saint was exposed to the continual firing of the besiegers; and whilst she was wholly employed in protecting her votaries, and unmindful of her own safety, a random shot came and carried off the little finger of her right hand, which obliged her afterwards to keep so good a look-out, that she received no further harm. This image is held in great veneration by all the Maltese, as the protectress of the city and island. But the greatest curiosity is the grotto of that saint under the church, Dreadful grotto. which runs a great way under ground. The place hath three apertures, at which the curious are let down by ropes, furnished with flambeaux and other conveniences. But they find it, upon their coming down into it, so full of turnings and windings, so intersected with other meanders, that they have not the courage to penetrate far, for fear of being bewildered and lost. What is still worse is, that the fear and terror they are in all the time hinders them from being able to make any observations, or giving any tolerable account of it; which proves such a discouragement, that few people have the curiosity or heart to go into it. They shew in their great armoury, among other curiosities, the armour, shield, &c. of some of their most famed warriors and grand masters; a cannon made of bars of iron, fastened together by a strong wire, with a very thin case of wood, and the whole covered with a thick leather, well sewed, and so curiously painted, that it looks like a real brass gun. These were at first invented for the convenience of carrying them over high rocks and mountains; but being apt to burst, or become unfit for service, have been set aside since <sup>y</sup>.

We have already taken notice of the conduit that furnishes the city of Valetta with such plenty of water; in memory of whose founder, Alof de Vignacourt, a handsome pillar is erected, about 15 feet high, with his coat of arms upon it. But the most curious of all is the fountain in the great square, and made by the grand master Lascares. It is of stone, cut in the form of a basket, which stands on a pedestal, about three feet from the ground. In the midst of it is a spire, or obelisk, about four feet high, adorned with flowers and festoons, hanging from the four angles, from the top to the bottom; and on the top of the obelisk is another basket, smaller and more neatly wrought. The water rising at the four angles of the obelisk in the first basket falls into the small one above; which being pierced through, sends it back to the lower in a great variety of streams, from which it again falls into a large stone trough, where the horses come to drink, and thence into a lower one, where dogs and other like creatures come also to quench their thirst <sup>z</sup>. This piece, and the conduit that furnishes it with water, are by Vertot stiled a work of an antient Roman †.

We hinted a little higher, that the soil of the island is either stony or sandy, dry, and mostly barren, naturally; yet it hath this good quality, even where the least pains have been taken to cultivate and enrich it, that what grows upon it is exquisite to a high degree, either for taste or flavour. The flowers and aromatic herbs yield a most odoriferous and reviving smell; the fruits a most delicate flavour and relish. Their cotton, which doth not grow here upon tall trees, as in Egypt and other parts of Asia, but upon shrubs, not above half a yard or two feet high, is reckoned the finest in the world. It must be sown every year, because it dies after it hath yielded its seed. The pods, which contain the cotton, are of the bigness of a filbert; which, when ripe, splits itself into three or four pointed leaves, whence comes out this fine soft wool; in the midst of which is found a kind of oily seed, of a whitish colour and oblong figure, whose pith tastes much like a sweet almond, or pine-kernel. The grapes, both white and red, are as large as plums, with a thick skin, and of a delicate taste, and will hang on the twigs four or five months. The wine made of them is strong and spirituous, but in small quantity, because the greatest part of them is sent to market, and eaten fresh or dried. The scarcity of fuel is such, that the olive-wood, which is brought hither from Sicily, Alicant, &c. is sold by the pound; the common sort use either dried cow-dung, or wild thistles, to dress their meat, heat their ovens, and for warmth in cold weather <sup>a</sup>.

Beasts and fowl, wild and tame.

Partridges.

Character of
the women.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great want of pasturage, and other herbage, they breed here a great quantity of sheep and goats, whose flesh is the most exquisite, as they chiefly brouse upon the aromatic plants that grow on the rocks. Here are likewise hogs in abundance, and very good asses, mules, and some horses, which are chiefly fed with barley and chaff. The tame fowl, especially hens, are very large; and those of the wild kind, particularly partridges, come from divers other countries in great flights, especially in the months of March and October, and are observed to keep the same tract as they who come from the sea-side to the city of Valetta. The chief carriage of provisions, and other commodities, through the country, is upon asses or mules, which are never shod, any more than the horses.

THE natives, both men and women, go commonly dressed in the Sicilian fashion, though not quite so genteel. The women are not tall, but yet handsome, sprightly, and witty. Shy and modest in outward appearance, yet lewd, and extremely given to jealousy and revenge. They appear in public without any scruple, but affect to wear a veil to cover, or either to discover or conceal their face, as they think proper; so that, under pretence of receiving the fresh air, or seeing their way, they will cast a wanton eye on those they like, or else pass them by with an affected air of bashfulness and fear.

THE same one may say of those of quality, who wear a veil, or kind of mantle, which covers them from head to foot; but some, that are either handsome or wanton, will manage it with such dexterity, as to display some charms to advantage; and no wonder, when they meet with so many young knights, dressed in the most gallant fashions of their respective countries, instead of that of their order; an irregularity which many of their grand masters have in vain endeavoured to suppress; and who being kept under the bonds of celibacy, are of course the more inclined to intrigue and debauchery. In the hot weather, most of the women, especially the young ones, whether of high or mean rank, wear no other cloathing than their smocks and slippers within their houses; but these are commonly so long, that they come below their ancles, and some of them wrought and flowered with silk, gold, and silver, after so costly a manner as to cost 100 or 150 crowns. But when they go abroad, they throw their long veils over them, and most commonly wear their linen drawers under them. Beneath they wear a kind of white pumps, which reach up above the ancles. They take care likewise to dress their heads with variety of ornaments, some with jewels, others with trinkets, but chiefly by the plaiting and curling of their hair in various forms, and raising it much above their foreheads. But their greatest pride, when they go abroad, is to have a handsome, or even numerous, retinue of servants and women slaves attending them; and some will even go supported by them on each side, in a stately manner, though of themselves healthy and lively enough, and generally very fruitful.

the men.

THE men are both stout and warlike, very sparing and moderate in their diet; by which, and their constant labour and exercise, they live to a great age, even above 100 or 110 most commonly; but they are extremely jealous and mistrustful, vindictive and treacherous, and for a slight injury or affront, such as calling one rogue, or, which is worst of all, cuckold, will frequently assassinate one another. Our author adds, that, upon the arrival of the order in their island, great numbers of the better sort came to meet the grand master Villiers upon his landing, who wore long and bushy beards, and a kind of petticoat about their middle, which came down below the calf of the leg, and being wrought and stitched with cotton, would defend them from the shot of an arrow*.

As for strangers, they chiefly follow the fashions of their respective countries. That of the knights, and the different badges of their respective dignities, shall be described when we come to speak of their order.

Language.

THE language of the natives, as we have already hinted, is the old Punic or Arabic, which is moreover pronounced so differently, and with such variety of accent, by every village, that those who have the least knowledge of it can guess what parish they belong to almost as soon as they open their mouths to speak. The greatest part of the country natives hardly understand any other; but those that live in cities and towns speak the French and Italian tolerably well. But that which is most in use, both in the city of Valetta and among the knights and persons of rank, is the Italian<sup>a</sup>.

Marriages.

WE do not find that they have any writing amongst them; their very contracts of marriage are made by an exchange of a handkerchief, or some such trifle, between the bride and bridegroom, before witnesses; which done, they may, and usually do, cohabit together some small time, during which the man leads his bride about the streets or lanes of the village, either to shew his complaisance for her, or to convince her that he is free from jealousy. All this is allowed even before the marriage ceremony, which is usually performed at church. And indeed their poverty is such as doth not admit of any greater formality or ceremonial. In their burials they have borrowed from the Greeks the old unnatural custom

- a of hiring women-mourners, or rather howlers, who accompany the corpse with most hideous and dismal outcries, gestures, and actions, tearing their hair, and scratching their faces, in a most dreadful manner, all the way they go. The near relations likewise shave their hair, and throw themselves upon the dead corpse, and send forth the most doleful lamentations over it. The procession is preceded by a number of persons in black, and masked (D), followed by another retinue of monks and priests, one carrying the cross before them, and the rest holding torches in their hands. These have their bodies covered with a kind of upper garment, of black serge or freeze, which reaches from head to foot, and drags a long tail behind them, or is held up by some underling. The rest of the funeral ceremony is performed much after the rites of the Greek church, and needs no farther description.
- b THE forces of the island, abstracted from the knights, and those that belong more Forces directly to their order, consist in the number of the inhabitants, among which they reckoned above 25,000 men, about the middle of the last century, all able to bear arms, robust, and well disciplined, and who are obliged, at the firing of the signal cannon three times, to appear under their proper standards, in all their martial accoutrements; in less than two hours. They commonly wore long swords and daggers, bows and arrows, lances, pikes Weapons; both long and short, which they used with great dexterity<sup>c</sup>; but since they have been under the discipline of the Maltese knights, they are become no less expert in the use of all fire-arms, and other modern weapons. They are likewise for the most part good horsemen, Horses though they make no farther use of horses than for the army, and these are bred to run with most prodigious speed, to leap over hedges and ditches with surprising ease and readiness. Of these they used to keep about 400, but probably they have much increased the number. These are reviewed at least once in six months by the grand master, or some deputy; and, the better to train both horses and riders to the martial discipline, they have races yearly in or near the city, where considerable prizes are allowed to the winners, besides their being exercised at proper seasons. But, besides which, every knight that hath four scudi or crowns per day is obliged to maintain one for his own use, and at his own charge<sup>d</sup>. The number of galleys which the order, or, as they affect to stile it, the religion (because Number of galleys they are chiefly designed for its defence, and are esteemed the bulwark of it against the Turks and Barbary pirates) furnish, is more or less, according to the exigence they are in.
- d The number of them used to be five, till Anno 1627, the grand master Paul ordered a sixth, and, Anno 1652, Lascares a seventh, to be built. These are very well and strongly built, well manned and commanded, having usually each 100 mariners and 25 knights on board; and that which is called the Capitana, and carries the standard of the order, hath most commonly 30 knights. Besides these, they have a number of galleons, and other inferior vessels; the crews of all which consist chiefly of slaves, of which they have seldom less than 2 or Slaves 3,000, whereof those who do not serve on ship-board are employed in the most laborious and lowest offices at land; and these are so constantly bought and sold every market-day, that there is no stating the number of them<sup>e</sup>. Upon the whole, whether we consider the many fortifications which have been erected from time to time, as occasion required, or the Strength vast quantity of artillery, and other warlike ammunition, with which every one is furnished, the experience and bravery of the commanders, the good discipline and constant watch that Constant watch is kept among them, joined to the advantageousness of its situation, we shall be obliged to own, that it was not without good reason that this island hath been long since distinguished by the title of Fior del Mondo, or Flower of the world. But as it is in continual danger of being surprised either by the Turks or Barbary pirates, so every place of consequence, especially along the coasts, hath its governor and proper garrison; which keeps a constant guard, and a strict patrol every night both on foot and on horseback; and, upon the and patrol least appearance, give the immediate alarm by beacons set on fire on the high grounds, The alarm how from which they are answered by the firing of the city guns; so that the alarm is spread thro' given the whole island, and every person who bears arms is got in readiness for defence, in about an hour or two, from the most considerable sea-port to the meanest and remotest village<sup>f</sup>.
- f THE traffick of the island is inconsiderable, consisting chiefly in wine and a few silks; Commerce but there is a great quantity of corn imported from Sicily, Alicant, and other places; and, when that proves insufficient, their ships sail out in quest of it, and oblige

(D) These, we suppose, belong to some of those fraternities called penitents, which are very common in all the popish countries, and appear at their funeral and other processions in a long linen habit, which covers their usual dress, and is girt about with a string or sash. Over their heads they wear a piece of the same cloth, sown in the shape of what we call an Hippocrates's sleeve, through which there are two holes cut out for them to see their way through. This dress is common to all those fraternities, they differing only in the colour of it, some being white, others blue or red, but most generally of the black hue. All these commonly assist at the funeral of a brother or a sister, that is, of one of the fraternity, in their respective dresses, and are buried in it when they die.

as many vessels as they meet with, which are laden with it, to part with it at the a price that they would have sold it for at the port to which they were bound. As for the Turkish and Barbary corsairs which fall into their hands, they are sure to be made prizes of, and the whole cargo seized, whether laden with corn or any other merchandize, and all the people in the ship are made slaves; and, as they are seldom without having many such vessels cruising on that sea, so we may look upon these captures to be one of the most profitable branches of their commerce; for it is by this means that they are able to furnish Sicily, and other parts of the Levant, with spices, sugar, and other the like commodities, in return for which they bring back grain, pulse, flesh both fresh and salted, wood, oil, silks, and other necessaries. But the chief profit of these goes to the order, the native inhabitants having no other share of it than by the exchange they make of them, with the b produce of their own lands and industry; insomuch that, excepting some few of them, not above ten or twelve in Bosio's time were worth above 200 or 600 crowns by the traffick they carried on of their cotton and cummin seed; the rest, as we have already hinted, were very poor, and it is scarcely to be supposed have been suffered to grow richer since that time<sup>c</sup>.

The people very poor.

THE money coined here is inconsiderable, it being with some difficulty that the emperor Charles V. allowed them that privilege. It chiefly consists of silver and copper pieces of low value. The smallest of the latter metal are called Piccioli, six of which make a graino, or grain, ten of these make a Carlino, two of which make a Tarino. The Tarini are either of copper or silver, and amount to about  $4\frac{1}{2}$  d. French money. They have some pieces of money of brass worth four Tarini each, but pass no-where but in the island, and are cast merely to preserve the silver coin for foreign traffick. The Scudi, or Maltese crowns, are reckoned worth about 54 pence of French money. They coin likewise sequins, which are worth about 16 Tarini; but, besides these, they have variety of foreign coin, such as Venetian and Turkish sequins, which are worth 18 Tarini; the Spanish pistole, which is worth sometimes 33 and sometimes 34, as their value alters in other countries. They make use likewise of the Spanish dollars, Talers which pass commonly for 10 Tarini, but these must pass through the master of the mint's hands, and have his mark stamped upon them<sup>d</sup>.

Foreign coin current.

Government Grandmasters.

Their rank and dignity.

THE grand master, who is always chosen with great caution and ceremony by the chapter of order, as we shall see in its proper place, hath the whole revenue of the island, as well d as of the small and inconsiderable one of Gosa adjoining to it, of which more hereafter, over both of which, at his election, he is invested with the sovereign power during his life, by the grant which the emperor Charles V. the then proprietor of it, gave to the first of them at his investiture of those islands; so that they have held ever since the title of sovereign princes, and are next in rank to the imperial and regal dignity, and take place of all other sovereign princes, and even of the Romish cardinals, and send and receive ambassadors like other crowned heads<sup>e</sup>. To these the popes added some other privileges, besides confirming the foregoing; so that when one of them comes to Rome, he is intitled to the nearest place to his holiness, whether in the church, chapel, or other place, and, in a cavalcade, to ride immediately before him, and alone<sup>f</sup> (E); for, long before their being possessed of this island, a grand master of the order was looked upon as the most powerful of all the Christian princes of the east<sup>1</sup>.

Revenues.

HIS revenues, arising not only from a certain tax upon the island, and that of Gosa, including with it the duties on salt goods imported and exported, and such like imposts, were computed by Bosio to amount to about 10,000 crowns, one year with another: and he says, that the emperor Charles V. hardly received more from thence than 47 ducats per Ann. But, besides these, the order allows him the like sum for the entertainment of his table, the right of admiralty upon all prizes, at the rate of 10 per Cent. as well upon merchandizes as

(E) We have, upon this point, the judgment of the great lawyer Chassane, who in his treatise De Gloria Mundi, speaking concerning ecclesiastical dignities, expresses himself, with great respect to the grand master, in these words:

(9) Ap. Vertot. lib. xii. sub. an. 1559. vol. iv. p. 349.

Accordingly, when he was, among other Christian princes, invited to the council of Trent, and had sent thither two of his order as his ambassadors to that grand assembly, one of whom, by reason of his extreme old age and infirmities, could not reach it, the other, named Royas, coming to challenge his rank according to that of his principal, was at first strenuously opposed by the whole body of bishops, who thought it a lessening to their dignity to give place to a simple monastic, sent thither as deputy from a mere fraternity of his brethren, for so they termed him. They were however obliged to submit to it, and he was allowed to sit among the other ambassadors according to the rank formerly assigned and settled by the pope (10).

slaves,

- a slaves, gain arising from the vacant commanderies and priories, formerly common to the order, but since appropriated to him, together with some other perquisites annexed to the dignity, of which we shall speak more particularly in the sequel, were computed, in the whole, at about 40,000 more; in all, communibus annis, about 60,000 crowns<sup>m</sup>. With all this great income, and pre-eminent rank, he assumed no higher title in all his letters, &c. Humble titles; than that of The humble servant of the sacred house of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, and of the military order of the knights of the sepulchre of our Lord, and defender of the poor Christians (F). Nevertheless he is addressed by all with that of grand master of the order of St. John of Jerusalem, prince of Malta and Gosa, &c. But they soon after became fond enough exchanged for higher of the latter to prefer it to the former; and we find one of them accordingly, named Paul Lasfcaris, assuming it at the beginning of his letter to the states general, for the restitution of those lands which they had alienated from the order<sup>n</sup>.

His state is still greater than his title, he sitting always under a canopy, whether in the Grand plate church, general assembly, or even at his table, at which last none are permitted to sit with him but the knights of the highest rank, or of the great cross, and these only upon stools or chairs without backs, and where his meat is served in by twelve pages of noble families. He hath likewise his high steward, and carver to taste his meat, and his cup-bearer to do the same by his drink<sup>o</sup>. He can never be deposed from his dignity without the pope's consent, nor can any one decide any dispute or controversy between him and his knights but his holiness. Other things relating to his power, dignity, election, &c. will be best seen when we come to speak of the order in general in the next section. At present we have only considered him as sovereign prince of Malta and Gosa, of which last island we shall now give a short description before we proceed farther.

- THIS small island, called by the inhabitants Gaudish (G), and by the Italians Gosa, is The island of Gosa described parted from that of Malta by a narrow chanel of about a league and a half, or two leagues, on the north-west side of it. Its length is about three leagues, and breadth one and a half, and compass about eight, and is surrounded with steep rocks and shelves, and of difficult access on all sides. It hath neither town nor village, but only a few scattered hamlets, in which there might be about 5000 souls, men, women, and children, who, to secure Its inhabitants their possessions from swarming corsairs, had made a shift to erect a small fort upon a high rock, but which the Maltese commissaries, who were sent to take a view of the island, found to be so ill built, that it hardly deserved that name.

- THE ground is mountainous and rugged, yet fertile, and so well cultivated, that it not only supplies its own inhabitants with plenty of corn, fruits, and other products, but sends some quantities of them to those of Malta<sup>p</sup>. The chief villages, or hamlets rather, are called Scilendi Dower, and Muggiari, and these breed great numbers of sheep and goats. The island breeds likewise abundance of hares, rabbits, bees, and fowl. Near it, towards the Barbary coasts, stands a high steep rock, on which they catch some of the best falcons, a small number of which are sent to the king of Spain every year by the grand master, as a kind of homage or acknowledgement they are obliged to pay to that monarch, in consequence of the grant made to them of these two islands by the emperor Charles V. The grand masters afterwards much improved its fortifications, especially after it had been Strength treacherously betrayed to the Turkish admiral by its governor, and retaken by the Maltese. The former, upon their seizing and plundering it, found in it above seven thousand souls; which shews how much it had improved under the latter. And the grand master Vignacourt, knowing of what consequence it was to prevent the Turks ever becoming masters of it, put it into such a condition of defence, that all the attempts that have been made since upon it have proved ineffectual. The castle, which, by reason of its high situation, commands the whole island, was surrounded with a stout bastion, and some other works, and well provided with artillery, and all kinds of warlike ammunition and provisions, and the garrison sufficiently reinforced.

THE governor, who is sent thither every three years from Malta, commonly resides in the fort, and there has been since a small town built at the foot of the hill on which it

(F) Thus the deed granted by the grand master Foulkes de Villaret, dated from Rhodes, October 17, 1312, ran in these terms, Brother Foulkes de Villaret, by the grace of God, and of the holy apostolical see, humble master of the house and hospital of St. John of Jerusalem, and guardian of the poor belonging to Jesus Christ (11).

(G) This island, from its old name, situation, and other characteristics, is rightly enough supposed to be the same with the Gaulos of Pliny and Mela, the Gaudos of Strabo, the Glaucon of Ptolemy, and the Fulacron of the Latin Itinerarium Marimum (12). The name of Gaudish is of Arabic extract, and we still find it named Guadosh by some Arabic authors, which was in all likelihood given to it by that nation when they had it in their possession (13).

stands. The inhabitants of the island speak the same Arabesk, and follow the same customs, with those of Maltha. They are stout and long-lived, the air being very clear and healthy, and the fresh springs and fountains in great number, and yielding excellent water. They are all of the church of Rome here as well as at Maltha<sup>a</sup>.

BETWEEN the islands of Maltha and Gofa lie the small ones of Comin and Cominot, the former of which is supposed to be the Hephestia or isle of Vulcan of the antients<sup>b</sup>, and is likewise under the government and protection of the grand master. They were formerly uninhabited; but, by the care of the famed Vignacourt, a fort having been built upon each of them for their safety, they are now pretty well inhabited; and that of Comin, which is about four or five miles in circuit, breeds a large quantity of cattle, and other animals of all sorts<sup>c</sup>. That of Lampedosa, called by Ptolemy Lipadusa, lies about 25 or 30 leagues west-south-west of Maltha, in latitude 34°, about 70 or 80 from the continent. It is altogether uncultivated and uninhabited, but hath the ruins of a castle, towers, houses, &c. The reason of its being abandoned is absurdly ascribed by some to spectres and phantoms that haunt it, by others to its unwholesome air, which causes frightful dreams and visions<sup>d</sup>.

HOWEVER, it is certain, that there is a church or chapel in it dedicated to the Virgin Mary, and divided into two parts, the one frequented by Christians, and the other by Mohammedans, both of whom, from a zeal of religion, come to pay their devotions and free-will offerings, which they leave behind in their respective partitions, no part of which is ever touched, much less carried off, by any of those votaries, there being a notion or tradition, that whosoever attempts it can never stir out of the place; so that the knights of Maltha, who lay claim to the place, come in their galleys at certain times, and carry away the offerings made by the Christians, and apply them to the support of the hospital of Trapani in Sicily, called Nunicata, for the benefit of the sick poor, or convey it to their own island<sup>e</sup>. How that which is offered by the Turks is disposed of, we are not told; but we may safely believe they are no less charitable in the use of it than the Maltese knights. This island, to which Mr. Baudrand gives about 16 miles of circumference, became more known since the dreadful shipwreck of the fleet of the emperor Charles V. on its coasts, Anno 1552.

Antient state of Maltha.

Taken by the
earl of Sicily.

WE have already hinted in the last section, that this island was given to this order of knights by the emperor Charles V. in lieu of that of Rhodes, out of which they had been driven by the Turks. But that nothing may be omitted in this modern, which had been overlooked in the antient history, it will not be amiss to say something of its antient state, before they became masters of it. According to an antient tradition, it had been under the dominion of an African prince named Battus, an enemy to queen Dido, from which it passed under that of the Carthaginians, as we may rightly infer from sundry Punic inscriptions to be seen on stone pillars, and other monuments, still standing. From these it passed to the Romans, who made themselves masters of it at the same time that they subdued the island of Sicily. These were driven out by the Arabs in the year 828; who were driven out of it in their turn by Roger the Norman, earl of Sicily, who took possession of it Anno 1190; from which time it continued under the dominion of the kings of Sicily<sup>a</sup>, and thence fell into that of the emperor Charles V. above-mentioned, by his conquest of Naples and Sicily, as has been formerly shewn in the histories of those several kingdoms.

In the mean time, as the knights (to whom it was granted by that wise and politic monarch, as much with a view to preserve his Italian dominions by this means, as for the defence of the Christian church against the overgrown power of the Turkish monarchs) had already signalized themselves during several centuries, against those sworn enemies of Christianity, and, like a second race of warlike and zealous Maccabees, were become no less famous for their singular piety and zeal, than for their surprising bravery and success, under the different names of knights hospitallers, knights of St. John, of Rhodes, &c. it will be very proper to trace their original up to the fountain's head, in order to give our readers a clearer idea of the design, origin, institution, progress, and excellency, of that so justly a famed order; and of that invincible courage which they displayed during so many centuries, in defence of Christianity<sup>c</sup>.

WE have shewn, in the antient history, to what a dreadful and distressed condition the city of Jerusalem had been reduced under the tyrannical government of the implacable Saracens<sup>d</sup>, after it had undergone so many disasters under the Isaurians and Persians<sup>e</sup>. In that last, however, the Christians had been treated with more tenderness than the rest by the Khalif Aaron, on account of the good understanding which subsisted between the emperor Charles the Great and him. But, after the death of that Khalif, they underwent a much severer treatment than before, occasioned by the discords which arose between the Mohammedan princes of Persia and Egypt, under whose respective dominions the country of Palestine, commonly called Holy Land, had often been shifted. The latter at length remaining masters of that province, the Christians again were treated with humanity and gentleness, till the reign of Khalif Equen, who, though born of a Christian mother, made it his study to persecute them with more uncommon cruelty, as he thought thereby to take off all suspicion of his being in the least degree inclined to their religion. Amongst other marks of his hatred, he caused the church of St. Sepulchre to be demolished, which, as we have already shewn, continued 37 years in a ruinous state, till rebuilt by the emperor Monomachus, at his own charges, Anno 1048, and with the consent of the then Khalif Bomensar. Origin of the knights hospitallers at Jerusalem.

ABOUT the same time, some Italian gentlemen and merchants, who had been witnesses of the ill treatment of the Christian pilgrims, not only from the Mohammedans, but likewise from the Greeks, who were by this time no less disaffected to them, undertook to procure them a sure asylum in the city of Jerusalem, where they should be wholly free from the insults of both. These Italians, who were natives of Amalphy, a city in the kingdom of Naples, but still subject to the Greek emperors of Constantinople, sailed frequently to the seaports of Syria and Egypt, whither they brought, among other merchandizes of value, some curious pieces of work from Europe, which were greatly admired, and quickly bought; by which means they easily introduced themselves into the Khalif Monstazer Billah's court; from whom, by dint of presents, they obtained a permission to build a house, or hospital, at Jerusalem, near the holy sepulchre, for the entertainment and safety of such Christian pilgrims, together with a church, where they might have divine service performed after the rites of their own church; the holy sepulchre then building being of the Greek rite. The governor of the city, according to his orders, immediately assigned them a spot of ground, and a chapel was soon built, which they called Sancta Maria of the Latin, to distinguish it from those of the Greek church; and adjoining to it an hospital, or convent, for the reception of all Latin pilgrims of either sex, whether healthy or sick, according to their first design. In conformity to which, the two others, that were afterwards erected for the same use, had likewise each its proper chapel, the one dedicated to St. John the Almoner, or hospitable, and the other to Mary Magdalen<sup>h</sup>. Christians cruelly persecuted.

THE first of these had not long been built, before there came a good number of zealous persons from Europe, who dedicated themselves wholly to that charitable work, whilst the monks of the order of St. Bennet officiated in the chapel, and both they and the pilgrims were supported by the alms which were collected for that end in Italy and other parts of Europe, and were constantly remitted thither every year; and from this house arose the order of St. John, we are going to speak of, which proved in time the bulwark of Christianity. In this hospitable place, the Christians of the Latin church were received and maintained, without distinction of nation or condition. Those who had been stripped by robbers, were supplied with new cloaths, and the sick, lame, and all that laboured under any affliction or misery, were sure to meet with a suitable relief from this new kind of charity, till the city was surpris'd, and almost totally destroyed, by the Turks, or Turcomans, of whom we have formerly given an account, and the whole garrison of the Egyptian Khalif cut in pieces by them. This disaster, which happened in less than seventeen years after the building of this hospital, put a stop to all future pilgrimages for a time, on account of the dreadful havock which those greedy barbarians made among them, besides their having plundered the hospital of every thing valuable; and probably would have done the same by the great church of the Sepulchre, had not the fear of losing the yearly income, which they raised on the western pilgrims, deterred them from it. In this dreadful condition were the affairs of the Holy Land, till the complaints which came continually from thence, heightened by the shrill sound of Peter the Hermit's trumpet, stirred up the zeal of all the Christian princes to attempt the rescue of those sacred places out of the hands of those merciless infidels; and gave birth to the crusado, of which an ample account hath been given elsewhere<sup>i</sup>, and to which our readers are referred, to avoid repetitions. Pilgrims resort to it.

MOD. HIST. VOL. VII.

To return therefore, to our forlorn hospital of St. John: the Khalif of Egypt, who had taken the advantage of the defeats which the Turks had received from the Christian crusaders, and retaken the city of Jerusalem from them, being justly afraid of, as well as threatened by, the Christians, whom his breach of promise had greatly exasperated, of being driven out from it, had taken care to send about 40,000 regular troops into it, besides the 20,000 Mohammedans that were already in it, whom he had obliged to take up arms against all adventurers, whilst the governor was ordered to imprison by degrees all the Christians he was suspicious of.

Gerard founds
the monks hof-
pitallers there.

AMONG these was the celebrated Gerard, a Frenchman of Provence<sup>m</sup>, who from the time that he came to visit the places of that city, had dedicated himself to the service of the hospital of St. John, and, for his singular piety, and tenderness to the pilgrims, had the care and management of that house committed to him, under the title of administrator. At the same time a Roman lady, named Agnes, a person of no less merit, took care of those of her own sex; and these two extended their charity not only to all pilgrims, but even to the Infidels who came thither for any relief; but much more so after the city was taken by the Christians, by whom he was set at liberty, and had the singular pleasure to see it enriched by the greatest donatives, and endowed with lands to a very great value; and the number of male and female hospitallers greatly augmented; and then it was that he formed the design, in conjunction with the lady Agnes, to persuade all, or as many of those devout brothers and sisters as were willing to renounce the world, and enter into a monastic life; and framed the rules of their order, which he soon after got to be approved and confirmed by pope Paschal II. who took them under his protection, granted them sundry great privileges, and appointed him rector of the hospital during his life; with an injunction, that, after his death, the brotherhood should proceed to the election of a new governor, under the same title of rector. Hence it is that some authors have reckoned him the first master of the order<sup>o</sup>, though he was only the founder of it, and that title is given by all the knights only to his successor Raymond, according to the tradition which hath been generally received among them. However that be, the good old Gerard lived to a great age, highly revered by all Christians, and no less regretted at his death. The principal rules, dress, and other particulars, of this new order, the reader will find in the margin (H), as they were afterwards confirmed and improved by his worthy successor*.

(H) The good old Gerard, in the first institution of this order of hospitallers, had contented himself, it seems, with leaving them some few rules, or injunctions, such as, with the help of his good example, might inspire the fraternity with the deepest sentiments of charity and humility towards all, not only the Christian pilgrims, sick persons, and others more immediately under their care, but likewise towards all others, Turks and infidels not excepted. The dress he prescribed to them was black and plain, distinguished only with a white cross upon the breast. The lady Agnes being appointed prioress over the sisterhood, admitted the same dress among them; and both were, with the approbation of the pope, and patriarch of Jerusalem, installed into the order of St. Augustine, and bound themselves under the same vows (14); and these were all the rules that founder gave them.

But his successor was no sooner chosen in his place, than he perceived the necessity of adding some particular statutes, such as might not only render them useful to religion by the charitable entertainment of the Christian pilgrims, but likewise by freeing the roads from the banditti which infested them, and from the insults of the infidels, and to oblige them to take up arms upon all occasions, they should thenceforth be called to by their superiors, against the enemies of Christianity, by which they might become as it were a perpetual crusade, and a military corps to fight in defence of it, under the direction and standards of the kings of Jerusalem, without however exempting them from their religious vows, and the other duties of hospitality (15).

There was the greater necessity for such a military order at this time, as the roads through that small new kingdom, which consisted only of the capital city and three or four more, were so infested both by Turks and Saracens, that there was no travelling from one place to another without the greatest danger of being massacred by those implacable enemies. The boroughs and villages were still more exposed to their cruelty, and wanted such brave intrepid men to scour and rid the country of them. And, if what some authors say can be depended upon (16), those monkish and other Christians that attended the three hospitals during the siege of that city, had found means to keep a correspondence with the besiegers; by which means, and the extraordinary conduct and bravery which they shewed on that occasion, they greatly contributed to the surrender of it; upon which account it was that Godfrey the new-made king bestowed such large revenues and privileges to those hospitals; and it is not at all improbable, that Raymond, who had been an eye-witness of their singular behaviour, and in all likelihood bore himself a part of it, might take the first hint of joining the military to the religious discipline, and of fashioning this new order with that twofold view, and rendering them thereby equally useful to two such valuable and necessary ends.

- a the order<sup>9</sup>. This excellent man, though he saw himself at the head of such a numerous fraternity, could not forbear being sensibly touched with the distress and variety of dangers and miseries which the Christians of Palestine laboured under. Vast numbers of them groaning under a rigorous slavery under the Turks and Saracens of Egypt; their few cities in continual danger of being retaken from them, and made to feel the most dreadful effects of war; the towns and villages exposed to the continual incursions of their implacable enemies; their wives and daughters carried off and sacrificed to their brutish lust; many of their men forced to apostatize, to avoid death, or a worse slavery than death; the roads so infested by infidel banditti, as rendered all commerce and communication extremely hazardous: these, and other considerations of the like discouraging nature, and hinted at in the last note, wholly
- b engrossed his thoughts and cares from the very moment that he was raised to his new dignity. He set them forth at last in the most pathetic terms before the whole chapter; after which he proposed to them the project he had formed of constituting them into a military order, and obliging them to give themselves equally to the exercise of arms, as they did to the duties of hospitality and religion, as the most effectual means of supporting it with honour and safety against the insults and attempts of their surrounding enemies, especially as they were by that time become rich enough to hire secular troops to their assistance, and to fight under their command; a thing no less worthy of their high rank and birth than their present engagement and zeal for the defence of the Christian faith. The reputation he bore among them made them all look upon this proposal as a fresh mark of his care and concern
- c for the common faith, and for their honour and safety; but, on second thoughts, they began to doubt whether such a profession could be compatible with their old one. At length their zeal for the defence of the Holy Land easily over-ruled all these difficulties; and as the greatest part of them had fought under their new king, they were easily prevailed upon to resume their martial employment; for which the patriarch of Jerusalem granted them a dispensation, upon condition, however, that they should never bear arms against any but infidels<sup>9</sup>.

new rules for rendering the order military.

- From this time, we are told, the order began to be divided into three classes; in the first of which were admitted those who, either by the nobility of their birth, or the rank they had formerly held in the army, were best qualified and intitled to fight in defence of religion, and of the Holy Land. The second class consisted of such as had exercised the sacerdotal function, either as parish priests, chaplains, &c. These, besides their usual attendance at church, or upon the sick, were obliged to take their turns to attend the army as almoners and chaplains. The third class consisted of such only as were neither of noble descent nor in holy orders, who were therefore stiled serving brethren, and appointed either to attend the sick and wounded, or in such other inferior offices as the knights of the first class should think proper to employ them in. These last were, in process of time, distinguished by a coat of arms different from the knights of the first and second class. Some authors tell us, that Raymond, and not Gerard, was the first who gave the order the black gown or mantle, with the white linen cross, with eight points, and appointed the
- d form and ceremonial of receiving the knights into it, and the oath they were to take at their admission; all which the reader will find in the margin (I). However that be, he got his

(I) The candidate for the order is to appear before the high altar, with a lighted wax-candle in his hand, in a long gown, ungirt, in token of his being free, and, kneeling down, begs to be admitted; upon which a gilt sword is put into his hands, with the words, In the name of the Father, Son, &c. in token that he is to defend the church, subdue her enemies, and hazard his life for the Christian faith.

A girdle is put about his loins, in token of his being from thenceforth bound to keep the vows of the order. He waves the gilt sword over his head, in defiance of the enemies of the Christian faith, sheaths it up, after having first passed it under his arm to wipe it clean, in token that he will keep himself clean from all vice: upon which the person, who admits him, puts his hand upon his shoulder, and forewarns him not to indulge, or be lulled asleep in, vice, and exhorts him to be watchful against it, to be careful of his honour, and ready to perform all good works and good offices.

This done, they put a pair of gilt spurs on his ancles, in token that he shall be emulous of all laudable actions, and trample gold and all worldly wealth under his feet, and not suffer himself to be corrupted by them.

He then takes up the lighted candle in his hand, and holds it all the time that mass is said or sung, and a sermon is preached suitable to the occasion; in which all works of piety, charity, and hospitality, particularly the redemption of Christian slaves, are earnestly recommended to him, together with the other duties of the order; such as obedience to his superiors, diligence in the functions of his profession, &c.

Sermon being ended, he is asked whether he is loaded with any considerable debts, married, or under a promise of marriage, or any-ways engaged to live under any other order or profession, or is sincerely desirous to be received into the order of St. John; and when he hath answered satisfactorily to all these questions, he is immediately received and admitted into the fraternity.

He is then led to the high altar, holding the missal, or mass-book, in his hand, and there makes his solemn vows upon it; after which he becomes intitled to all the rule confirmed by pope Calistus II. and some of his successors, and ordered the white cross upon a red field to be displayed upon the standard of the order, with the approbation of pope Innocent about ten years after; from which time the order was distinguished into three classes above-mentioned, of Knights, Chaplains, and Serving Brethren, of the hospital of St. John of Jerusalem. He and his knights highly signalized themselves at the sieges of Acra, Ptolemais, Barut, Tyre, and Sidon, and last of all at that of Ascalon; in consideration of which signal service, pope Anastasius IV. granted the order an exemption from the jurisdiction of any eastern prelates.

The order divided into eight tongues

By this time the order had gained such esteem and reputation, and was so highly honoured and encouraged by all the princes and great men through all christendom, that many of the young nobility of Europe were emulous to come and serve under its banner. This obliged the master of it to make a farther division of it, answerable to the principal nations that were admitted into it, which were eight in number, as they were, and are still, stiled tongues; and were those that follow:

That of Provence.

1. THE first is that of Provence, which probably had the precedence, out of regard to Gerard, the pious founder; and to which is annexed the dignities of the grand commander, the grand prior of St. Giles, the grand prior of Toulouse, and bailiff of Monsque. The priory of Toulouse hath thirty-five, and that of St. Giles fifty-four, commanderies belonging to them.

Auvergne.

2. THE second is that of Auvergne, to which is annexed the dignity of grand marshal of the order, the grand prior of Auvergne, under which are four commanderies of knights, and eight of serving brethren, and the bailiff of Curent, now the bailiff of Lyons.

France.

3. THAT of France, which hath the dignities of the grand hospitaller, the grand prior of France, with 45 commanderies under him, the prior of Aquitain, with 65, the prior of Champagne, with 25, besides the bailiff of Morea, and the grand treasurer.

Italy.

4. THAT of Italy, to which is annexed the office of grand admiral of the order of Rome, whose jurisdiction extends itself over nineteen commanderies; that of prior of Lombardy, which hath 45; the prior of Venice, with those of Barletta and Capua, who have 25 between them; that of Pisa, which hath 26; and that of Messina, which hath 12 more; besides the bailiff of St. Euphemia, of St. Stephen de Monopoli, of the Holy Trinity at Venice, and of St. John at Naples.

Arragon.

5. THAT of Arragon, including that of Arragon and those of Catalonia and Navarre, to which belong the dignity of grand protector of the order, that of grand prior of Arragon,

the privileges granted to that order by the see of Rome. He is then reminded, that he must repeat every day fifty Pater Nosters and Ave Mary's, the office of our lady, that for the dead, together with another number of Pater Nosters for the souls of the deceased knights; and is shewn the habit which the knights are obliged to wear.

Whilst they are dressing him in it, a certain suitable memento is given to him, such as, in putting on the sleeves, that he is now bound to obedience; the white cross on the left side is to remind him, that he ought to be ready, on all occasions, to shed his blood for Christ, who shed his own for him; and the eight points of the cross, of the eight beatitudes, that will be the reward of his obedience. The black cloak, which is sharp-pointed behind, and hath a kind of sharp cowl or cape, is to remind him of the camels hair-coat which their patron John the Baptist wore; and the strings by which it is tied about the neck, and fastened under the shoulders, of the passion of our blessed Lord, and the singular patience and meekness with which he underwent it.—But this cloak is only worn on solemn days, or when sentence is pronounced upon a criminal of the order, or at the interment of a brother.

They likewise wear another cross upon their breasts, and hanging by a black and white silk string, that goes about the neck, and the ends reach down to the feet: for that which is called the great cross, and distinguishes the wearers of it by the title of Knights of the great cross, is only allowed to those who have lived ten years in the island of Malta, and have performed four caravans or expeditions at sea, in the galleys of the order; and those, who are thus intitled, are obliged to petition for it, and make up their title to it, before the great council of the order, before it can be granted to them. And thus much may serve with respect to their particular dress: to which we shall only add, that those knights, who go to war, are allowed what they call a supravest, or upper coat, of a red colour, with a white cross, but plain, and without the eight points.

The public profession they make at the altar, at their admission, is to this purpose: “ I A. B. do here “ vow and promise to almighty God, to the blessed “ virgin Mary, and to St. John the Baptist, and with “ the blessing and help of God, to pay true and sincere obedience to the superior he shall appoint over “ me, and who shall be duly chosen by our religion, “ to renounce all property, and to live in constant “ chastity.” After which, as he withdraws his hand from the book, the person who officiates at his admittance, says to him, “ We receive and own you as “ a servant of messieurs the poor and the sick, and “ consecrated to the defence of the catholic church.” To which he replies, “ I acknowledge myself as such.” As for their form of prayers, their devotional offices, and other particularities, which we have not time to dwell upon, the curious may see them in the authors quoted in the margin (17).

a alias castellan of the imposts, who presides over 19 commanderies, that of Navarre over 17, and that of Catalonia over 17, together with the bailiff of Majorca. It had formerly the bailiwick of Caps, or Capez, in Barbary, whilst the Christians were masters of Tripoli; but is now abolished.

6. THE sixth was that of England, to which belonged the dignity of turcopelier (K), or colonel-general of the infantry, together with the priories of England and Ireland, with 32 commanderies under them, together with the bailiwick of the Eagle; all which have been abolished since the reformation, and their revenues turned into another chanel.

7. THE seventh is that of Germany, where the grand bailiff and prior of Germany reside; Germany. the latter of whom is a prince of the empire, and hath under him, in Highb and Low Germany, b 67 commanderies; but those that are situated within the United Provinces have been long since likewise dismembered from the order.

8. THE eighth and last is that of Castile, including the kingdoms of Leon and Portugal. Castile. To this is affixed the dignity of grand chancellor of the order, with the priories of Castile and Leon, which have 27 commanderies, and that of Portugal 31, together with the bailiwick of Bovedo. As for that of Negropont, it is in common between the tongues of Castile and Arragon.

THIS division is still subsisting in the same form, excepting only that this last tongue of How far this division still Castile and Arragon were substituted to that of England; and that those commanderies, priories, and bailiwicks, were at first affixed to the whole order in general, but have been since appropriated to the several tongues in the number and manner above-mentioned (L).

c By this time the whole order was grown so very numerous, powerful, and wealthy, and brought under such excellent regulations and discipline (M), that when the grand master

(K) This title hath its origin from the Turcomans, who commonly called their light horse Turcoples; that being a name given in general to all the children that were born of a Turkish father and a Greek mother, but more particularly to such of them as were designed for the war (18).

It became afterwards a military dignity in the kingdom of Cyprus (19), from whence it passed into the order of Malta. But these gave that title only to the colonel general of their infantry. After the reformation, that dignity was joined to the grand master of the order by pope Gregory XIII. and given to Hugh de Loubaux de Verdatte, upon his confirming his election to that sovereign station, A. D. 1582 (20).

(L) It will not be amiss to explain the import and meaning of those three dignities.

We have already hinted, that the order chiefly subsisted upon the funds and donatives which were bestowed upon it by crowned heads and other great persons, and by wills and testaments of pious men, in most parts of Europe. This made it necessary for them to appoint proper officers from among themselves to reside near those parts, to take care of those revenues, and to convey them to the hospital of St. John, where they were appropriated by the grand master and chapter of the order to their proper use; viz. 1. for the maintenance of the hospital, that is, the knights, chaplains, and serving brethren, the pilgrims that come to visit the holy places, the poor, sick, wounded, maimed, and to defray all other charges of the hospital, the church of St. Sepulchre, &c.

2. To procure arms, ammunition, and other warlike necessities, for the guarding of the roads and country against the incursions of the Mohammedans, escorting the pilgrims to and from Jerusalem, and other services of religion.

And, 3dly, to buy, arm, and man, galleys, to scour the seas of pirates, in order to secure the commerce and pilgrimages to and from the Holy Land.

Those knights, therefore, that were appointed in the several parts of christendom, to take care of the revenues, were called commanders, from the tenor of their commission from the grand chapter, in the terms following: Commendamus, &c. We commit to your care such and such lands, &c. in such kingdom, province, &c. from which these kind of administrations or commissions took the name of Commendataria, and the houses or communities, where those administrators resided, were called commanderies, and the principals of them commanders; which last were not so during life, but durante bene placito, or quamdiu se bene gesserint (21).

But as these commanderies were found too often guilty of injustice, in appropriating too great a share of the revenue to their own use, by which the lesser quantity could be spared by them for the maintenance of the order, they were afterwards put under the care and visitation of superior officers, appointed by the chapter, and styled priors, who were to visit and inspect a certain number of those commanderies committed to their care, and to become answerable for the right application of the revenue; from which their commissions took the name of responsiones, and they of responsores, who were thereby engaged to transmit to Jerusalem, either in money, arms, &c. the just and true quotas of each commandery, in conformity to the decrees and ordinances of the general chapter.

The bailiff and bailiwicks were only inferior sorts of commanders, who farmed the lands from the commanders, and were answerable to them for the rent and income of them. Of those bailiffs some were called conventuals; that is, resided in some of the convents belonging to the commandery, and had the care of a certain quantity of lands, and paid the income thereof to the commander, and had a stipend assigned to them of 60 crowns per annum for their maintenance, by the grand master Lassie (22). We say nothing here of the grand bailiff of Germany, which was a dignity of another and much higher nature; of which we may have occasion to speak in the sequel of this history.

(M) We may guess at the excellency of their discipline by one of their statutes, which passed in his time, with the approbation of the general chapter, as well as that of the patriarch of Jerusalem, his spiritual superior; by which every knight, who forsook his rank, gave way, or ran away, in fight, was to be ipso facto deprived of his cross, gown, and knighthood; which was such a terror to them, that they all fought with the utmost ardor and unexampled intrepidity to the last moment, both at sea and land; of which we shall give the most pregnant instances in the sequel of their history.

Raymond offers his service to Baldwin.

Raymond Dupuy, who had now nothing more at heart than to render it more and more useful to religion, came to Jerusalem, to offer his and their services to young Baudouin Du Bourg, now king of Jerusalem, who was then in the extremest want of it, and had obtained the patriarch's approbation and blessing upon his generous design; he was looked upon by all as a person sent from heaven to their assistance, and his military corps as an invincible bulwark against the enemies of Christianity. They were not deceived; and the services which he and his knights did to the young king, both at Jerusalem and in other parts of the Holy Land, were so great and signal, that pope Innocent II. in the bull of immunity which he granted to that order, makes special mention of them: and that all Europe rang of them: which shews, by-the-by, that they began to signalize themselves in that religious war much earlier than our historians have taken notice of; since the bull, as we hinted a little higher, bears date 1130; that is twelve years after Raymond's installation, and the creation of this new military order. But as all these transactions have been already related in our account of that holy war, we shall refer our readers to it<sup>w</sup>.

2. Auger de Balben.

In the mean time, Raymond Dupuy, who assisted at most of them, and was quite worn out with age, fatigues, and wounds, thought fit to retire to his own hospital of St. John, where he might be more at leisure to employ the short remainder of his life in preparing himself for a better; and, having governed that order near 42 years, expired in the midst of his brethren, in the 80th year of his age, greatly lamented by them, and by all Christendom<sup>x</sup>, and with the just character of the most pious and greatest commander of that age.

He was succeeded by Auger de Balben, by the unanimous choice of the chapter. He was of the same country of Dauphiny with his noble predecessor, and had been his constant companion in his military exploits, as well as one of his most intimate counsellors. Soon after his election, he was summoned to the synod held at the city of Nazareth, on account of the schism which had broke out in the church between pope Alexander III. and the antipope Victor III. and their partisans; and, by his extraordinary wisdom and address, greatly contributed to persuade the king, patriarch, and bishops, to declare for the former as the most duly elected, and to excommunicate the latter. He was no less successful in putting an end to the famous quarrel which happened in the year after, about the succession to the crown of Jerusalem, after the untimely death of Baldwin III. by representing to the contending parties the inevitable danger of their untimely discord. He survived but a few months the coronation of the new king, at which he assisted, being quite worn out with age, and died in the third year of his government<sup>z</sup>.

3. Arnould de Comps.

He was succeeded by Arnould de Comps, a gentleman likewise of a very ancient and noble family in Dauphiny, and much advanced in years, who, nevertheless, was no sooner chosen to that dignity than he saw himself obliged to march, at the head of his knights, towards the frontiers of the kingdom, and suppress the incursions of Soltan Adbed, who, scorning to continue the tribute which his predecessor had engaged to pay to Baldwin III. was now ravaging all the frontiers of Judea, at the head of a numerous army of Saracens. He gained a great deal of glory in this expedition, by his quick and singular success. He died in the 4th year of his government; and was succeeded by

4. Gilbert

GILBERT D'ASSALIT, or, as others stile him, De Lailly, an Englishman, as he is supposed by most authors, though with no very sure proofs; but, in other respects, a gentleman of singular courage and valour. Though it was his misfortune to be too easily prevailed upon by the king of Jerusalem, whether by bribes or his own ambition is variously reported, to assist him with all his forces, in his war against the Saracens in Egypt, and, to that end, borrowed the sum of 100,000 crowns from the Florentines, upon the credit of the order. He was so fortunate as to take the city of Balbeis, the ancient Pelusium; but, as we have formerly seen in the account of that war, his success neither answering his sanguine hopes, nor the vast debt he had charged his order with, he resigned his dignity, and embarked for France at Joppa, and arrived safe in Provence, and thence went to Reuen, where, notwithstanding his late misfortunes and disgrace, he met with a kind reception from Henry II. king of England; but embarking again at Dieppe for England, was unfortunately drowned, with several people that were in the ship, after he had governed the order about two years; being justly blamed for his ambition in engaging in that foreign war, contrary to the institutes of his order; and for his prodigality of its treasure, which he consumed in that short space<sup>c</sup>.

5. Castus.

His successor, Casto, or Castus, dying within less than a year after his election, we do not read of any remarkable thing that happened either to him or to the order; and it is very likely, that the ill success and disgrace which his predecessor met with in that war, deterred him from assisting the king of Jerusalem, though he was then carrying it on still, and was besieging Damieta with his land and naval forces, where he met with a stout repulse.

- a He was succeeded by Jobertus, a man of singular piety and charity to the poor, 6. Jobert. but of what nation is unknown. By this time the affairs of the kingdom of Jerusalem The sad state of the kingdom. were become so desperate, through the imprudence of the king, and the valour and success of the great Saladin, that both the knights templars and those of St. John were continually up in arms against the powerful enemies of Christianity. Their forces, now exhausted, required fresh and considerable supplies from Europe; to obtain which he sent two ambassadors thither, whilst he himself went to implore the assistance of the emperor at Constantinople, leaving the care of the kingdom to the grand master of those two orders; whilst Melior, a renegado templar, who had joined forces with Saladin, was putting all to fire and sword in Syria and Palestine. Jobert, with the assistance of his knights, and in conjunction with the templars, marched against the renegado, and forced him to betake himself to the high mountains and defiles, and obliged the Turcomans to raise the siege of Arach, or Krakh, and retire, just as the king arrived from Constantinople, but without having obtained the desired relief, either of troops or money, or any thing but fair promises from the emperor. Soon after this, another of the knights templars, named Menil, having been guilty of an open violation of the law of nations, by the murder of an ambassador of the chief of the Affassins to the king of Jerusalem, that prince caused him to be seized, and clapt into irons, with a design to have him sent bound to the prince of the Affassins, but died before he could accomplish it; for though the templar's life was saved by it, yet this deed he had committed greatly impaired the reputation of his order, whilst those of the The king of Jerusalem dies.
- b
- c hospitallers greatly increased.

- AMATRI left the kingdom of Jerusalem to his eldest son Baldwin IV. then a minor, and a prince of a most sickly constitution, under whom the affairs of the Christians in Palestine declined from bad to worse. The grand master Jobert proved a constant friend and support to him both there and in Syria, and obliged the successful Saladin to retire Affass young Baldwin in Syria. with great loss and precipitation into his own dominions. But Baldwin having undertaken to build a citadel in one of his territories, on the other side of the Jordan, occasioned a fresh and fierce engagement; his army being closely hemmed in, quickly dispersed themselves, and the knights hospitallers and templars, who were the only troops that stood their ground, were mostly cut in pieces. Jobert, though covered all over with
- d wounds, found means to save himself by swimming over that river, and Otho, or Odon, grand master of the templars, was taken prisoner<sup>f</sup>.

- ONE may easily imagine the distress of the Christians in those parts at this time; the king now relapsed into his leprosy, and incapable of governing; the two grand masters, his chief supporters, the one confined a prisoner of war by Saladin, and the other to his bed, on account of his many and dangerous wounds. Pope Alexander III. being informed of it, convened the third famed council of Lateran at Rome, at which many eastern patriarchs and prelates assisted, in which sundry complaints were exhibited by them against the too great privileges and encroachments of the knights hospitallers and templars (N), and some new regulations were made upon that subject; and by these, on the other hand, against the harshness of the eastern ecclesiastics towards the laity, in allowing those that were infected with the leprosy, and lived in communities, the privilege either of entering into the public churches, and not to have any particular ones of their own; which was condemned by that council, and those unfortunate people permitted to have, in each of their communities, a church and church-yard, or burying-place. But the greatest complaint of those prelates was, that all the disasters and losses in Palestine were owing to the ambition and avarice of the military orders, whose chief aim was to heap up vast treasures, instead of following the examples of the late king Amatri, and of the late grand master Affalit, in endeavouring to secure the kingdom from the incursions of the Egyptian infidels, by the conquest of that province, and the reduction of Damietta, upon which all the rest depended; which shews,
- e
- f that the enterprize of those two great men was far from being so ill-judged, as was at first

(N) This complaint, as it is couched in the acts of that council, runs in these terms. Fratrum autem & coenobitarum nostrorum vehementi conquisitione comparimus, quoniam fratres templi, & hospitalis, atque professionis reliquorum indulta sibi ab apostolica sede excedentes privilegia contra episcoporum dignitatem multa presumunt, &c. (24).

That of the knights against those bishops and ecclesiastics is in these words: Ecclesiastici quidam quæ sua sunt, non quæ Jesu Christi quærentes leprosis, qui cum sanis

habitare non possunt, & ad ecclesiam cum aliis convenire, ecclesias & cæmeteria non permittunt habere, nec proprio juvare ministerio sacerdotis, quod quia procul à pietate Christiana alienum dignoscitur, de benignitate apostolica constitimus, ut ubicunque tot simul sub communi vita congregati fuerint, quod ecclesiam sibi cum cæmeterio, & proprio valeant gaudere presbytero, sine contradictione aliqua permittantur habere (25).

given out, though the ill success of it occasioned its being set aside, and so generally cried a down<sup>e</sup>.

Margath
ceded to the knights.

HOWEVER that be, this reciprocal animosity of the clergy and laity did not hinder Reginald, lord of the strong castle of Margath, on the confines of Judea, from making a present, or rather an exchange, of that important fortress to the order of St. John, who immediately caused new fortifications to be added to the old, besides its eminent situation on a high, steep, and almost inaccessible rock (O). Yet did not this valuable acquisition compensate the much greater loss of the grand master Jobert, who, according to the generality of writers, died of grief, from the melancholy situation and daily decay of the kingdom of Jerusalem.

7. Roger des Moulins.

JOBERT was succeeded by Roger des Moulins, or de Molinis, a person of singular valour and prudence, who applied himself immediately after his election in carrying on the war against Saladin, and in reconciling some differences between the patriarch and the prince of Antioch, about some temporals he obtained from pope Lucius III. and a fresh confirmation of the rules and statutes of the order, to which were tacked several considerable privileges. He was scarcely returned from Antioch before he received the doleful news of the dreadful massacre of the knights of the order that were settled at Constantinople, and had been all murdered there by the Latins, except a few who escaped by sea, and brought the dreadful tidings<sup>b</sup>. The distressed condition the kingdom was then in, the incapacity of the king's either acting or marrying by reason of his leprosy, and the cabals which resulted from it, having made it necessary to send an embassy to the pope, in order to obtain a new crusade, the grand master Des Moulins, together with that of the templars, were chosen to accompany the patriarch of Jerusalem to Rome; from thence they went to France and England, the ill success of which expedition we have elsewhere shewn. At his return he continued still to be at the head of his knights in all their engagements with Saladin; and it was in one of them that he ended his government by a most glorious death, having his horse killed under him by the treacherous count of Tripoli, who had gone over to the Saracens, and was then fighting in disguise. Upon his fall, he was quickly surrounded by those barbarians, who dispatched him with a multitude of wounds, whilst a great number of his knights came and lost their own lives in striving to save his; so that when the fight was over, and the knights came to the field of battle to look for the body of their grand master, they found it, after much seeking and toil, quite covered with heaps of Turcomans and Saracens, whom his sword had sent before him into the other world. His remains were immediately conveyed to Acra, where he was buried with all the pomp and grief which were due to so great a captain and champion for the Christian faith; but though the knights lost so valuable a grand master, they had the comfort of seeing above 15,000 of the enemy lying dead on the field of battle, which was fought on the 27th of May<sup>c</sup>.

8. Garner of Syria.

Dies of his wounds.

THE enemy being still in the heart of the kingdom, and ready to engage them in a short time, the chapter thought fit to elect the brave Garner of Neapoli in Syria, in the room of their deceased grand master, who signalized himself in that desperate battle, which was fought on the 11th of July following, wherein Guy de Lusignan, king of Jerusalem, was defeated and made prisoner, the holy cross taken by the enemy, and most of the knights either slain on the spot, or afterwards in cold blood by Saladin. Garner, after having fought till he was covered over with wounds, happily escaped his fury, by flying to Ascalon, where, in a few days, he died of them, after he had enjoyed his dignity two months and ten days.

9. Emengard

Jerusalem taken by Saladin.

THE small remainder of the knights chose, in his room, Ermengard, or Emengard D'Aps, who was with great difficulty prevailed upon, at that unhappy conjuncture, to accept of the dignity. And no wonder; for he entered upon it on the 20th of July, and the victorious Saladin took possession of the city of Jerusalem on the 19th of October following, who drove all the knights hospitallers out of that metropolis, and soon after all the Latins out of Palestine, toge-

(O) This important fortress is situated in Phœnicia, near the frontiers of Judea, upon the river Valania, and about a mile from the city of the same name. It stands on a high and rugged rock, and is very strong by art and nature (26). Some authors have pretended, that Saladin was so exasperated at its being ceded to the knights of Jerusalem, that he went immediately, and so closely besieged it, that they were forced to surrender it to him after a long and desperate defence; that the grand master Jobert was taken prisoner, and cast into a dungeon, where he was starved to death, in revenge for his having made so long and vigorous a defence, by killing so many of his forces; and as for the small remainder of the garrison, they were all cut in pieces by his order. Thus far those writers, who are contradicted by a much greater number of others, who take no notice of its ever having been taken by Saladin, or any others, from the knights, who kept it till they were driven out of Syria; and, on that account, the grand master above-mentioned broke his heart at the dismal prospect of the Christian affairs in these parts (27).

- a ther with all the other military orders that had been instituted for the preservation of the holy city, with an express prohibition ever to return into it. The grand master, seeing himself and order stripped of their ancient habitation, transported himself and them to the great fortrefs of Margath, lately mentioned, after having, at their own charges, redeemed about 1000 Christian captives out of the hands of the conqueror. Thither likewise was quickly removed the bishoprick of Valania, to be in greater safety from the insults of the enemy. Here the order continued only till the taking of Acra by the Christians four years after, in which they had their share of the glory, and removed presently after thither, and made it the place of their residence; from which they came to be stiled knights of St. John D'Acra. On the following year, Ermengard, the last grand master of the knights hospital-
b lers, ended his days, after he had the pleasure of seeing the grand enemy of the Christians, Saladin, defeated by them<sup>1</sup>.

The order re-moves to Acra;

- He was succeeded by Godfrey de Duiffon, or, as others call him, De Donjon, a native of France; who had the good fortune, during the time that the true lasted between the Christians and Saladin, to see many noblemen and gentlemen of several nations, who had acquired great estates in those parts, bequeath them to his order, before their return into Europe; by which means they and the templars became administrators, and masters of that part of the kingdom, which still remained in the hands of the Christians: upon which they chose Amatri de Lusignan, then king of Cyprus, king of Jerusalem; but as Duiffon well knew of how little consequence this would be to the Christians, unless they could recover that metropolis, he tried all possible means to prevail upon them to attempt the reduction of it out of hand. But by that time their interests were so divided, that his advice could have no effect; and he died very soon after the celebration and rejoicings occasioned by the marriage of Isabella with the king of Cyprus. He obtained, during his grand mastership, several considerable privileges from pope Celestin III. and some of his successors, particularly a bull from pope Gregory VIII. enjoining the Christian prelates to excommunicate all those who should attempt to deprive or wrong, in any-wise, the knights hospitallers of any of their lands, or to extort any tythes or other dues whatsoever, in contempt of the privileges granted to them by several of his predecessors<sup>m</sup>.

10. Godfrey de Duiffon.

Advices the taking of Jerusalem.

- He was succeeded by Alphonso de Portugal, descended from the royal family of that kingdom; but from what branch of it, we are not told. This gentleman convened a general chapter at the old castle of Margath, soon after his election, where several wise and wholesome statutes were agreed to for the better reformation of the order, now become very remiss, beginning it upon himself, his household, and equipage; and for the better reducing the order under a kind of an aristocratical government; some of which still subsist; but others being disliked by the knights, as too severe and rigorous, and he become odious to them for his too proud and stiff behaviour, he divested himself of his dignity in less than a year after, and sailed for Portugal, in hopes to be crowned king there; instead of which he was poisoned by his brother, and died on the 1st of March 1207<sup>n</sup>, or, as others pretend, in a civil war against his rival. Before he abdicated, he had obtained sundry considerable privileges and immunities to his order, which might have procured him more regard, if his intended reformation had not reduced it into a kind of anarchy and rebellion, in which the major part publicly refused to obey him any longer, and, by their living in open defiance to his statutes, obliged him at once to abandon both his project and dignity.

11. Alphonso de Portugal.

Becomes odious, resigns, and is poisoned.

- Godfrey*, alias Geofrey Le Rat, a Frenchman, and then grand prior of France, was chosen in his room; in whose time died the great Saladin at Damascus, which gave a new life both to the order and to all the Christian princes in the east, the truce still subsisting under his successor Safadin, by which they had a very agreeable respite. But that was soon after interrupted by the dreadful quarrel which happened between his order and that of the templars, which was like to have proved fatal to both. The latter, it seems, had driven out by main force a vassal of the hospitallers from a castle he held of them near that of Margath; of which injury he had no sooner complained to them, than they, without any farther ceremony, dispatched a number of their knights, who went and scaladed the place with sword in hand, and drove them away. This quickly inflamed both orders to such a desperate degree, as came little short of a civil war, in which the friends of both interested themselves, and made two considerable parties, equally inflamed against each other. There being then no sovereign to curb their resentment, the patriarch and some of the bishops at length found means to persuade them to a suspension of arms, and to refer the controversy to the determination of the holy see.

POPE Innocent III. sat then on the chair, when the deputies of both orders came to lay a the matter before him; who, by a preliminary sentence, ordered the hospitallers to resign the castle to the templars for one month; after which the owner of it should be permitted to prefer a complaint against them, and have the cause tried before proper magistrates, or decided by such judicious and impartial arbitrators as the chiefs of both orders should mutually agree upon. The pontiff, moreover, wrote letters to the grand masters, exhorting them to set aside all their jealousies and feuds, so dangerous to Christendom, and so acceptable to the Turks, and others of their enemies, and to abide by the decision of the judges, under pain of excommunication, and of his highest resentment; and, in that to Godfrey Le Rat, he highly blames the violent method they took in favour of their vassal, tells him that he had chosen to have the matter decided by arbitration, rather than to have it brought b before him, to avoid being obliged to pronounce such a sentence against the delinquents, as must have covered them with confusion, and exposed them to the world.

THE dispute was at length decided in favour of the hospitallers, and the pretensions of the templars declared to be unjust. The castle was restored to the right owners, matters were at least outwardly compromised to the satisfaction of both sides, and a good harmony restored between them. The pope wrote to both, recommending the interest of the king of Cyprus to them, and concludes with threatening those that proved refractory with his highest indignation †. But there was very little likelihood that things should continue in that amicable situation, if what an author * tells us be true, that the knights templars had then no less than 19,000 manors, besides other revenues and privileges, belonging to them; c whereas the hospitallers had no more than 9,000; and we shall find accordingly by the sequel, that this fire of jealousy and envy was only kept under for a time, in order to blaze more fiercely upon every fresh occasion, till they were totally suppressed. But to return:

Vast number of manors belonging to both orders.

ABOUT six or seven years after this accommodation died Amalric de Lusignan, without having any children by his last wife Isabella; so that the kingdom of Cyprus devolved to his son Hughes by his former wife; upon which account, and the many feuds which then universally reigned in that island, he bequeathed the government of it to the knights of St. John D'Acra. Soon after this, his wife Isabella, queen of Jerusalem, dying, left her daughter Mary, whom she had by her former husband, under their guardianship, in conjunction d with the knights templars. Godfrey Le Rat obtained, during his government, sundry fresh privileges from the popes Celestine III. and Innocent III. and more particularly from our king John P.

His counsel opposed by the templars.

THE ambassadors which had been sent into Europe, to obtain fresh succours, being returned, fraught with promises of a speedy and warlike armament by sea and land, under the command of the famed John de Brienne, the grand master, who doubted justly whether any such vast reinforcement could be really sent from thence, was yet of opinion to take the advantage of the fear which this report had thrown the infidels in, for renewing the truce with them. His counsel met with general approbation, except the master of the templars, who e opposed it, it seems, for no other reason than because it was proposed by him, and had interest enough to cause it to be set aside<sup>a</sup>. The grand master died soon after, and was succeeded by GUERIN DE MOUNTAGU, a Frenchman, of the province of Auvergne, who, soon after his election, greatly assisted the Greeks in Lesser Armenia against the Turcomans and Saracens; in recompence of which signal services, the king bestowed the city of Sales, together with the castles of Camard and Newcastle, upon him and his order. During his mastership, Andreas king of Hungary, coming to Acra, or Ptolemais, and beholding the decent order and charitable œconomy of the knights hospitallers, bestowed several lands, castles, and other donatives, upon their hospital, besides an income of 500 marks per ann. to be paid out of the salt-works of Saloch. He likewise took the habit and cross of the order, into which he was f admitted by the same grand master. Pope Honorius confirmed all those donatives to the hospital, and bestowed several other privileges upon it; as did some of his predecessors and successors. The same was done by the French kings Lewis VIII. and IX. who likewise confirmed all the donatives which had been granted to the order by Richard I. king of England. Pope Gregory IX. likewise confirmed all the privileges and immunities which had been granted by his predecessors, and added some new ones to them. It was likewise during his government, that Damietta was taken by the knights, after a long and stout defence.

- a BERTRAND DE TEXI, who, following his predecessors steps, was no less attentive to the interests of Christendom than to those of his order (P). There never was indeed more need of vigilance than now; when, by the abdication of John de Brienne, the kingdom was like a ship without a pilot; and by the recalling of the Teutonic knights, to suppress the dreadful devastations of the pagans in Prussia, the state had lost a considerable prop; so that it had hardly any other supporters left than the knights hospitallers and templars. The emperor Frederick, as then king of Jerusalem, had indeed promised them, at his departure thence, to send them his son and successor Conrad with a very powerful reinforcement; but, having occasion for all his forces elsewhere, he quickly forgot his engagements to those two orders, which obliged them to muster up all their prudence and strength to defend it against such powerful enemies as it had on all sides. Texi, accompanied by Bertrand de Goss to the Barras, knight of the order, and grand prior of St. Giles, went on an embassy to the emperor, emperor. to remind him of his promises. But all he could obtain from him was a confirmation of the privileges and immunities granted to the order by his predecessors, with the addition of some new ones. The grant is dated from Verona; and pope Gregory, following his example, complimented the order with a new bull, some months after, charging all patriarchs and prelates in Christendom to excommunicate, as he doth in that bull, all those who shall vex, molest, or in any way injure, that order, either in their persons, revenues, &c. It is dated Nov. 24, of the same year<sup>u</sup>. Bertrand de Texi died on the next year at Ptolemais, some say Dies after the of grief at the stinging reproaches which the court of Rome had loaded him and his knights arrival of the with, for the particular esteem which they had shewn for the great Vatases, then emperor of Nice. However that be, he had the satisfaction, a little before his death, of hearing of the duke of Cornwall. arrival of Richard duke of Cornwall, brother of king Henry III. of England, in Palestine, 1240. with an army of 40,000 men<sup>w</sup>.

- He was succeeded by Guerin, or Gerin, whose surname and country is not mentioned by any author, and who is omitted out of the list by Megisser, tho' so particularly recorded by the rest, for his and the Christian army's total defeat in the battle they fought against the Chorasmians, who were ten to one superior in number, and in which such slaughter was made, of the two orders in particular, that only twenty-six, some say sixteen, of the hospitallers, and thirty-three templars, escaped with their lives. The two grand masters were killed at the head of their troops, according to some authors (Q); but, according to others, only that of the templars, whilst Guerin had the misfortune to be taken prisoner, and to be sent in chains to the sultan of Egypt, with other prisoners of note; so that it is not known whether he was ever redeemed, or died in slavery. This disaster happened to him about three years after his election to the dignity; and he was succeeded by 15. Guerin.

- BERTRAND DE COMPS, an old experienced officer, and a native of Dauphiny; who, tho' he saw his order so much thinned by the late dreadful slaughter of its knights, yet being applied to for help by the prince of Antioch, who was then invaded on all sides by swarms of Turcomans, made no demur to put himself at the head of his remaining forces, and to march to his assistance. The master of the templars did the same with his; and a long and furious engagement ensued between them and those infidels, in which both sides behaved with great intrepidity. Bertrand, enraged at an opposition he had not been accustomed to, rushed in foremost at the head of his knights, into the enemy's ranks, forced his way through them, and put them to flight; but, in this last effort, he received so many wounds, that he died of them soon after, in the fourth year after his election<sup>x</sup>. During the four years of his government, he obtained four different bulls from pope Innocent IV.; the one condemning and excommunicating all those who, in contempt of the privileges granted by his predecessors, had invaded any of them; the other three were much of the same stamp<sup>y</sup>; being as little regarded by the rest of the world as those of his predecessors. Engages the Turcomans. Dies of his wounds. *16. (P) This grand master is omitted by Rondinel, and some other authors, who place, immediately after Guerin de Mountagu above-mentioned, the other Guerin, without a surname, and reckon him the 15th grand master of the order, from Gerard, as the first who bore that title (29). But Bosio, and the generality of other authors, leaving Gerard out, and beginning from Raymond de Polio, or Dupuy, mention this Bertrand de Texi as the 14th in the list from him, who succeeded the first Guerin, anno 1230, and died in 1240 (30).

(Q) Vertot quotes a letter written by William de

Chatcauneuf, knight of the order, who was himself at the bloody engagement, and was some years after chosen grand master of the order, to the lord de Merlay; in which he ascribes this incursion of the Chorasmians to the league which the Christians had made with the sultan of Damascus against them of Egypt. The account which he gives of the fight is, that the two grand masters were slain in it, and only himself, and fifteen more of the knights of his order, had escaped from the slaughter (31).

17. Peter de Villebride.

THE chapter chose in his room Peter de Villebride, a gentleman no less esteemed for his piety than for his singular valour; in the beginning of whose government, Lewis IX. once known by the title of St. Lewis, arrived at the head of a powerful crusade, to which pope Innocent IV. had invited, by a special bull, all the Christian princes of his church. Lewis came and received the cross and habit from the grand master, and engaged to accompany him in all his expeditions, at the head of his order. The better to acquit himself of his promise, he caused all the novices of the order that were in Europe, and all the cash of the priories, &c. belonging to it, to be conveyed into Palestine, in order to march with this reinforcement to join the king at the siege of Damieta. He likewise made very strong efforts to prevail upon the sultan of Egypt to treat with him about the redemption of Christian slaves, which were by that time become very numerous; and, if he could have succeeded in it, it would have proved very serviceable; but the sultan, who was privately in league with the emperor, who hated them no less than he, absolutely refused it, and dismissed the commissioners with very severe, though just, reproaches, of their former perfidy. The ill success of the siege we have already seen; and need only observe here, that, upon his being taken prisoner with the king, the chapter caused him to be redeemed at a great price; but he did not long survive his return to Ptolemais, where he died in the third year of his government (R); and was succeeded by

18. William de Chateau-
neuf.

WILLIAM DE CASTELNAU, alias Chateaufneuf, a French gentleman, of the Auvernian tongue, an ancient knight, and so strict an observer of their religious discipline, that, if we may believe the French writer of St. Lewis's life<sup>a</sup>, he condemned the knights to eat upon their cloaks, spread upon the ground in their hall or refectory, for having had a squabble with some of the Frenchmen of that king's retinue, as they were hunting an antelope near Ptolemais. In his time, that monarch having caused the fortifications of Ptolemais, Joppa, Cæsarea, and some other places, to be repaired, and greatly improved, returned into France, and left the care of that country to the new grand master, about three years after his election; who accordingly fortified the monastery of Mount Thabor, now abandoned, in the form of a strong citadel; as he did likewise the castle of Bethany, which was granted to him by pope Alexander IV. with all its revenues, and some others, and put a sufficient number of forces and ammunition into each of them, particularly into that of Caraa, in the country of Tripoli, which belonged to the order, and that of Affur, bordering on the conquests of the Saracens in the Holy Land; in which last he put 100 of his knights, with a good number of hired troops, to suppress the inroads of those infidels.

POPE Alexander IV. not content with confirming and augmenting the immunities and privileges of the order, besides M. Thabor and the castle of Bethany above-mentioned, with all the revenues belonging to them, added several other grants, in order to keep all their fortified places and garrisons in the best repair; which he accordingly did: but all these pleasing prospects were forced to give way to a more gloomy and discouraging one, which forced itself upon him; viz. that of seeing all the fair promises made to him of a speedy and considerable succour from Europe come to nothing; the grief of which, in all probability, shortened his days<sup>b</sup>. He died in the ninth year of his mastership; and was succeeded by veral abuses.

HUGH REVEL, a native of Dauphiny, and of an ancient and noble family, who, by his wise and extraordinary conduct, greatly contributed to raise the lustre of his order, and his new dignity, at least with respect to the temporal state of it. He summoned a general chapter of the whole order at Cæsarea, where the abuses, which had crept into its several commanderies, were examined, and priors set over them to visit and inspect them, and transmit the revenues of them duly over into the public treasury. The same chapter passed a law, forbidding the knights to make wills, or leave legacies, or even any gratuities, to their domestics, without the leave of the grand master, as being inconsistent with their vow of poverty<sup>c</sup>.

THESE few wholesome regulations were the more necessary at this time, not only to reform those several abuses which were grown to a monstrous height, but likewise to enable the order to procure, at their own charge, those succours which they had long expected in vain

(R) Among other fresh privileges and immunities granted to this grand master, during his short government, by four successive bulls, the last of them, dated March 24, 1250, exempts his order, and the servants of it, from being summoned or sued before any ecclesiastical court whatsoever: and the archbishops and bishops of France are thereby enjoined to forbid their deans, archdeacons, vicars, and other officers, to summon or sue any of them, or their domestics, upon any account whatsoever. The same prohibition is likewise directed to all counts, viscounts, barons, provosts, bailiffs, and other officers of secular justice; as likewise against laying violent hands upon their persons, &c. and all under pain of excommunication (32).

from the European princes ; the want of which had occasioned the affairs of religion to go from bad to worse. By these means, and other wise precautions of the grand master, we shall find them still acting, upon all occasions, with their accustomed bravery and zeal, under all the difficulties occasioned by the remissness and indolence of those crowned heads whose duty and interest it was to have supported them.

REVEL was hardly entered into the third year of his dignity, before Bendocdar, the bitterest enemy that the Christians in Palestine, especially those of his order, ever had, was raised by the Mamluks to be sultan of Egypt, and threatened the two orders with expulsion from that country. He accordingly began with the castle of Affur, or Asbur, one of their strongest fortresses, which the late grand master had fortified and garrisoned with 100 of his knights, besides some other troops, who all maintained their ground with the most intrepid bravery, until they were all cut to pieces ; infomuch that the sultan could not enter the place but by going over the dead bodies, with which all the avenues to it were covered. Next year the sea-port of Gaffa, or Joppa, the castles of Beaufort and Carac, underwent the same fate, and the garrisons were all massacred without mercy to the last man. Antioch was surrendered by treachery, and nothing was left but the dismal prospect of the total loss of the Holy Land ; when Revel, in conjunction with the master of the templars, now honoured with the additional title of grand, like his noble colleague, by pope Clement IV. found means to induce the sultan to make a truce, in hopes that, in a short time, they might obtain some succours from Europe. They agreed to pass over together to Italy, in order to promote, by their interest, Tibald archdeacon of Liege, then in Palestine, to the papal chair, which had been vacant near three years ; not doubting but, as he had been an eye-witness of the dismal condition of Christianity, his piety and zeal would stir him up to employ all his interest and authority to procure some considerable reinforcement to these two orders, who were now the only supporters left of that tottering state.

He did so, and, with a readiness suitable to their hopes, invited them both to assist at the general council of Lyons, which he convened soon after his exaltation ; and, as that could not meet till three years after, he employed that time in writing circular letters, to exhort the Christian princes, by a timely supply, to prevent the total loss of the Holy Land. We shall not repeat here the result of that august assembly, nor sundry other cross events that happened in Palestine during that time, which the sultan would not have failed of turning to his advantage, had he not been prevented by death before the truce was expired<sup>f</sup>. But in the mean time the grand master Revel, quite worn out with age, fatigues, and, which is still worse, with cares and grief, departed this life in the 18th year of his government, and on the year after the death of Bendocdar.

He was succeeded by Nicholas de Lorgue, a gentleman of a sweet and insinuating disposition, whose first care, after his election, was to restore the harmony which had been long interrupted between his order and that of the templars, and to appease the feuds and animosities which reigned among the various nations that were settled in the city. In which he not only had the mortification to find all his endeavours eluded, but likewise to see the truce all on a sudden broke by Sais Melech, the successor of Bendocdar, before it was expired, and the important fortress of Margath assaulted, and surrendered to that treacherous prince, who caused it to be taken and razed to the ground, to deprive them of all hopes of their ever recovering it. His grief for the loss of so considerable a place, as well as for the success of the infidels in those parts, so sensibly affected him, that he took the advantage of a second truce with them to repass into Europe, to solicit for some fresh succours ; but all he could obtain was about 1500 men, most of them either banditti, or of the lees of the people, without either courage or discipline. Even the then pope Nicholas IV. refused to assist him with money towards their pay ; and with this poor reinforcement he was forced to return to Ptolemais, the sight of which rather contributed to increase than allay the discontents and despairs of the fraternity. As for De Lorgue, the cold reception he met with in Europe, joined to the deplorable condition they were reduced to, so effectually touched his heart, that it quickly brought him to his grave, in the 10th year of his government, and prevented his surviving the loss of that important place, and of the Holy Land, which he clearly foresaw to be near at hand.

He was succeeded by John de Villiers, a Frenchman, during whose whole government the affairs of religion went still worse and worse, by the loss of Tripoli in Syria, of Tyre, Sidon, Baruth, and, last of all, of Ptolemais. With regard to this last, it may be observed, that the breach of the second truce was owing chiefly to the garrison of it, or rather to that reinforcement which was thrown into it by the late grand master De Lorgue. We have already hinted what a wretched crew of scoundrels they were, ill disciplined, and worse paid ; so that they made no scruple to fall out as occasion offered, and to live on the plunder of a Christians as well as Saracens, without distinction. The sultan in vain sent to demand satisfaction for these depredations; the jealousy and divisions which reigned in the place, which was then without a proper governor, and inhabited by a mixed multitude of all nations and conditions, most of them independent of each other, and living in a kind of anarchy, gave no room to expect any redress or remedy; and even the patriarch, the pope's legate, and chiefs of the clergy, had withdrawn themselves into a separate quarter of the town. Thus whilst discord, envy, rapine, murder, and every destructive irregularity, were suffered to reign in the place, that vast multitude, which, united, might have withstood all the efforts of the enemy, became a sacrifice to their implacable fury, and brought on the loss and dreadful catastrophe of that unhappy city<sup>b</sup>, as well as the total expulsion of the Christians, b and particularly of this order, out of Palestine.

sail to Cyprus, and settle at Limisso.

THE grand master, and those few knights that survived this irreparable loss, embarked with all possible speed, as well as the templars and those of the Teutonic order, and dispersed themselves by several routes. Their example was followed by those who were left in the few castles that remained untaken, but which they found they were unable to maintain themselves in. The hospitallers, however, being still in hopes that some fresh crusade might enable them once more to settle in the Holy Land, resolved to fix themselves as near it as they could; and, having obtained leave of the king of Cyprus to take shelter in his island, he assigned to them the city of Limisso in that island, where they gradually arrived one after another, as they could best avoid the pursuit of the Saracens. A doleful sight it c was to see them land, after the dreadful fatigues and dangers they had sustained during that siege; and though most of them were covered with wounds, yet were they still more grieved at their hearts that they had outlived so great a loss. Here, however, they settled for the present; and the grand master convened two general chapters, one year after another, to consult on the properest means of bettering, if possible, their now almost desperate condition, and preventing the total extinction of their order. He likewise sent to the pope Nico- las IV. the melancholy news of the loss of Palestine; who immediately dispatched his nuncios to all the European princes, to exhort them to set aside all their mutual feuds, and turn their thoughts and efforts towards the recovery of it. In the mean time Villiers had the comfort to see the first general council filled with a vast number of knights of all nations, d old and young, who came readily to Cyprus from all parts, none excusing himself from being at it on that emergent occasion, insomuch that there never had been seen so numerous an assembly since the foundation of the order.

THE master's speech, which drew tears from the eyes of all its hearers, was followed with an universal protestation both of old and young, that they were all ready and impatient to venture their lives for the recovery of the holy places. The misfortune was, that the city of Limisso had suffered so much from the Arabian and Saracen corsairs, that it was now reduced to a wide open borough, exposed on all sides; on which account some of the assembly proposed to seek for a more safe and convenient settlement in some part of Italy. This proposal, however, was rejected with scorn by the grand master and the senior knights, as inconsistent e with the intent and meaning of some of their late statutes, which obliged them to keep as near the Holy Land as possible, in order to be at hand, whenever an opportunity offered, to take up arms for the recovery of it; upon which it was agreed to make the best of the place they were in, and to look no farther.

THE first care of the grand master was, to get proper accommodations for the sick, wounded, lame, &c. as was usually done before; and as there was not room enough in the place to entertain so great a multitude of knights and their retinue, it was further agreed that a certain number of those galleys, which had brought them thither either from Europe or Palestine, should be armed and fitted out, and commanded by turns by a proper number of knights, whose chief business it should be to scour the sea, and escort the pilgrims that f still went to and from Palestine. Upon which many of them of different sizes began to sail from several ports of the island, and, at their return, brought in considerable prizes which they made of the Turkish corsairs, who were watching to intercept those pilgrims in their passage thither or homewards. These helped to augment the number of their vessels; to which they added some new ones, which they ordered to be built, by which means they began again to make some figure at sea, which served also to keep the knights in action, and to train up and enure the young ones at once to war and navigation.

IN the mean time the grand master Villiers, finding the preparations in Europe for an armament in their favour to go on extremely slowly, employed his time in making several new and very necessary statutes and regulations. After which, having obtained leave of the g a king, he set himself about fortifying the city of Limisso, in order to secure it from the attempts of Melech Nazar, who had succeeded Melech Zaraph, who would not otherwise fail of assaulting him in so open and defenceless a place. Pope Celestian IV. being at length chosen to the papal chair, and apprised of their loss of all the lands which they had held in Palestine, made it his first care to shew them some marks of this affection; and, though he was soon after cheated out of his dignity, his successor Boniface VIII. shewed himself no less generous to them, by the bulls which he fulminated against the kings of England and Portugal. These princes, after the loss of the Holy Land, had sequestered their lands and revenues, to what they called more pious and charitable uses than the supporting those knights in pride and luxury, for which reproach they had given but too much occasion; but those bulls, notwithstanding their specious pretences, obliged those two princes to obey, and to revoke their sequestration. The misfortune was, that the king of Cyprus, no less haughty than that pontiff, conceived such a jealousy against the whole order, which claimed an independence on any but the pope, that he absolutely refused to suffer them to settle in his dominions, unless they would submit to pay him a certain tribute yearly as his vassals, with which they were obliged to comply, in spite of the pope's thundering bull against it, in which he stiled it a horrid and detestable extortion. In the mean time the grand master De Villiers died at Limisso, quite worn out with grief and fatigues, in the sixth year after his election <sup>Makes new regulations.</sup>

THE chapter chose in his room Odon des Pins, alias Odo de Pinibus, a native of Provence, a person already advanced in years, but fitter for the monkish offices than for those of such a warlike order, and perhaps more devout and retired than was consistent with it. His affected indolence, and the neglect of sending their galleys in search of fresh captures, soon brought upon him the general dislike of the whole order, which chiefly subsisted by them. Complaints were therefore made to the pope against him, by the greatest part of them, who at the same time begged leave to depose him. He was thereupon summoned before that pontiff; but died before he reached Italy, in the second year of his government, and was succeeded by <sup>22. Odon des Pins. 1294. Dies in his way to Rome.</sup>

WILLIAM DE VILLARET, of the tongue of Provence, at that time residing in his own priory of St. Giles; but who, upon the news of his election, chose to visit in person all the places in the several tongues of Provence, Auvergne, and France, in most of which he made several wholesome and needful regulations, before he set out for Cyprus. In his time pope Boniface VIII. confirmed the old rule of the order, which had been lost during the siege of Ptolemais, but the counterpart of which was still extant in the Vatican library. That pontiff at the same time conferred upon this order the abbey of Vennosa, in the kingdom of Naples, which he had suppressed on account of the irregularities of the nuns belonging to it. Villaret, having thanked his holiness for these two signal favours, set sail for Cyprus, where he was received by the whole convent with universal joy, and where they had waited with impatience for his arrival, in hopes that his presence would give fresh life to a new project which they had formed for driving the Saracens out of the Holy Land, by making a league with Guzan, now at the head of the Mogul Tatars. He likewise received several other considerable privileges from pope Benedict X. and Philip the Fair of France. <sup>23. William de Villaret. Gets the old rule confirmed, with other grants from the pope and king of France.</sup>

BUT the grand master had a much more important project in his head, which yet he kept wholly to himself, till he had assured himself of the feasibility of it. The ill treatment which he and his order had received from the king Cyprus, in a great measure forced him into it. It was no less than the conquest of the island of Rhodes, where the lords of Galla had, from governors, erected themselves into sovereigns of it, and had peopled it with Turkish and Saracen merchants, who admitted all the corsairs of those nations into their ports, where they rode safe from the pursuit of the galleys of his order. His first care was to take an exact survey of its ports, fortified places, garrisons, and number of its inhabitants; but not finding himself in a condition to attempt it with the small force he had, he sailed back to Limisso, with an intent to go thence to Rome, and acquaint the pope with his design on that island, and to procure by his means some fresh assistance from the European princes; but, whilst he was preparing for that voyage, he was seized with a lingering disease, which put an end to his project and to his life, on the 12th year of his grand mastership; so that he lived to see the dreadful catastrophe and final destruction of the knights templars. <sup>Projects the conquest of Rhodes. Prevented by death. 1308.</sup>

HE was succeeded by his brother Foulk de Villaret, who, being well acquainted with all his designs, and the plan he had laid for facilitating so noble a project, and a person of no less courage and conduct for executing of it, was the fittest to supply his place. He sailed accordingly from Limisso, accompanied by a great number of his knights, who were no less tired than he with the frequent insults of the Cyprian monarch, in the galleys of the order, to go and confer with the pope French king, both then in the city of Poitiers, to examine the case of the knights templars, and to propose to the then master of them, who was there likewise, the uniting of the two orders under one chief or grand master. To this he answered, that the same proposal, having been formerly made at the council of Lyons, under Gregory IX. was set aside upon several invincible obstacles which were urged against it, and, amongst the rest, that the monarchs of Spain, who were at perpetual war with the Moors, and derived their chief strength from the military orders established in their own dominions, would never permit that the Spanish knights, who were solely dependent on him, should become subject to any authority but his own: and, 2dly, that it would be highly unreasonable, and even dangerous, to oblige that military order to observe the severe discipline of the templars, with regard to their religious obligations and vows, which they had no proper call, nor grace given, to observe; so that such an union would rather be a disservice than a means of recovering the Holy Land, which was what the Christian powers had most at heart, and esteemed the most meritorious action they could contribute to, or exert themselves in <sup>a</sup>.

His project
of seizing Rhodes
approved.

A crusade proclaimed.

Upon the whole, the project was set aside, and that of the grand master Villaret approved of, exchanging the isle of Cyprus, where they were exposed to the attacks of the Saracens from without, and to the insults and extortions of the king from within, for that of Rhodes, where they would be able to fortify themselves against the one, and be near at hand to attempt the recovery of Palestine, whenever a fair opportunity offered. But as the conquest of that island was an enterprise above their present strength, a fresh crusade was proposed and agreed to, to assist them with a sufficient force to effect it, without discovering however the particular design of it, which it was their interest to conceal with all possible secrecy. The pope's bull for it granted such plenary indulgences, and other considerable privileges, to those that should engage in or contribute towards it, that volunteers came in shoals from all parts of Europe, especially from Germany, to enlist themselves; and the very women readily parted with their jewels to contribute towards the expences of it; so that the vast sums which were collected quickly enabled them to procure arms and ammunition, and vessels to carry over a great army, so great, we are told <sup>b</sup>, that, for want of a sufficient number of transport ships, and to prevent the too great confusion it might cause, the grand master and his knights contented themselves with singling out the stoutest and best accoutred; and, taking leave of the pontif, sailed with them for the island of Cyprus, where they arrived safe, and without coming near that of Rhodes, to avoid raising any suspicion. Here he stayed no longer than till he could get his knights, and all the arms and effects of the order on board, and then set sail again on his intended expedition.

island.

Upon the ungenerous refusal which the emperor Andronicus, who mortally hated the Latins, made him of the investiture of Rhodes, tho' he had hardly any thing left in it but a castle, and some shadow of authority, the grand master, who easily foresaw the issue of this negotiation, instead of staying longer at Macry, where he only stopped to take in fresh water, sailed directly for that island, and quickly landed his forces, provisions, and warlike stores, in spite of the opposition which the Greeks and Saracens, who then inhabited it, could make against them; so greatly were they fallen, by this time, from the valour and noble spirit for which they had been so justly famed in former days <sup>c</sup>. Not that they immediately submitted to the invaders without resistance, for there was scarcely a day in which they did not make some effort to drive them out, especially as the emperor Andronicus supplied them with fresh forces, in hopes that the island would easily submit to him as soon as the Latins were destroyed out of it; and this contest lasted near four years, though authors have given us few or no particulars of it, except what relates to the taking of its capital, without which the grand master clearly foresaw the island would hardly be subdued.

the capital.

The siege was actually carried on with surprising bravery, the knights emulously running themselves into the greatest dangers to hasten its reduction; but as the besiegers made a no less vigorous defence, he thought it expedient to turn it into a blockade; in which however he quickly found himself so closely surrounded by the Greeks and Saracens, that he could get no supply of either forage or provisions for his army.

Repels the Saracens.

HAVING at length obtained a supply of fresh provisions by means of some large sums which he borrowed from the Florentines, and sufficiently refreshed his own men, he came out of his trenches, and attacked the Saracens, with a full resolution either to conquer or die. A bloody fight ensued, in which he lost a great number of his bravest knights, whilst the inhabitants fought against them with the utmost fury, as against invaders of their lands, families, and liberty. At length the Saracens gave way, and abandoned the field of battle, to gain their ships, whence they went and spread the news of their defeat among the islands <sup>f</sup>.

- a of the Archipelago. The siege was immediately after renewed with fresh vigour; the assault given through a thick volley of arrows, and other missive weapons, from the ramparts, and the standards of the order quickly after displayed upon them. The Greeks, and other Christians, that were found in the place, had their lives and liberties given them, but the Saracens were all cut in pieces. The taking of the city was followed by that of the castle of Lindo, situate on the eastern coasts of the island, near which are two convenient bays, especially that which still retains its ancient name of the Bay of Serpents. Other fortifications, and at length that whole island, gradually underwent the same fortune; so that they got full possession of it in less than four years time. In memory of this signal transaction, so glorious and advantageous to the order, and to all Christendom, they took, and retained

S E C T. II.

The history of the knights of Rhodes, from their first settlement on that island, to their being dispossessed of it by Soliman, emperor of the Turks.

- c THIS famed island having been fully described in our Antient History *, with respect to its situation, extent, climate, soil, product, &c. we shall not trouble our readers any farther about it here, except where it hath since received any considerable improvement either in its fortifications, navy, or commerce, since it became subject to these new masters. But as the reduction of it by them was followed by that of eight or nine more of a smaller size and importance, formerly called Rhodian islands, but most of them mere barren rocks, we shall just give a short account of those which proved the most useful to the order in the sequel, and barely mention what is found most remarkable in them, before we resume the thread of our history. These are known by the names of, 1. Nisara, antiently, Nisyros; 2. Lero; 3. Calamo; 4. Episcopia; 5. Calchis de Simia; 6. Tilo; and 7. Cos, alias Lango.
- d NISARA is distant from that of Cos last-named about two leagues, and about the same distance which it is from the continent of Caria. It had formerly a temple dedicated to Neptune, some hot baths, and a good haven; and, upon its surrender, was now given in fief by the grand master to John and Bonavil Assaliers, two brothers, who had signalized themselves at the siege of Rhodes, upon condition they should forthwith build a new galley of 25 oars, man and equip it at their own charge, and go on board it themselves when and where-ever the grand master should order them.
- LERO is about eighteen miles in compass, yet is one continued rock, on the summit of which was a castle, which defended the harbour from the plundering corsairs.
- THAT of Calamo, though still much larger, being near forty miles in circumference, is likewise a mere continued barren rock: yet did the knights find in it the ruins of a considerable city, whose inhabitants probably subsisted on their commerce, the soil being altogether dry and barren. Those of Episcopia and Tilo are still more inconsiderable. That of Chalce or Calchis de Simia hath little remarkable in it, except that it produces some good wines, and breeds up a vast number of goats. The inhabitants are famous for having a sort of small light frigates, which sail and row with such prodigious swiftmess, that no ship can overtake them. This island was likewise famous for breeding up excellent swimmers and divers, who dived for sponge; and there was a law among them, that none should be permitted to marry till they could dive twenty fathom deep. On the summit of this island the grand master ordered a very high tower to be erected, from the top of which one could see a great way any vessel that appeared at sea, of which they were to give notice to the order, either by their beacons, or by dispatching one of their swift frigates to Rhodes. But the most considerable of all is that of Cos or Lango, which is near four miles long and about two in breadth, and moreover famed for being the native place of the great Hippocrates and Apelles. Its soil is fertile, and produces great variety of fruit. The knights found in it a small city or town, situate by the sea-side, at the bottom of a large bay, and at the foot of a high mountain. The haven was then commodious and wide, but the mouth of it hath been some time ago so choaked up with the sand thrown into it by the waves, that none but small vessels can sail into it, whilst those of a larger bulk are obliged to ride in the road near it, which hath a good bottom and anchorage.

Castle.

Commerce.

ON this island the grand master ordered a stout castle to be built, with strong towers and other bulwarks, and left it under the government of one of the knights, who laid the foundation for a commerce in the island: this became so considerable under his successors, that the town began to make a great figure, and the island was looked upon as a second Rhodes; insomuch that it was raised to the dignity of a bishop's see under that of Rhodes, and erected into one of the bailiwicks of the order<sup>b</sup>.

Fortifications of Rhodes repaired.

Othman defeated before it, with great loss.

WHILST the grand master was receiving the homage, and establishing his authority, in the several islands above-mentioned, the fortifications of the capital were repaired and improved according to his order; so that at his return he sailed with his galleys into the harbour with great pomp, amidst the shouts and acclamations of his order. He had not long enjoyed the fruits of this new conquest, before the Saracens, who escaped from the sword of his troops, by regaining their ships, raised up a potent enemy against him. It was Osmir, alias Othman, of the race of sultans of that name, who then reigned in Bithynia; and, whether to revenge the blood of the slain Saracens, or out of dislike of having so warlike and enterprising an order so near his own dominions, resolved at any rate to drive them out of that island. After the several conquests he had by this time made in Lycia, Caria, and other parts of the Greek empire, he bent his whole naval strength against this place; and made such dispatch in his preparations, that he was able to lay siege to that capital before the walls and other fortifications of it were fully repaired. His fleet was numerous, his troops were stout and warlike, and accustomed to conquer under his banners; yet did his good fortune fail him in this attempt. The intrepid valour of the Rhodian knights proved such an effectual bulwark against all his efforts, that he was forced to raise the siege, and retire with a great loss of his men; which he had no sooner done, than the grand master ordered the walls to be strongly terraced, and new out-works to be added to the old, to secure that capital from future attempts.

The commerce of it restored.

Becomes a most flourishing city.

HIS next care was to open such a commerce with it as might render it no less rich and flourishing than strong. To this end he invited all that had retired into different parts of Greece to come and settle there; which they did quickly in vast multitudes. He also made the port of Rhodes a free one to all nations, which drew likewise a vast concourse of merchants thither; insomuch that that city gradually arose to such degree of opulence, as to become one of the most flourishing in all Asia, as well as one of the most secure and commodious havens for all the crusades that came from Europe, to the great joy and satisfaction of all the Christian crowned heads, and the singular honour of the knights hospitallers, who, by the taking of this important island, gave the world a proof, that, in the loss of the Holy Land, they had never resigned their hopes and desire of recovering it again; in which they shewed themselves much superior in zeal and bravery to their rivals the templars, who so readily abandoned those holy places to the fury and tyranny of the enemies of Christendom, to indulge themselves in ease and luxury, and a life quite opposite to their vows, and the design of their institution. This was, at least, the general outcry against them, whether deservedly or no, all over Europe, but more especially at the courts of France and Rome, and what hastened their ruin and total extinction, as well as the bestowing of all their lands and revenues on the knights of Rhodes.

Lalleman made visitor of all the priories of Europe.

THEY appointed Robert Lalleman, of the Black Castle, a person of known prudence and integrity, and who had been for some time great commander of the order, their attorney-general, with a competent number of other knights his coadjutors, and sent them with full power to take possession of all those estates, and to give proper discharges for them. The said Lalleman was likewise appointed, by the same chapter, general visitor, inquisitor, administrator, steward, and reformer of the order on this side of the sea, and ordered to make a thorough reformation of all the abuses which had crept in, during the late troublesome times, with regard to the application of the revenues of every priory, &c. or in any other instance; with full power to judge and condemn all delinquents of what rank and quality soever, to deprive them of their respective dignities and trusts, and nominate others in their place. He was moreover empowered to admit fit and worthy persons into the order, and to invest them with the proper habit and other insignia of it. This commission is dated October 27, 1312; and was the more politically concerted, as the execution of it would at once silence the complaints which had been made against their order, with regard to those abuses, at the council of Vienna, by the creatures of the French king, who wanted to seize on the best part of the estates of the templars; and as it would prevent pope Boniface, who had engaged to become himself their visitor and reformer, and to see all such abuses rectified, from nominating some of his own creatures to that office. However that be, Lalleman and his coadjutors found the greatest difficulty, when they came into Europe, to get those estates out of the hands of the tenacious administrators; and it was not accomplished till after a

a good number of years, and much trouble and fatigue. It proved, however, quite otherwise Edward II. of England resigns those in his dominions; in England, where Edward II. not only published an express order to his officers to put the said Lalleman, and other commissioners, in possession of all the lands which the templars held in his dominions, but likewise sent letters to his barons, to hasten the execution of his orders, and to use their utmost power and authority in protecting those commissaries; and not only to see the lands themselves, but even the produce of them, such as corn, fruits, &c. to be delivered unto them. The original of both these letters are preserved in the Tower to this day, which shew, that this prince was above following the example of other crowned heads, in appropriating any of them to his own use, in prejudice of that order <sup>n</sup>.

b We observed, that the success which the young knights had in their cruises at sea had Luxury, &c. introduced by Villaret; introduced such luxury and remissness, that the grand master was forced to have some statutes made against it. This abuse was by this time rather increased than lessened, not only by the additional augmentation of their revenue, but what was still more surprising, by the example of Villaret himself, whose carriage, from an able and prudent general, was so strangely altered since his late conquest of the island, and his other successes, that he was sunk into the follies of the younger sort, and become despicable to all the ancients, on account of his new and extravagant way of living. His person was always surrounded with a vast attendance, and crowds of fawning parasites; his table served with most exquisite and far-fetched dainties. He bestowed the vacant commands on his worthless favourites, in prejudice of those, who, by their seniority and merit, were much better intitled to them; c and shut up all avenues to remonstrances or complaints, denying them access to his presence; or, if he vouchsafed audience to any, it was with the most discouraging haughtiness. He even retrenched the usual allowance of the house, and other necessities to the knights, serving-brothers, and domestics, yet ran the house deeply in debt; for these, and such other despotic irregularities, he was first summoned to appear before the chapter, which he disdainfully refused to comply with, so that they came at length to a resolution to depose who is deposed. him.

d THE malecontents had at their head Maurice de Pagnac, a strict but fair observer of the religious discipline, who, under pretence of freeing their order from such an arbitrary governor, found means to get himself elected in his place. Their next aim was to seize on his person; and, as that was now become in some measure inaccessible, they offered a very considerable reward to one of his valets de chambre, to let them into his apartment in the dead of night; but he, instead of accepting of their offer, acquainted his master with what had been resolved against him; who, under some pretence, withdrew himself from the city, and retired to the castle of Lindo, situate on the eastern coast of the island, which he seized; and, Fires to Lindo. having fortified himself in it, sent to signify to the chapter, that he appealed to the pope against their act for his deposition, or any other they might pass against his person and dignity.

e ALL those overt-acts of tyranny failed not to turn the hearts of the most moderate against him, and to induce them at last to agree to his deposition. The pope, John XXII. had a full account of all these transactions sent to him, who immediately deputed thither Villaret and Pagnac his competitor, summoned before the pope. Bernard de Mareze, prior of St. Caprius, and Bosolo, his own chaplain, with orders to make a strict inquiry into them, to suspend the two grand masters, and to summon them to appear before him, whilst Gerard de Pins was appointed by his holiness to preside over the order until the matter was determined. They were likewise ordered to seize on all the money, jewels, plate, &c. of Villaret, and to convey them, with an exact inventory of the whole amount, into the treasury of the order, to be applied in the payment of the various sums that had been borrowed from the bank of Florence. The two grand masters, according to the pope's order, set sail for Avignon; but, in their way thither, Villaret was received with such marks of respect, as gave his competitor, de Pagnac, little hopes of getting the better of him. After f several audiences which that pontif granted to each of them, and frequent hearings before the greatest lawyers and cardinals, the deposition of Villaret was condemned as too hasty and illegal; by which de Pagnac easily foresaw that his own condemnation would be the next step; to avoid the disgrace of which he privately retired to Montpelier, where he soon died Pagnac subsides, and dies. of a deep melancholy, which saved the pope the trouble of pronouncing sentence against him.

To preserve, however, his authority over the order, he restored Villaret to his former dignity, but not without having previously bound him in private to resign it again within a Villaret resigned; year, upon condition that he should be invested with one of the richest priories, where he might live in splendor and plenty the remainder of his days. The conditions were exactly abdicates, and dies. fulfilled on both sides; Villaret exchanged his grand mastership for a good priory, and went to spend the remaining four years of his life at his sister's castle of Teyran in Languedoc, and was buried in the great church of St. John in Montpelier, where a stately marble monument was erected to him, which sets forth his great exploits, without mentioning his abdication.

Gerard de Pins defeats

WE observed before, that the two visitors, whom the pope had sent to Rhodes, had left Gerard de Pins, grand general of the order, and an old experienced warrior, governor of the island during the absence of the two masters. This gentleman saw himself soon after attacked by a powerful fleet, consisting of eighty sail of pinks, brigantines, and other vessels, well armed and manned (A), under the command of the famed Orcan, alias Urban, the son of Othman, a prince who had spent most of his time in the field, and had by this time subdued the provinces of Mysia, Lycania, Phrygia, and Caria, the last of which was divided from the island of Rhodes by a narrow channel. It was the neighbourhood of these that made his father attempt the driving of the knights out of it, as hath been hinted above, at an unlucky time. But now the opportunity appeared to him altogether favourable, from the reigning divisions, remissness, and luxury, which had crept into the order, the absence of the grand master, as well as of the greatest part of their galleys, which were then either upon the cruise, or elsewhere employed; insomuch that when news were brought that the Othman fleet was designed against that island, Gerard de Pins had no more than four galleys belonging to the order, and about five Genoese trading vessels, with some few pinks and brigantines of smaller sizes. These, however, he manned with soldiers and inhabitants, and set sail against the enemy, who, though vastly superior in number, yet being less accustomed to sea than land fights, were easily defeated with considerable loss. The Rhodians sunk a great number of their frigates and flat-bottomed vessels, took several more, brought away a great number of prisoners, and dispersed the rest. He sailed next to the island of Episcopia, where he put all the old Rhodian inhabitants mentioned in the last note to the sword, to prevent their ever recovering their antient habitations.

1323.

25. Helion de Villeneuve chosen grand
master.

WHILST these things passed at Rhodes, the knights, who were still at Avignon, being convoked by the pope, and exhorted to peace and unanimity, proceeded to the choice of a grand master to succeed Villaret, who had now abdicated according to his agreement. No man could have a better title to it than the brave Gerard de Pins, who had so greatly signalized himself in defence of their island; yet the pontif had such an influence on that servile chapter, that the choice fell upon one of his own creatures, named Helion de Villeneuve, who, in gratitude to him, sold him some fine seats and lands belonging to the order, in the neighbourhood of Cahors, the capital of Quercy in France, the pope's native country, where he afterwards settled his obscure family, by which means he made himself still surer of his interest and protection in this his new dignity.

chapters.

HE stayed about two years at the pope's court, during which time he convened a general chapter at the city of Montpelier, to reform the abuses which had introduced themselves into the order during his predecessor's government, particularly the remissness of its discipline, the general luxury that reigned among the gayer sort, and, above all, the non-residence of the knights, vast numbers of whom were dispersed through divers parts of Europe, and buried in their commanderies. To recall these, therefore, to their principal house at Rhodes, an act was passed, in which those were declared incapable of rising to any of the dignities of the order, who did not reside a certain number of years in it, and in that time did not engage in some martial expedition at sea or land, for the service of religion, &c. Other statutes were made in this and the subsequent years, to ascertain the different privileges of every class. After having made these regulations, the grand master was detained some months longer by a fit of sickness, which seized him just as he had prepared every thing for his departure, and set sail for his government as soon as he was recovered of it.

Returns to Rhodes.

BUT whilst he was employed in making these regulations for the good of his order, his absence had made room for new ones; so that he found, upon his landing, almost every thing wanted to be rectified. The greatest part of the commanders had left the place upon some pretence or other; the garrisons, for want of being duly paid, were grown shamefully thin; the walls and other out-works were gone to decay; and the same disorders had i Auſt. ſup. citat.

(A) Some authors tell us (1), that this politic prince manned part of his fleet with the old inhabitants of that island, and made them take their families with them, in hopes that they would engage the more heartily in the recovery of their antient lands and habitations; but to that end, left those families in the little island of Episcopia lately described, which he made himself master of in his way to that of Rhodes, and took the stoutest men along with him, to assist him in the conquest of this, as soon as he had defeated the small forces of the order, of which he thought himself sure. His politics, however, failed him, as well as his hopes; and he, who had been hitherto so successful and victorious at land, had the mortification to see his numerous fleet defeated by a much inferior force at sea (2).

a spread themselves in other places under his government; so that his whole time and care were taken up in repairing and strengthening the fortifications, raising new forces, and augmenting his garrisons, which he maintained, it seems, during the rest of his government, at his own charges; and the island was likewise beholden to him for a stout bulwark which he caused to be erected at the head of one of the suburbs, out of his own privy purse. He took the same care of the smaller islands, which he now caused to be visited by proper inspectors, and put under the government of such of his knights as he thought would contribute most to their strength and welfare; and who acquitted themselves accordingly of their commission with such faithfulness and diligence, that they were all quickly after put in a good condition of defence; and their inhabitants so well employed, that there was scarcely one poor
b one left among them. To all this we may add, that the great concourse of knights, which his presence and late wholesome statutes brought into the capital, soon resumed their maritime excursions, and brought plenty and wealth into its capital, and raised it to its pristine splendor. They moreover kept those seas free from corsairs; and the coasts of Cyprus and Lesser Armenia, which used to be infested by that piratical crew, were now quite free from them. His charity and munificence extended themselves to the poorest objects, whether pilgrims or others, who were lodged and provided for in a sumptuous hospital erected for that purpose, and had all their wants both of soul and body plentifully supplied.

WE come now to a more surprising transaction which happened under this grand master, and which we relate only on the credit of some sober authors<sup>1</sup>, though others have made no scruple to call it a mere fable; the reader may pass what judgment he pleases upon it; but, as it hath a relation to some other parts of this history, we cannot dispense with giving a short account of it. Among the many venomous creatures that infested this island, there was a monstrous large one, of an amphibious nature, which harboured in a subterraneous cavern at the end of a large morass, and had made dreadful havock among the small and large cattle, and even among the neighbouring inhabitants; they gave it the name of dragon, but it was more probably either a crocodile or a sea-horse of the first magnitude; and several Rhodian knights had lost their lives at different times in endeavouring to destroy it, firearms not being then in use, and its skin being proof against any other weapon; upon which account the grand master had expressly forbidden making any further attempts against it, under severe penalties. They all readily obeyed, except a Provençal knight, named Deodat de Gozan, who, less regardful of the prohibition, than of the horrid depredations of the monster, resolved at all hazards to rid the island of it.

THAT he might achieve it the more safely, he went out several times to take a distant view of it, till the want of scales, which he observed under his belly, furnished him with an effectual plan for destroying it.

HE first retired to his native castle of Gozan, that he might pursue his project with greater secrecy; and there got an effigy of the monstrous creature, made as exact in colour, shape, and size, as he could, in wood and pasteboard; after which he set about instructing two young mastiffs how to attack him at that tender part, whilst he did the same on horseback with his lance, and in his armour. This exercise he continued several months; after which he sailed back to Rhodes with them, and two of his domestics, and, without shewing himself to any one, went directly to the place, and attacked the furious beast, ordering his two servants to stand on the neighbouring hill, and, in case they saw him fall, to return home, but, if victorious, or unluckily wounded, to come to his assistance. On the first onset he ran with full force against it, but found his lance recoil back, without making the least impression on its skin; but whilst he was preparing to repeat his blow, his horse, affrighted at its hissing and stench, started so suddenly back, that he would have thrown him down, had he not as dextrously dismounted, when, drawing his sword, he gave the monster a desperate wound in the softest part of the belly, out of which quickly flowed a plentiful stream of blood. His faithful dogs no sooner saw it than they seized on the place; and held it so fast, that he could not shake them off; upon which he gave the knight such a violent blow with his tail, as threw him flat on the ground, and laid his whole body upon him; so that he must have been inevitably stifled with his weight and stench, had not his two domestics come immediately to his assistance, and disengaged him from his load. They found him so spent and breathless, that they began to think him dead; but, upon throwing some water on his face, he opened his eyes, and glad was he when the first object that saluted him was the monster dead before him, which had destroyed so many of his order.

THE news of this exploit was no sooner known, than he saw himself surrounded with vast crowds of inhabitants, and met by a great number of knights, who conducted him in a kind of triumph to the palace of the grand master; but great was his mortification here, when, instead of applause and commendations, he received a severe reprimand, and was sent to a prison by him, without being permitted to speak for himself, or any one to intercede for him. A council was quickly called, in which that severe governor highly aggravated his crime, and, with his usual austerity and sternness, insisted upon his being punished with the utmost severity for his breach of obedience and discipline, which he maintained was of more dangerous consequence than all the mischief which that and many more such monsters could do. At length, with much intreaty, he was prevailed upon to content himself with degrading him, and Gozan was accordingly stripped of his cross and habit, an indignity which he esteemed more rigorous than death. He continued some time under this disgrace; after which Villeneuve, who was of a generous temper, and an admirer of valour, having asserted his authority by that severe example, readily yielded to have him received again, b and likewise bestowed many signal favours on him; whilst the people, less sparing of their praises than he, paid him the greatest honours every-where; the head of the monster was fastened on one of the gates of the city, as a trophy of Gozan's victory, which was still to be seen there in Mr. Thevenot's time; and the knights, no less grateful, and sensible of this signal service, readily chose him their grand master upon the demise of Villeneuve, as we shall see in the sequel. However, even in his life-time he bestowed several considerable commanderies upon him, and made him his lieutenant-general and bosom counsellor; rightly concluding, that a person, who had displayed such extraordinary valour and conduct for the safety of that island, could not fail of shewing the same against any of the enemies of Christianity m.

Is restored to favour.

The peaceful state of the order produces luxury, &c.

By this time the island was so well fortified and garrisoned, and the seas so well guarded by the Rhodian gallies, that the Mohammedans had not dared to make any attempts against it either by sea or land, and this by degrees introduced a general remissness. The cruises were neglected, because they could make but few prizes; many of the knights left the island, and returned to Europe, because they found no further opportunities to exert their martial spirit; and many of them neglected to send their respective quotas, or, as they were stiled, responsions, under pretence that the peaceful calm the island enjoyed made them unnecessary; and the far greatest part of them every-where rioted in luxury and sloth, at the expence of the order, to the great scandal of those who had been witnesses of the quite opposite life, for which their order had been so justly esteemed.

The pope's letter to the grand master. His compliance with it.

POPE Benedict XII. who had succeeded John XXII. received frequent complaints against them, that the bestowing of the estates of the templars had infected them with the same vices; but, whilst he was taking the properest means to reduce them to their antient discipline, he was suddenly taken off. His successor Clement VI. was likewise informed of the considerable damages which the corsairs of Africa had done to the islands of Cyprus, Candia, and others of the Archipelago, whilst those who should have protected them were indulging themselves in ease and luxury. That pontif, weary of the frequent complaints which he received from different quarters, wrote a very severe letter to the grand master about it; the result of which was, the calling of a general chapter, in which it was resolved, that six gallies should be fitted and manned accordingly at the port of Rhodes, and maintained at the charges of the order. They likewise made sundry wholesome regulations relating to the dress, table, retinue, &c. of the knights; and appointed three grand visitors to carry them to his holiness, with their humble request that he would back them with his apostolical authority, in order to render them more effectual. The pope was highly satisfied with their ready compliance, and dispatched soon after four of his gallies to join with theirs, and other allies, in order to drive the Turkish corsairs out of Smyrna, which was then in their hands. We have elsewhere shewn the success of that expedition, in which the Rhodian knights behaved with the greatest bravery. The grand master no sooner heard of their having gained that important place, than he caused a fresh supply of forces, arms, and provisions, to be conveyed to it. He applied the short remainder of his days in fortifying the island, f and the grand palace, which last he surrounded with stout walls and stately towers, and other public buildings; he likewise erected particularly a stately church, richly endowed; and departed this life on the 27th of May, in the 23d year of his government, to the regret of the whole order, who had given him the epithet of the happy grand master n.

26. Deodat de Gozan. 1346.

HE was succeeded, as we hinted a little higher, by Deodat de Gozan, who lately delivered the island from a destructive monster. His election being something singular, the reader will not be displeased if we give him a short account of it. The chapter being much divided about the choice of a new master, the more religious part being for one who should keep up the ancient discipline, and the rest less solicitous about that than about having a martial captain who should revive the cruising trade, and lead them to the acquisition of g wealth and honour; when it came to his turn to give his vote, he expressed himself in the

- a following terms: Upon my entering into this assembly, I took a solemn oath not to propose any knight but such as I thought the most worthy of filling up that important post, and the most affectionate to the general good of the order; and, after having seriously considered the present state of Christendom, and the continual wars which we are bound to carry on against the infidels, the steadiness and vigour required to prevent the least remissness in our discipline, I do declare that I do not find any person better qualified for the well governing of our order than myself. He then began to enumerate his former exploits, particularly that of destroying the dragon; but insisted more especially on his behaviour ever since the late grand master had made him his lieutenant-general; and concluded with addressing himself to the electors in these words: You have already had a proof of my government, and cannot but know what you may expect from it; I am therefore persuaded that you cannot, without doing me an injustice, refuse me your votes.

Nominates himself to the grand master-ship.

Speech to the chapter.

ONE may easily imagine the surprise the whole chapter was in when they heard him nominate himself; and some of them could not forbear observing what pity it was that what he had said in support of his own pretensions had not come from any other mouth than his own; but the reflexion displeased the rest, and, upon an impartial comparing his real merit with that of the other candidates, he was elected by the far greater majority, to the no small joy of the Rhodians, who looked upon him as a hero, and as their deliverer.

Is chosen by a great majority.

- IT was not long before his credit and singular prudence gave a new life to the Christian league against the Turks, and his interest procured the command of the fleet to the grand prior of Lombardy, a knight of known valour and experience, who went soon after and surprised that of the Turks, near the small island of Embro in the Archipelago, before the enemy supposed them to be sailed out of their ports; so that they were scattered all over the island. We have elsewhere given an account of that noble action, where the Rhodian admiral took about 120 of their pinks, brigantines, and smaller vessels, put their larger galleys to flight, and brought away above 5000 slaves out of that island.

Defeats the Turks at sea.

- THIS great victory was followed soon after by another, which he gained in Lesser Armenia over the Saracens of Egypt, who had made themselves masters of a great part of the country. The king of it had applied to Gozan for some assistance, who, looking upon him as a Christian prince, though a schismatic, made no difficulty to equip a powerful fleet, with a considerable body of infantry, which he sent under the command of some of his bravest knights, who, having joined the Armenian forces, immediately engaged the enemy. The fight was fierce and obstinate on both sides for some time, the Saracens not dreaming of any other enemy than the Armenians, whom they had often defeated; but, when they came to try the valour and bravery of the Rhodian forces, they dwindled into mere cowards and runaways. The greatest part of them were slain in the heat of the action, and a great number of fugitives taken prisoners; together with all their baggage, and the victors did not leave the country till they had driven the invaders out of all their conquests.

Defeats the Saracens.

- IN the mean while the Christian league being broke by the parsimony of the pope, and the war between the Venetians and Genoese, that pontiff sent the grand master a letter, to persuade him to accept of the truce which the grand signor offered. To which he nobly answered, that though he saw himself abandoned by all his allies, yet the rules and oath of his order would not permit him to enter into any treaty with the enemies of Christianity; and till it pleased God to raise him some new allies, he was determined at least to stand on the defensive. Having now more leisure upon his hands, he set about examining the accounts of the order, and wrote pressing letters to all the commanders and priors, who had been tardy in sending their respective quotas or responses, to transmit all their arrears without delay. Amongst them some very remarkable ones were directed to the priors of Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, in which he severely reminds them of their breach of faith, for having neglected to send their respective contributions ever since their loss of the Holy Land, though they could not be ignorant of their present establishment in the isle of Rhodes, and continued in a shameful inactivity all this time, to the great dishonour of their profession; adding, that if they did not immediately transmit, with their respective arrears, a detachment of their youngest knights, they should find in him a master that knew how to punish their disobedience, as well as how to treat those with the tenderness of a father, who complied with their duty, and his commands.

- IN the next year pope Clement VI. who had granted the order some privileges and immunities, in return for some favours they had shewn to his nephew the viscount of Turenne, wrote him a letter of thanks, but at the same time acquainted him in it, that the doge and senate of Venice greatly complained of his suffering several of his knights to engage in the war between the Genoese and them, contrary to the intent of their institution, which permitted them to bear arms only against the enemies of the Christian faith. To this Gozan replied, that, in an order which consisted of such a variety of nations, it was not to be wondered at that some private persons should shew a particular zeal for their own country, and that he doubted not but there were as many such on the Venetian as on the Genoesè side; which, however, he said, was highly disapproved of by the order, as well as by himself, neither of whom had taken any part between those two contending powers<sup>1</sup>.

That pontif's message,

and threats to him.

ACCORDINGLY, when that pontif's successor, Innocent VI. some time after earnestly exhorted him to engage in favour of Matthew Paleologus, against the emperor John the son of Andronicus, and even sent that prince with the letter, earnestly pressing him to assist him to recover the crown, tho' all the pretence he had to it with that pontif was, that he engaged, in case he was reenthroned, to reunite the Greek to the Latin church; an old shift, which those princes made use of to obtain the assistance of the Latins; Gozan made no difficulty to refuse intermeddling with their difference, as inconsistent with his order; but, to avoid that pontif's granting him a dispensation for it, he wrote him word moreover, that the treasury of the order was in a manner exhausted through the avarice of the priors in Europe, who sunk the revenue into their own coffers, and were upheld therein by their princes, especially in France, Castile, Arragon, &c. To this he added, that his extreme old age rendered him incapable of governing so extensive an order, and made his authority to be less regarded; upon which account he begged earnestly that his holiness would permit him to resign it to some more able and active person. Innocent, instead of complying with his request, which he told him his own merit and great services to Christianity would not permit him to do, exhorted him by fresh letters to bear courageously the burden of government, till Providence should think fit to ease him of it. Upon which he resolved to dedicate the short remainder of his life in fortifying the city and island of Rhodes, and causing a convenient mole to be built in the latter for the ease and safety of the gallies of the order. But, whilst he was thus usefully taken up, his mind was sensibly affected both with the pope's refusal, and still more with the decay of discipline, which he saw with grief to augment every day, without being able to remedy it. This made him renew his request to the pontif; which he did in such strong terms, and backed with such powerful reasons, that he at length consented to his abdication.

BUT, whilst his bull for it was dispatching at that court, Gozan, quite worn out with old age, fatigues, and affliction, resigned his life, greatly regretted by the whole order, and much more by the inhabitants, who respected him as their father and deliverer. He expired on the 7th of December, in the 7th year of his government; his funeral obsequies were performed in a manner answerable to his merit, and an epitaph engraven upon his tomb, with only these words, Draconis extirpor, or The destroyer of the dragon<sup>2</sup>.

PETER DE CORNILLAN, or CORMILLAN, of the same county of Provence, some say Dauphiny, a grave and austere person, was chosen his successor; who, immediately after his election, convened a general chapter at Rhodes, to reform some grievous abuses which were crept in, particularly that of using the grand master's seal without his knowlege or order, in sealing orders and acquittances, which were afterwards sent to the treasury; to avoid which fraud for the future, a statute was passed, that such orders, acquittances, and other matters relating to the finances, should no longer be sealed with his seal, but with that of the convent, and in full council. Another, and no less prejudicial, abuse committed by those priors, in assuming the right of nominating to the commanderies, to the prejudice of seniority and merit, was likewise redressed, by restraining that privilege to the grand master and his council. His thoughts were, however, taken off from this laudable and useful work, by an order, no less preposterous than selfish, which he received from the pope, to abandon Rhodes, and to go and settle himself and his order on some part of Terra Firma, near the Turkish dominions, either on the side of Palestine or Anatolia, in order to prevent the Turks, who by this time had conquered part of the latter, seized on Nicca, Bursa, and Nicomedia, and had already passed the Hellepont, from settling in Negropont, and thence penetrating farther into Europe; a wild and most impolitic project this! but from which that infatuated pontif, dismayed at the rapidity of Othman's conquests, could not be diverted by any reasons that could be offered against it. But to give it the greater weight with the grand master and chapter, he sent three of the most considerable knights of the order to them, with orders to represent, in the strongest terms, the grievous complaints which had been made to him against their shameful inactivity and lethargy, at a time when the Turks had ravaged the greatest part of Greece, and were now threatening Italy; and to charge them immediately to set about transplanting their settlement to some country nearer the Holy Land (a thing, he said, which his three immediate predecessors, John XXII. Benedict II. and Clement II. had tried in vain to move them to, for the good of Christendom), and to assure them, that in a case they refused to comply with his commands, he would not fail of taking all proper measures to oblige them to it, and bestow the immense riches of the templars, which so shamefully lulled them in inactivity and wanton ease, upon a new military order that would much better answer the end of their institution.

b To this severe and threatening message the grand master meekly answered, that he could not thus hastily abandon an island which had cost some of the best blood of the order, without the general consent of his brethren; and that he would summon a grand chapter of them, to consult about it; but the pontif, rightly judging that the fortifications, riches, haven, navy, &c. would prove an invincible obstacle to their consent, if that chapter was held at Rhodes, immediately ordered it by an express bull to be held at Nismes; which bull, he told them, they were to look upon as an irrefragable testimony of his will, however his former orders might have been misinterpreted by ill-designing minds, that they should forthwith seek a new settlement near the frontiers of the infidels. The result was, that the perplexity into which this new and positive order threw the grand master, between his duty to his brethren and his obedience to the pope, put a speedy end to his life, in the 18th month after his election; in whose room the chapter chose

c ROGER DE PINS, alias DE PINIBUS, of the tongue of Provence, a person of an illustrious family in Languedoc, and nearly related to Otho de Pins, formerly grand master of the order, and of the famed Gerard de Pins, who had lately gained that signal victory over Orcan the son of Othman, during the absence of the grand master, of which we lately gave an account. The pope, however, as intent upon his project as ever, to prevent all delays and opposition from the knights, ordered the grand chapter to be held at Avignon instead of Nismes. By good fortune some hint was given him in the mean time, that Morea would be a much more convenient place for the Rhodians to settle in than in the neighbourhood of Palestine, where it would be impossible for them to defend themselves against the formidable forces of the Turks and Saracens. The pope immediately approved the proposal; and the knights, in order to gain time, appointed commissaries and other officers to treat about it with Robert the tutelar emperor of Constantinople, and James of Savoy, prince of Piedmont, who both laid claim to that peninsula. However, the grand chapter thought it expedient at the same time to suppress some abuses loudly complained against, and chiefly relating to the misapplication of sundry revenues of the templars appropriated to charitable uses, and to order them to be restored to their antient chanel, in order to put a stop to all such complaints.

d NEITHER did this assembly scruple to prefer some no less grievous ones against that pontif, who abused his authority over them, rather in oppressing than protecting them, and took upon him the bestowing some of the richest commanderies and priories on a favourite Arragonian, named Heredia, to the great prejudice of seniority and merit. Upon which the grand master thought fit to send some ambassadors to intreat his holiness to recall his nomination, and to consider the great injury he did to their order; but they found him inflexible as well as his favourite, whom they were likewise ordered to induce, if possible, to desist from his pretensions; instead of which, his insolence carried him so far, as to pocket up the whole income of those priories, without transmitting any part of his responsions to the order. To have preferred fresh complaints against such a powerful favourite, would have only disoblinded the pontif, whom it was their interest to manage at such a juncture: however, to avoid so pernicious an example becoming a precedent in process of time, the grand master convened afresh a general chapter at Rhodes, where this and the like abuses were guarded against by proper regulations. Soon after which he died, on the 27th of May, in the 10th year of his government, after having, by his prudence and credit, dexterously avoided the fatal blow which the pontif had levelled against the whole order, caused all the statutes of the order to be translated into Latin and confirmed anew, and almost exhausted his private estate, sold all his plate and jewels, and even moveables, to supply the pressing wants of the sick and indigent during the whole time of a grievous pestilence and famine, which had raged through all the east, for which they gave him the emphatic epithet of Almoner.

e HE was succeeded by Raymond Berenger, descended from the illustrious family of that name in Dauphiny, who signalized the beginning of his government by the number of gallees which he equipped against the Egyptian corsairs which infested those seas, and all the coasts of the island of Cyprus, where they committed the most dreadful ravages. Berenger, not content to destroy many of them on the open sea, ventured even to go, in conjunction with those of the king of Cyprus, and burn them in the very port of Alexandria. The fleet consisted of above 100 sail of different bulks and nations, most of which had been hired for that expedition, without however communicating his design to any but pope Urban V. now raised to that dignity. They accordingly set sail with this great armament, and arrived in less than five days at the walls of that capital. They immediately began to scale them with the most obstinate courage, and in spite of the strenuous opposition of a numerous garrison, a which, with their missile weapons, boiling oil, and other destructive means, destroyed them almost as fast as they mounted. We have elsewhere given an account of this surprising action, in which the grand master lost a vast number of his knights, and the Cypriots of their troops; but brought home an immense plunder, and a great number of slaves, after having burnt that noble city, which he could not keep longer, on account of the approach of the sultan, who was in full march against him, at the head of a powerful army.

His next expedition was against that of Tripoly in Syria, which he sacked and plundered; and on the next year was sent, by order of the pope, into the island of Cyprus, to suppress some intestine feuds which had happened in that island, of which commission he acquitted himself with his usual prudence and success.

BUT upon his return to Rhodes he had the mortification to learn, that the order could hardly obtain any supply from the responses in Europe, through the avarice of the priors and commanders; which he took so much to heart, that he desired leave of the new pontif, Gregory XI. to abdicate; but the pope, who knew his merit too well to consent to it, found a proper expedient to relieve him of his cares, by summoning a general chapter of the order at Avignon, to consult of the properest means for redressing that grievance, at which he should however be exempted from assisting, on account of his extreme old age, and be only obliged to send thither an account of them, together with such other regulations as he thought most conducive to the revival of their antient discipline. By this means several wholesome statutes were enacted in that assembly, pursuant to the memorial which Berenger had caused to be sent to them; one of which was, that, in all future elections of a grand master, instead of the usual method of taking the votes of all the knights, each tongue should chuse two electors from among themselves; with respect to the sovereign council of the order it was likewise resolved, that it should not be looked upon as complete, unless there were in it eight conventual bailiffs, three grand priors, the president of the infirmary, and at least two knights of each tongue, with the grand master at their head, who, as president, and in regard to his dignity, should alone have two votes; and that this grand council, when thus complete, should alone have the disposal of the vacant priories and commanderies<sup>b</sup>. These statutes, having been approved by the pope, were transmitted to the grand master, to his no small satisfaction; which however he did not live to see the fruits of, but died in the same year, after having governed the order about eight years and six months<sup>c</sup>.

HE was succeeded by Robert de Julliac, or Jully, grand prior of France, and then residing in his priory; who no sooner received the news of his election, than he went to pay his respects to the pope at Avignon, before he embarked for Rhodes. The first thing he did after his arrival, was to turn out all the receivers on his side of the water, who had been tardy in their trust. He next was obliged to take upon him the defence of the castle and lower town of Smyrna, which had been taken during the time of the Christian league, as hath been hinted before, and which that pontif now forced him to take under his protection, and as now properly belonging to his order; charging him, under pain of excommunication, to send forthwith a sufficient number of his bravest knights thither, with a competent number of forces and other provisions for its defence. It is surprising to read with what emulous readiness a great number of the Rhodian knights offered themselves to go and defend that place, as soon as the grand master, at his arrival, acquainted the chapter with the pope's positive commands, notwithstanding the imminent danger that attended it, and the unlikelihood of the Turkish sultan's suffering them to remain long in possession of a place in the heart of his dominions, and which they had with such singular valour wrenched out of his hands.

THE very reverse was more to be feared at this juncture, in which Soliman, the warlike son of Orcan, now on the throne, had in less than two years made himself master of the greatest part of Thrace, and of the city of Adrianople; and his no less fortunate successor Amurat had extended his conquests still farther, and was at that time at the head of a powerful armament, the weight of which, tho' none could certainly know where it would fall, yet seemed to threaten both Smyrna and the isle of Rhodes. The grand master failed not to inform the pope of all these preparations, who thereupon convened a chapter of the principal commanders of the order, to meet at Avignon, in the month of March following, in which it was resolved, that 500 knights, and the same number of esquires, or serving brethren, should forthwith repair, the former to Rhodes, who were all to be nominated by the priors, and the latter to be chosen by the knights so nominated; soon after which the grand master died, and was succeeded by

- a account of his great interest with the pope, of whose firm favour and friendship they stood now more in need than ever, than for any affection they could have for a man whose ambition and avarice had done so much injury to the order. They were however agreeably surprised soon after to find him become, from one of the greatest oppressors, one of the most generous benefactors to it. He had been married twice, in hopes to inherit his brother's estate, who was of one of the noblest and richest families in Arragon, but had no children by his wife, when he was at length disappointed by her having two sons; upon which, his last wife being dead, he easily got himself admitted into the order by his address, and had attained by degrees to the dignity of castellan of the imposts, one of the highest and most profitable offices, next to that of the grand master. Not content with it, he, by his intriguing genius, gained such an influence over his holiness, that he did hardly any thing without his advice, and had raised him to one of the richest priories in Spain, without the grand master's knowledge, though it was properly in his and the chapter's gift. But when he came himself to be raised to that dignity, his mind took a quite different turn, and it became his chief ambition and delight to promote the interest and honour of the order, as well as to maintain the privileges of his place as grand master, as we shall see in the sequel.
- b His first care, after the news of the election had reached him, was, to provide himself with such a noble fleet as might at once support and give lustre to his new dignity. Accordingly he embarked, attended with nine large galleys, and a great number of adventurers whom he had taken in pay at his own charge. He was just ready to set sail, when he was obliged, at the earnest request of Gregory XI. who had just then succeeded Urban V. in the papal chair, to suspend his journey for some time, in order to accompany him from thence to Rome, whither he designed to sail as soon as possible, not only in hopes that his presence would quell the troubles that then reigned in Italy, but also to prevent another pope being chosen there, if he tarried any longer at Avignon<sup>d</sup>. He embarked accordingly at Marseilles, in the grand master's galleys, who commanded them in person, and was accompanied by the grand priors of St. Giles, England, and Rome, and arrived safe at Civita Vecchia, whence the grand master accompanied him in great pomp to his own capital, bearing himself the standard of the order before him on horseback, through the loud acclamations of the people<sup>e</sup>.
- d HEREDIA, in haste to return to Rhodes, embarked soon after for that island, where he was impatiently expected by the whole convent. In his way he met with the Venetian fleet near the coasts of Morea, that republic being then at war with the Turks, who had taken the city of Patras, famed for its silk commerce. The Venetian admiral went into his galley to intreat him to assist him in the recovery of so important a place from the hands of those infidels. The two fleets, being joined, sailed directly to it, where having landed their forces, Heredia immediately began to scale it at that place where the walls had been most damaged in the late siege, and made himself master of it without any great opposition, the Turkish governor having reserved the best part of his garrison for the defence of the castle. This last, which was situate on the highest part of the city, was likewise besieged in form with the same bravery and success. The Turks made indeed a vigorous defence; but this served only to whet the impatience of our knights, and much more that of their grand master, who no sooner saw a sufficient breach made by his engines, than he mounted it the first, sword in hand, without minding whether any of them followed him; and, having gained the top, flung himself down, more like a young candidate for glory and preferment, than like one that was at the summit of both. Here he was immediately encountered by the governor, and a bloody single combat was fought between them, in which Heredia had the good fortune to run his sword through the body of his enemy, and laid him flat at his feet. In the mean time the rest of the knights came pouring down to his assistance, immediately after which followed a general slaughter of the garrison, who were all put to the sword<sup>f</sup>.
- e THE success of this enterprize soon enlarged the views of the grand master, who now began to propose the conquest of the whole peninsula. Corinth was the next place that was agreed upon to be attacked, the situation and fortifications of which he resolved to reconnoitre in person. But, unfortunately for him, being unprovided with a sufficient escort, he fell into an ambush of the Turks, who killed all his attendants, and sent him prisoner to the sultan, without suspecting that he was more than a knight of the order. The three grand priors, who, as we hinted above, accompanied him from Marseilles through this whole expedition, as soon as they heard of his being taken, sent forthwith to offer the restitution of Patras for his ransom; but the sultan, who had been informed who his prisoner was by some deserters, rejected the offer with scorn; and sent them word, that as he was still master of the rest of Morea, he knew how to recover that city in less time than they had spent in taking it. This mortifying repulse, joined to the disgrace of leaving their grand master a prisoner in the hands of infidels, induced them to send a second offer of a considerable sum, besides the surrender of Patras, for his ransom, and engaged to remain hostages in his hands till that was paid. But though the Turks readily agreed to it, the grand master, then closely confined in the castle of Corinth, no sooner heard of it, than he as generously rejected it:

His singular generosity.

Leave me, my dear brethren, said he, in his answer to them, leave a superannuated and useless old man to die in bonds, whilst you who are young and active reserve yourselves for the services of religion. At length, when those who were permitted to speak to him had tried in vain, by their tears and intreaties, to obtain his consent, he replied, If such a large sum must be paid for my ransom, let it not be out of the treasury of our order; my family hath been sufficiently enriched by my means to give me that testimony of their gratitude. One might have expected that the Turks, sordid as they are, might have been moved by such a singular instance of generosity; but all the effect it had upon them, was, that they sent him into a closer prison in Albania, and condemned him to a severer confinement, where he was kept above three years, during which he was at full leisure to make the most serious reflections on the instability of human affairs <sup>a</sup>.

Closely confined

In the same fatal year in which he was taken prisoner, died Gregory XI. on the 2d of March, whose death was followed by that dreadful schism between Urban VI. and Clement VII. of which an account hath been given in a former volume, and of which we shall only say here, that it caused another in the order, part holding for the former, but indeed the grand master, and the greatest part of the knights, for the latter; but more especially after Heredia was returned from his captivity, out of which he had been redeemed by the sums which his family furnished him with; for he then, at the head of the whole convent, publicly declared for Clement VII. in revenge for which, Urban, by his own authority, deposed him, and nominated one Richard Carracciolo, grand prior of Capua, to his dignity; so that there were now two grand masters in the order, as well as two pontiffs in the church; but, if we except those of the Italian and English tongues, and some few commanders in Germany, all the rest as steadily adhered to Heredia as the others did to Clement VII. A much greater abuse had crept into the order during his imprisonment, which he quickly discovered when he came to examine the public accounts; for in that small space of time the commanders and priors had assumed such a kind of independency, and made themselves the judges of what portion of their responsions they should transmit to the public treasury, without any farther regard to the orders of the council, than what they deemed sufficient for the present exigencies. Many of those of the north had quite desisted from keeping up their respective quotas; all which had run the order so greatly in arrear, that he saw himself obliged to take a journey to Avignon, where Clement VII. resided, to beg of that pontiff to interpose his authority, in order to oblige those faithless stewards to refund their ill-gotten wealth, and to clear up all their arrears; but, before he set out, the council obliged him to a solemn oath, that he would faithfully transmit into the public treasury all the sums which he should receive from the respective priories above-mentioned; and that he would not dispose of any vacant benefices until his return to Rhodes. For still further security, they appointed a certain number of knights, whom they knew to be very zealously attached to the interest of the order to accompany him, under pretence indeed of his making a greater appearance, but in reality to be watchful of all his motions; but that precaution was no less needless than their apprehensions were groundless, as the sequel plainly shews <sup>b</sup>.

Goes to Avignon.

At his arrival at Avignon the pope appeared sensibly touched at the melancholy account he gave of the state of their treasury, through the avarice and ambition of their faithless stewards; and much more so, when he told his holiness, that he had forbore pressing them too hard for their arrears, lest that should induce some of them to turn schismatics to save their unrighteous mammon. Three chapters were thereupon summoned successively, one at Valentia in Dauphiny, the second at Avignon, and the third at the castellanery of imposts for Spain, in all three of which the grand master presided; and partly by his pathetic discourses and behaviour, and partly by the danger he represented the order, and even Christendom, to be then in, thro' those abuses, more especially at this juncture, when Bajazet, now upon the Turkish throne, seemed to threaten both Smyrna and Rhodes, he made such an impression upon them, that many of them immediately offered themselves to attend him back to Rhodes, others engaged to remit all their arrears to the treasury, and several other wholesome regulations were made in each of these chapters; after which the grand master founded two rich commanderies in Spain, and endowed them out of the vast estates which he had formerly heaped up, by way of restitution. His co-rival Carracciolo, not to be behind-hand with him, did <sup>c</sup>

- a much the same in Italy, and died soon after. Boniface IX. however, who had succeeded Urban at Rome, declined appointing him a successor, whether for fear of his being rejected <sup>His co-vict at Sic.</sup> by the order, or out of regard to Heredia, for whom he had conceived a singular respect, and contented himself with appointing a relation of his own to be his lieutenant pro tempore. Heredia being returned to Avignon, and finding the arrears and subsidies which had been promised to him at those three chapters to come in but slowly, sacrificed another considerable part of his own estate in sending at different times some of his gallies to Rhodes and Smyrna, with fresh supplies of arms, provisions, vast sums of money <sup>Sends supplies to Rhodes and Smyrna.</sup> to pay their forces, and a good number of knights and other troops to assist in the defence of those two places. He held afterwards another council at Avignon, wherein it being
- b represented, that the walls and circuit of Smyrna were by far too large, and would require a much more numerous garrison in it than the order could well maintain, they came to a resolution, that they should forthwith be reduced in proportion: to that end, the admiral of Germany was ordered by the grand master to see it done accordingly, and had 4000 florins assigned to him for that end out of his own coffers.

In the March following of the same year in which Carracciolo died at Rome, died also the grand master Heredia at Avignon, in an extreme old age, after having enjoyed that dignity <sup>Dies at Avignon, 1396.</sup> nineteen years and eight months, with the greatest reputation". His remains were afterwards conveyed to Capso, and buried in the church of that commandery which himself had founded, and which became from that time a chief bailiwick of the order. He left

c behind a good number of excellent regulations, both for the reformation and retention of the ancient discipline, which the reader may see among the other statutes of the order<sup>o</sup>, and which testify his zeal for religion, and the interest of his order, and his great wisdom and capacity for the government of it.

- On the first news of his death the grand chapter at Rhodes chose for his successor Philibert <sup>32. Philibert de Naillac.</sup> de Naillac, grand prior of Aquitain, a person equally respected for his valour and prudence. We have elsewhere seen what a powerful league the Christian princes had entered into against that formidable force of sultan Bajazet, in consequence of the crusade which the pope had published the year before. Philibert was scarcely elected to his new dignity, before
- d he was earnestly pressed by that pontif, and other princes, to join with them in it, as he accordingly did with great readiness, and immediately ordered his quota of gallies to be <sup>Enters into the Christian league.</sup> equipped, and to join those of the Greek emperor, and the Venetians, under the command of the famed Thom-Mocenisco, whilst himself prepared all things in order to meet the land forces at the head of his chief commanders, and a great number of Rhodian knights, at the general rendezvous in Hungary. They had scarcely joined them, before Sigismund, then on the Hungarian throne, and at the head of the allied army, sent to compliment him on his arrival, and to invite them into his own quarters, declaring, that he designed to fight at their head; and, as he was no less pleased with their noble appearance, than satisfied with the valour and merit of their commander, placed him and his chief officers near his own pavilion. The rest of the confederate army was very numerous, and made also a gallant
- e shew, and was commanded by some of the most experienced generals in Europe; and yet Bajazet, then in Anatolia, had taken such precautions to stop all intelligence from them, that they did not even know where his own lay; insomuch that when he was got within a day's journey from Nicopolis, which they were then besieging, they, supposing him to be still in Anatolia, were scattered about the place without fear, discipline, or mistrust.

- We have already given a large account of the ill success of that expedition, and fatal combat, which proved rather a general rout to the Christians than a regular fight. The Rhodians, whose history we are now chiefly concerned in, quickly rallied under their grand master, about the person of king Sigismund, and fought with the utmost bravery. The greatest part of them died sword in hand; and that prince and Naillac must have undergone the same fate, if Providence had not thrown a fisher's boat in their way, into which they escaped through a thick cloud of arrows from the enemy, and rowed to the mouth of the Danube, where the Christian fleet, which was not far off, gladly received them. They both went on board one of the Rhodian gallies, whence they sailed directly for that island, where they were received, if not with shouts of joy, yet with all the respect due to two such great persons. Sigismund embarked soon after for Dalmatia, and left the grand master to bewail the loss of so many brave knights, and to set about the most effectual means to retrieve his disgrace and misfortune.
- f

- SOME time after arrived at Rhodes the despot of Morea, Theodore Palcolagus, where he was likewise honourably received; and it was at this interview that he proposed to the grand master and his chapter the selling of that peninsula to them, to which they readily
- g consented. He was, in virtue of this agreement, to deliver up to them Corinth, Sparta, and <sup>Morea sold to the order by Theo. Palcolagus.</sup>

the other principal cities of the province, and they to pay him the price agreed on in money<sup>a</sup> and jewels before his departure†. The grand master immediately sent proper commissaries to go and take possession of those places, who were accordingly received by the magistracy and inhabitants of Corinth with great demonstrations of joy, not questioning, but, under the protection of so powerful and warlike an order, they should thenceforth be freer from the incursions of the Turks. But it proved otherwise at Sparta, where the treacherous Greek bishop, an enemy consequently to the Latins, so instigated the citizens against them, that they forthwith dispatched some deputies to inform the commissaries, that they were resolved to admit none of them into their city; and that if they offered to come nearer, they should be treated as enemies. Some other less considerable places, however, gladly followed the example of the Corinthians, and received them with marks of honour; but as they were not provided with a sufficient number of forces to oblige Sparta to submit, they returned back to Rhodes time enough before the despot had left the island; and, upon his being informed of the repulse they had met with from that city, he refunded some small part of the money, and set sail directly for that place. His subjects, glad of his return, received him with all the marks of joy and duty, assuring him, that they should be still ready to shew him the same obedience and loyalty that he had experienced in them during such a number of years, provided he forbore treating with the Latins, and admitting any into his government: but intimated to him at a distance, that they would prefer being subject to the Turks, or any other power, rather than to that of the pope, or any other Latin prince.

By all this he easily found, that it would be next to impossible to make them consent to his agreement with the Rhodians; but he was no less concerned about refunding the money which he had received from them for that city, which, as his circumstances then stood, he could hardly spare. On the other hand, the grand master, hearing nothing from him upon the subject, sent him some of the most considerable knights of the order to compromise the matter; and, after sundry voyages to and fro, and many other demurs, it was at length agreed, that the order should restore the city of Corinth to him, in consideration of which Paleologus should deliver up to them the country of the Sun, and the barony of Zetona, both in the same province of Corinth, besides 46,500 ducats in money, 22,000 of which he then paid in ready coin‡.

WHILST these things had been transacting, the grand master, who foresaw the danger Smyrna was in of being quickly attacked by the conquering arms of Timur Beg, or Tamerlane, had taken all proper means to put it into a state of defence, supplied it with arms, and all necessary provisions, and sent thither William de Mira, at the head of a good number of knights, to command in it, and put all the fortifications of that place in the best condition to withstand a siege; of which he acquitted himself so faithfully, that Bajazet himself allowed it to be impregnable. But after his signal defeat, of which we have elsewhere given an account, Timur, whose rapid successes made him think no place capable of standing out against him, pitched upon it for the first scene of the war which he had declared against the Rhodians, as being the only people, who, though sworn enemies to the Turks, had refused to submit to him. He would much rather have begun with that of Rhodes, though no less strongly fortified, as it was the centre and seat of the order, and would have yielded him more laurels and richer spoils; but, wanting shipping to transport his troops, he rather chose to begin with Smyrna, whose spacious haven, he hoped, might in time furnish him with a sufficient number of them. We need not here repeat his success against that place, though it was no less gallantly defended by the Rhodians than attacked by his own troops§; the taking of which, especially as the conqueror, according to custom, caused it to be razed, was rather an advantage than a loss to the Rhodians, as it had been forced upon them by the see of Rome so much against their will; but the slaughter of such a considerable number of knights, whom that barbarian caused to be butchered, was what sensibly affected the grand master and the whole order. However, to retrieve as much as possible so great a loss, the grand master formed the project of seizing upon an old castle, situated in the bay of Ceramie, upon that coast, about 12 miles from the island. He went himself on board his fleet, and sailed along the coasts of Caria; and, entering into the castle in which Timur had left a small garrison, he made himself master of it. But as he did not find it strong enough for his purpose, he caused a new one to be built, upon the rocky point of a peninsula that extended itself into the sea, and called it the castle of St. Peter; and the Turks, since they became masters of it, gave it the name of Budroo castle¶. He spared neither cost nor labour to have it strongly fortified both on the land and sea side; after which he caused a large fosse to be digged into the rock around it, into which the sea water could a easily come. A stout garrison was put into it, and a certain number of vessels of different sizes were constantly kept in the harbour, which, upon the least signal, were ready to join the galleys of Rhodes and Lango, and by that means shut up mouth of the river Caria to all the corsairs and pirates, whilst the castle itself served as a place of refuge for all Christian slaves that made their escapes from the neighbouring countries.

Soon after this arrived at Rhodes the Genoese admiral, marshal Boucicault, with seven large vessels and nine galleys, in his way to Cyprus; the occasion of whose sailing to this last island with so great a force, was, the war of the Genoese with the Cyprian king Janus, of which an account hath been given in a former volume. But though the grand master gave him a noble reception at his landing, and entertained him with great splendor during his stay with him, yet he made no scruple to declare his mind freely to him with respect to his design against the Cypriots, which, he told him, would prove the most effectual means of opening a way to the Saracens into that island, which had hitherto proved so strong a bulwark against them, and a staple to all the European shipping. He begged of him at the same time, and in the strongest terms, that he would permit him to sail thither before him, not doubting but, with the blessing of God, he should find means to restore peace between these two nations. The admiral, having given his consent, ordered his capitana, and two other galleys, to be got ready, and embarked forthwith for the island of Cyprus. At the same time Boucicault went on board his own; and, that he might not continue idle during the grand master's absence, went and ravaged the country round Alexandretta, then called Lescanderonos, or Scanderona, on the coasts of Syria, and made himself master of some places there, as we have elsewhere shewn. The grand master proved no less successful in the mediatorial office he had undertaken. His great credit and unexpected presence quickly terminated all the differences between these two nations in an amicable manner, as we have seen in their respective histories.

THE peace was no sooner concluded than the grand master and marshal Boucicault set sail from that island, and, in their way homewards, jointly ravaged the coasts of Syria and Palestine, at that time in the hands of either the Saracens or the Tartarian troops, which Timur had left there to guard them. They made likewise an attempt to surprise the city of Tripoli; but, to their disappointment, found the avenues to it on the sea-side guarded by 15,000 men belonging to that prince, among whom were 600 of his horse, which appeared all clad in velvet and golden tissue, if we may credit the writer of that admiral's life. Yet was all this numerous appearance so far from deterring the Rhodian knights from landing, that they strove who should cast himself first into the sea with their swords in hand, and the water up to their chin. These, backed by about 3000 of the Genoese forces (a small number against 15,000), marched against them with such surprising fury, that they drove them to the very walls of the city, where they were intrenched up to the neck behind their barriers and fascines. But though to us it must appear no better than a bravado, if not a piece of martial madness, to have carried their attempts farther against such a number of forces so barricadoed, and backed by so strong a garrison, yet such was the ambition of the grand master and Genoese admiral, that they would not depart till they made a fresh assault against them, in which there was a deal of blood shed, and many a death's wound given on both sides, till the enemy, who, being five to one more numerous, and of course must suffer the greater loss of the two, were prudent enough to secure themselves from their fury by withdrawing, some into the adjacent orchards and gardens, and others into the city. However, as they had not troops enough to form the siege of the place, they agreed to go and try their fortune against Barut, alias Berytus, a wealthy staple sea-port on the Phœnician coasts, in which a great number of Christian merchants, especially the Venetians, had their rich ware and country houses. As they were sailing thitherwards, they observed a light vessel sailing out of the haven, and endeavouring to gain the sea with more than usual speed, but which was soon brought back by one of their galleys which they sent after it. Upon examining the captain of it, they could get nothing out of him, but that he was a Christian and a Venetian, till they began to threaten him with the torture; upon which he confessed, that he had been dispatched from Venice into all the sea-ports of Phœnicia, Palestine, and Egypt, to give them notice, that the Christian fleet, commanded by the grand master of Rhodes and the admiral of Genoa, was at sea, that they might take their precautions against them; at which both the Rhodians and Genoese were so exasperated, that they were for throwing him into the sea, but were prevented by their officers. This did not prevent their pursuing their design on Barut, which they plundered and burnt. Their next descent was on Said or Zaid, which they found likewise strongly guarded, and where a violent storm hindered their landing all their forces, so that those that were got on shore were attacked on all sides with great fury by the Saracens.

FINDING, therefore, the coasts so well guarded every where, and the season now far advanced, they agreed to separate. Boucicault sailed away to Famagosta, and the grand master to Rhodes, where he soon after received a visit of thanks from the admiral, furnished his fleet with plenty of provisions, and, after having regaled him with a view of the whole island, sent him home full of admiration at the vast strength of it, the fortifications of the city, the great quantity and variety of gallies and other vessels riding in the harbour, and the surprising number and gallantry of his knights, by whom those seas were so well guarded, that scarce any corsairs dared shew themselves on them; all which was the more admirable, at a time when the schism, which so long rent the church, had proved no less detrimental to the order, by the advantage which the grand priors and commanders took from it to withdraw, and appropriate those quotas and responsions which they ought to have transmitted into the public treasury: for the suppressing of which grievous abuses they were, as we have had frequent occasion to hint, obliged very often to have recourse to the pope, and other crowned heads, to hold chapters in different places of Europe, and to other measures no less burdensome and chargeable to them<sup>c</sup>.

Makes an ad-
peace with the sultan.

How dreaded their power and interest were become by this time among their enemies, may be gathered from the overtures of peace which the haughty sultan was glad to make them, by a particular embassy to Rhodes, by the advantageous articles of which in favour of the order, and the Christians in Palestine, one may plainly see that the grand master accepted his offers in a great measure upon his own terms. The happy turn which the affairs of Christendom took about this time did not a little contribute to his obtaining such an advantageous peace, namely, the unanimous zeal which appeared in the greatest part of the cardinals, as well as crowned heads, to put a final end to the schism, by reducing the church to the obedience of one head. It was to that end that the famed council of Pisa was convened, of which an account hath been elsewhere given, to which the grand master was solemnly invited, and the guard of the conclave committed to his care. But what gave him the greatest satisfaction was, to see the choice of a pontif fall upon so worthy a person as the cardinal of Milan, since named Alexander V. who, though born of the very lowest rank, yet was possessed of all the eminent virtues which could adorn that supreme dignity.

His project for uniting the Christian princes in a league.

THE first thing he did was, to acquaint the new pontif with a project which he had formed of sending a solemn embassy to the principal courts in Europe, in order to unite them into a league against the Turks, whose overgrown power was now so happily curtailed by the late overthrow of Bajazet, and the rapid successes of the great Timur. The pope not only applauded and approved of his design, but engaged, that, if he succeeded in it, he would declare himself chief of it, and be at the greatest part of the expence. He moreover sent a nuncio to Rhodes, to acquaint the order with his election to the papal chair, though Naillac was still with him, as a mark of his singular regard for the whole order<sup>d</sup>.

Sends an am-

France and England.

IN order to put the same effectual end to the schism which reigned in the order, as well as to restore the ancient discipline, responsions, &c. and reform divers others abuses, the grand master convoked a general chapter at Nice and afterwards at Aix in Province; and, as he thought his presence would be of great service, he was preparing himself for his departure thither, when the pope thought fit to engage him in a design more advantageous to religion, which was, to send him on an embassy to the kings of England and France, who were then at war, in order to induce them by his address to conclude either a peace or a long truce. Naillac highly relished the proposal; and the more readily accepted of the offer, as it might prove a means to engage those two great monarchs to join in his projected league against the Turks. Having therefore impowered the council above-mentioned to chuse three of their number to preside in his room, he set about getting all things ready for his embassy. The misfortune was, that though that chapter agreed upon some wholesome regulations for suppressing sundry flagrant abuses, particularly with regard to the priories and responsions; yet the schism reigned as much as ever among them, notwithstanding the

a new pope's election, the two deposed popes, Benedict XIII. and Gregory XI. refusing to acknowledge the council of Pisa's authority, and the priors, &c. still taking part with one or the other of them, that they might have some pretence for detaining their respective responsions<sup>c</sup>.

ALEXANDER V. died in May following, at Bolonia, and was succeeded by Balthassar Cossa, The new pope then legate, or, as he is more rightly stiled<sup>f</sup>, tyrant of that city, a person equally insatiable<sup>dies</sup> in his avarice, and his other debaucheries, and suspected to have caused his predecessor to be poisoned, to make way for his election<sup>g</sup>, in which he took the name of John XXIII. John 23. a The Rhodian order, in common with the rest of Christendom, became very great sufferers<sup>great tyrant to the order.</sup> both from his bad example, and his detestable avarice; insomuch that he caused a bull to b be published in favour of one of their commanders, whom he permitted to marry; notwithstanding his vow of chastity, and, by his own authority, appropriated his commandery to himself, and sold it soon after to a youth about 14 years of age, whom he dispensed from taking either the vows or habit of the order. He carried his tyranny so far; as to seize upon all the priories as soon as he heard they were become vacant, and disposed of them afterwards to the highest bidders, without any regard to their character or merit; or the rights and privileges of the order, which, by such frequent arbitrary seizures, saw itself on the eve of being totally ruined<sup>h</sup>. This at length obliged the council of Rhodes to send him a letter, full of the bitterest complaints, and with that laudable freedom which became their exalted station and dignity, representing to him the wrongs which both they and all c Christendom must unavoidably receive from his tyrannic conduct. The result of which was, that, through fear of their laying open all his villainies to the general council then sitting, he thought it expedient to relax from some of his arbitrary proceedings, and to recall the grant of some of the commanderies he had formerly sold, without however refunding any of the price to the purchaser.

HE was at length deposed by the council of Constance, as we have elsewhere shewn; at Deposed and which the grand master was present, and honoured with the guard of the conclave, assisted Martin cho- by Frederic marquis of Brandenburgh, William count of Lunenburgh, Bruno baron of Verona; sen in his stead. and Otho Colonna elected in his room in November, who took the name of Martin, and on the 25th of April following dissolved the council. Naillac, being now discharged from his
d office, would gladly have proceeded immediately to Rhodes, where his presence was earnestly wished for by the whole order; but his extreme desire to see the very seeds of that long and unhappy schism wholly extirpated, prevailed upon him to stay and lend a helping hand to so laudable a work; so that he contented himself with transmitting over to the convent 18,000 crowns out of his own cash, to supply its present exigencies, and then called a grand assembly to meet at Avignon, where he could more conveniently assist. This A chapter con- assembly, which consisted of the ancientest priors, receivers, and commanders; of Italy; vened at France, and Savoy, came to a resolution, that a general chapter of the order should be convened at Rhodes, at which all those, who had hitherto refused to submit to the authority of the grand master, should be summoned to appear, in order to be regularly tried e according to the laws and statutes of the order, and be punished according to their respective violations of them<sup>i</sup>.

THIS resolution had soon after the desired effect; the grand master, who was to take Florence in his way to Rhodes, in order to confer with the new pope about his projected league against the Turks, saw himself met at Bolonia by a considerable number of recusants, who now entreated his pardon, and their re-union with the order, promising an intire obedience to his orders for the future, and a prompt payment of all their arrears. He ordered them accordingly to meet him at Ancona, whence they set sail, and arrived safely at Rhodes, A general one to the inexpressible joy of all the rest of the fraternity. The general chapter was soon after at Rhodes. opened, in which every one expressed an emulous readiness to comply with all his desires; and to agree to the several regulations he proposed to them for the reviving of the ancient f discipline, the extinguishing the least sparks of schism, and restoring the order to its ancient The schism ex- discipline and opulence. These new statutes he took care to convey to the pope with all tinguished. possible diligence, and seemed now to wait only for the joyful news of their being confirmed by that pontif, who, on his part, did not let him wait long for that satisfaction, but sent them back to him, ratified with his approbation, with the highest encomiums upon them and him. His receipt of them was quickly followed by a fit of sickness, which carried him off in a good old age, and in the 25th year of his grand mastership<sup>m</sup>.

had been so happily settled in the order, as well as in the church, was again disturbed by the successive attacks of the Turks in Asia, and of the Saracens in Egypt. The former had by this time retrieved their affairs to a wonderful degree, both in Europe and Asia, under the reigns of Mohammed I. and his successor Amurat II. the latter of whom seemed to turn his thoughts towards Morea and the isles of the Archipelago. The dread which seized the inhabitants made their petty sovereigns apply to the grand master for succour, who readily equipped some gallies of the order to cruise about those seas, and get what intelligence they could of the sultan's intentions; but whilst he was making all the necessary preparations against any attempt from so powerful an enemy, he saw himself in much more imminent danger from another quarter, namely, from Egypt, where the Mamelucs had raised to the throne the famed Circassian Al Nazer Al Dabar, a warrior much more skilled in naval affairs than any the order had hitherto been engaged with. We have already given an account of this new Egyptian dynasty, at whose head this prince now was, who, to keep his new subjects employed, had declared war against Janus the Cyprian king, then in strict alliance with Rhodes. This obliged him to suspend the succours he designed for Morea, and at the same time to try all possible means to mediate a peace between the Saracens and the Cyprian monarch. Al Dabar, who only measured his pretensions by his power, refused to listen to a peace, unless Janus became his vassal and annual tributary, which he no less haughtily rejected; so that there being now no way but that of the sword to decide the contest, Flaviano sent him what vessels, men, and money, he could spare. We have seen the sad result of this war, which ended in the defeat of the effeminate Cypriots, the loss of a great number of Rhodian knights, and the captivity of the Cyprian monarch, who was carried prisoner into Egypt.

AT the news of this disaster, the grand master, fearing the loss of the whole island, sailed thither with fresh succours, with a promise to continue there, provided they resolved to die sword in hand in defence of their country; instead of which, they chose the way of negotiation, as the most suitable to their native indolence, whilst the Egyptian sultan was still finding some pretences to delay it, in hopes that his forces would make themselves masters of the island before any thing was concluded. This obliged the Rhodian knights that were sent thither to redouble their efforts to stop their progress, whose singular valour upon this occasion so exasperated their general, that, in revenge, he destroyed their grand commandery in that island, which was the richest that belonged to their order, pulled down all their houses, cut down all their trees, and totally ruined that noble bailiwick. Al Dabar, no less provoked at the Rhodians than his general, was easily induced by his sycophant court to attempt the conquest of their island, which they deemed to be now destitute of defence, because so many of her knights were gone to defend that of Cyprus. Flushed with these hopes, which he vainly imagined would open a way to his subduing all the other islands of the Archipelago, he renewed his negotiation with the Cypriots, but demanded no less than 120,000 golden florins for their sovereign's ransom, which he knew he was in no capacity to pay. This extravagant demand, however, far from discouraging, induced the grand master, who wanted at any rate to see him at his liberty, to supply him with the greatest part of that sum out of the public treasury; and a peace was soon after concluded between them.

ALL this while the treacherous Al Dabar, though he knew that the peace concluded between him and the late grand master Naillac still subsisted, was endeavouring to amuse Flaviano with proposals for renewing it, whilst he was making the greatest preparations for invading him. But the grand master, who had his spies every-where, and even among those of his privy-council, was so well apprised of all his designs, that he neglected no means nor precautions to elude them. The misfortune was, that the Cyprian war had so exhausted his treasury, that he was obliged to have recourse to the usual though tedious remedy of calling a general chapter, and at the same time to apply to the pope Eugenius IV. and several other crowned heads, for assistance<sup>1</sup>. The chapter, however, met with more readiness than could have been expected, considering that the grand priors, commanders, and bailies, of the order, had, during the late troubles, not only relapsed into their old abuse of appropriating the revenue that should have been sent into the public treasury, which had in a great measure exhausted it, but had moreover refused to maintain the number of knights which were quartered upon them, which had obliged a great number of them to disperse themselves among their friends and relations. However, the grand master sent every-where his summons with such diligence, and in such pressing terms, that he was enabled to hold quickly after one of the largest and noblest assemblies that had been seen for a long time in his capital of Rhodes.

<sup>a</sup> THIS chapter was opened on the 23d of May by Flaviano himself, with a most affecting representation of the imminent danger which threatened both the order in particular, and Christendom in general, from the growing power of the Turks and Saracens, and much more so from the ambition and avarice of the then grand priors and commanders, whose accounts and long-winded arrears he ordered to be faithfully laid before them, as well as the state of his exhausted treasury. The consequence of which was, that they expressed <sup>Sundry great abuses reformed.</sup> the most zealous unanimity to set about redressing all those disorders, and restore the ancient discipline by new regulations and penalties; in doing which, they made such laudable dispatch, that the grand master had time sufficient to make all necessary preparations against any invasion either from Turkey or Egypt. A new statute was likewise made, in order to

<sup>b</sup> fix the knights to their respective residences, and to have the young ones trained up in the military discipline, expressly obliging all the priors and commanders to entertain what number of them was assigned to each of them, under the penalty of being deprived of their dignities, and degraded from the order; so that by this wholesome law every prior and convent became as it were a nursery of young warriors, ready to supply the room of those that died in the field, or to be sent upon any expedition which the grand master should think proper. A new bull was likewise expedited to him soon after, forbidding <sup>Knights for-bidden to loiter
at Rome.</sup> expressly any of the knights to go to Rome without his or the procurator general's leave; by which another great abuse was prevented, viz. their seeking to raise themselves by the pope's favour and recommendation, rather than by any real merit. In such pious and excellent <sup>c</sup> regulations did Flaviano employ that leisure time which the truce with the sultan allowed him, and particularly in the erecting a most sumptuous infirmary at his own charge, when death put an end to all his labours on the 29th of October in the 17th year of his grand <sup>1437.</sup> mastership. He sent, a little before his death, the sum of 200,000 ducats into the public treasury, which were the fruits of that exemplary œconomy with which he had all along endeavoured to inspire all that lived under his government. He obtained likewise several considerable privileges to the order from the popes Martin V. Eugene IV. and John XXIII. as well as from Philip duke of Burgundy, the duke and duchess of Lorraine, and other crowned heads, which the reader may see in the authors quoted in the margin;

He was succeeded, with the unanimous consent of the electors, by John de Lufic, grand <sup>34. John de Lufic.</sup> prior of Auvergne, during his residence in that priory; who no sooner received the news of his election, than he set out for the isle of Rhodes, where he was informed, by his predecessor's spies, of the preparations that were making in Egypt against the order, with which Amurat III. the Turkish sultan, seemed well pleased, on account of the Christian league lately formed against himself. The better to penetrate into his designs, the new grand <sup>In fear of the Turks.</sup> master sent the grand prior of Rhodes on an embassy to him, both to notify his election, and to renew the truce with him; but could draw nothing from that politic monarch but reciprocal compliments, in such general terms as plainly gave him reason to judge that a rupture was not far off. He dispatched at the same time his own nephew, William Lufic, with two gallies, to inform himself what was doing in Egypt and on the coasts of Barbary;

<sup>e</sup> who quickly returned with the disagreeable news, that they would instantly have the whole force of Egypt armed against them. The grand master thereupon lost no time to equip eight of their best gallies, and a proportionable number of transports and other vessels, well manned and armed, and to put that and the other islands under his government in the best state of defence he could.

On the other hand, Al Dahar, with a fleet of 18 gallies, and a good number of other <sup>Al Dahar de-
their castles.</sup> vessels, appeared on the coasts of a little island, or rather rock, belonging to the order, situate at about 100 miles east of Rhodes, and about two or three from the Lycian coast. The Rhodians had built a castle upon it, from which the island took the name Castel Rosso, or Red Castle: this the Saracens took and demolished, without any opposition that we can

<sup>f</sup> learn; and, having made the inhabitants their prisoners, sailed directly for that of Rhodes, where they appeared on September following. The grand master made no scruple to meet them at sea, and to offer them battle; but they, surprised to see so many ships about him, which they supposed to have been far enough off upon the cruise, instead of accepting the challenge, retired into a creek, and, facing about with their vessels, contented themselves with keeping them at a distance with the great fire of their artillery. They continued cannonading each other till night, when the Rhodians returned to their harbour, with a design to attack them on the next morning, but, to their surprise, found that they were sailed away in the night. They appeared next before that of Lango, where the marshal, who was ready to receive them, sailed directly against them; and, being posted under the

<sup>g</sup> cannon of the castle, made them a fresh offer of battle; to avoid which, the enemy tacked about, and made for an island belonging to the Turks, but which was almost abandoned; and there fastening his ships to one another with their prows outwards, raised a strong battery upon them to repulse the Rhodian ships, if they offered to attack them; but as neither the superiority of their number, nor their strong situation, could deter the mareschal from it, he only took the precaution of planting his artillery upon such flat-bottoms as took in the least water, and then fell upon them. The attack was very fierce on both sides, and did not end but with the day-light; by which time the enemy had lost above 700 men, and the Rhodians only about threescore; but the mareschal had received no less than five wounds in the action; notwithstanding which, he would have renewed the fight by the next break of day, had not a lowring storm, which seemed to threaten him, obliged him to sail back to Rhodes, which gave the enemy an opportunity of giving him the slip.

Lustic fortifies Rhodes.

THE sultan, provoked at his ill success, and forced to make new preparations, tried in the mean time to amuse the grand master, who on his side lost no time to fill his magazines, fortify the island, and to summon all the knights of the order, that were able to bear arms, to its defence. He likewise sent ambassadors to most courts in Europe, as well as to that of Rome, to acquaint them, that he was on the eve of being besieged in his capital; and that, if they neglected to assist him at such a crisis, he and his knights would have no other recourse left, but to bury themselves under its ruins. But whether those princes suspected the truth, or that their zeal for crusades was quite extinguished, he could obtain little else from them but faint promises; so that all the fruit he reaped from so many ambassies, was only a league offensive and defensive with the Greek emperor, John Paleologus, which yet proved in the end of as little service as any of the rest, that prince's whole dominions being by this time reduced to his bare metropolis, and that so closely blocked up on all sides by the Turks, that he had no succours that he could spare him.

Defeats the Saracens before Rhodes.

AT length, after sundry negotiations and treaties, carried on merely to gain time, the Egyptian fleet appeared in full sight of the island, in the month of August, and forthwith landed 80,000 men, besides a large body of cavalry, which were the choicest forces of Egypt, who all marched directly to the capital, whilst the fleet kept the haven blocked up, to prevent its receiving any succours. All that the writers of this remarkable transaction have thought proper to transmit to us concerning it, or that could be found in the Rhodian chancery, amounts only to this; that the place was battered with a numerous artillery, and many fierce attacks made against it, in which the besiegers were always repulsed with great loss; and that the Egyptian general, having pursued the siege till the greatest part of his army was destroyed, saw himself obliged to raise it, and reembark with the poor remains of his forces for Egypt, and to carry himself the news of his ill success to his master.

Peace concluded.

THIS signal advantage over those infidels was no sooner spread in Europe by young Lustic, whom his uncle had sent to notify it to the pope, than it procured a fresh reinforcement of the bravest youths from France, Italy, Germany, &c. whom it had inspired with fresh zeal, and who came in good time to enter into the order, and share in the glory of defending it. But as this timely supply of young warriors must of course increase the expence to the convent, the grand master convoked a new chapter to meet at Rhodes, on the 25th of July next, in which, among other things, it was agreed, that the grand master might negotiate a peace with Egypt, which was soon after set on foot by the means of a French merchant, named Jaques Cœur, in English, James Heart, a man who carried on a most extensive commerce, and who, by his credit and address, soon brought it to a conclusion; but how, or upon what terms, we are left in the dark; only we are told, that the Rhodian commissioners, upon their return from Egypt, brought away a considerable number of Christian slaves, who had been taken during the war; immediately after which, an order was sent to the grand prior of St. Giles, and to the grand receiver of Provence, for the reimbursement of James Heart above-mentioned, which bears date February 8, 1446, all the charges he had been at in that negotiation.

Nich. V. condemns his measures as arbitrary.

His noble answer to him.

THIS joy was soon after disturbed by a severe letter which he received from pope Nicholas V. in which that pontif highly censured the arbitrary liberty he had taken in augmenting the responsions of the priories and commanderies of the order, and punishing those who did not comply with his exactions, which had been represented to him as unjust, and contrary to the statutes of it. Lustic was no less nettled at the calumny, and easily cleared himself and his council, by sending him a fair account of the whole matter, signed by all the members of the chapter; and at the same time to shew that he was not to be frightened from his firm adherence to the statutes by such misrepresentations, earnestly begged of his holiness not to give so much credit to his informants, seeing their living at such a distance from Rhodes (not only that they might indulge themselves in a shameful neglect of their discipline, but, which was still worse, to avoid the dangers to which the rest were obliged to expose themselves against such powerful enemies which they had to do with) made them

- a very unfit judges of the exigences of the order to support such an expensive war: besides that their non-residence gave an ill and dangerous example to a great number of others, and deprived the order of their service, and induced them to prefer an idle and effeminate life to the strict and religious discipline which was invariably kept up in the convent. The case, in short, was so fairly stated before the pope, that he was forced to appear satisfied; at least outwardly, with it. But that did not hinder those sycophants, who had their powerful friends, not only in the college of cardinals, but even in the grand master's council, from continuing in an open defiance of their statutes, and fomenting a kind of anarchy among their brethren, not only at Rome, but in several other parts of Europe. To suppress so strange an abuse, the general council saw themselves obliged to have recourse to as strange an expedient, and such a one as would, upon any less emergency, have been thought not only inconsistent with, but dangerous to, such a republican government as theirs was, viz. to invest the grand master with a kind of dictatorial power, by putting the sovereign authority, and the disposition of the finances of the whole order, solely into his hands<sup>a</sup>.

- LUSTIC, however, did all that lay in his power to dissuade them from it, alleging sometimes its being contrary to their institution, and at others his extreme old age; and it was not without great difficulty that he was prevailed upon to accept of it; and with this proviso, moreover, that this change should last no longer than three years, at the expiration of which the council should resume its pristine authority. This expedient soon produced a good effect through the order, and a prompt payment of all the arrears, a renewing of the ancient discipline, and many other wholesome regulations, which we have no time to enumerate. After this, he sent an embassy to Amurat II. who, as we hinted a little higher, had refused to explain himself to his former ambassadors about renewing the truce; but being now threatened by the powerful league in which the king of Hungary, the vavvods of Transylvania and Walachia, and, above all, the brave Scanderbeg, king of Albania, were strictly joined with the sophi of Persia against him, he gladly accepted the offer: and glad he well might be that the order did not join in that powerful league, seeing his ill success against it shortened his days so soon after. His successor Mohammed II. shewed no less readiness to do the same; and, though with very different views, yet was glad to continue at peace with Rhodes, till he could bring his perfidious projects to maturity, and gladly renewed the truce with Zinot, who was sent by the grand master to compliment him on his succession to the Ottoman throne. At the conquest of Constantinople, of which a full account hath been formerly given, this proud conqueror became so elated, that, without any regard to his late engagements, he sent an ambassador, or more properly a herald, to Rhodes, to demand of the grand master to acknowledge him as his sovereign, and to pay into his treasury the annual tribute of 2000 ducats, and, in case of refusal, to declare war against him in his name<sup>b</sup>.

Accepts of it on some conditions.

Mohammed's haughty summons to the grand master.

- To this haughty demand, the no less brave than prudent Lustic answered, that the order, at whose head he was, being a religious one, which acknowledged no other superior but the pope of Rome, and the city and isle of Rhodes, in which he commanded, having been purchased by his predecessors with valour, and the lives of so many noble knights, he was ready to sacrifice his life, rather than betray the privileges and independency of his order, with which he had been entrusted at his election. At the same time, as he rightly judged that his answer would be soon followed by a dangerous war, he had immediately recourse to the pope and European princes for a speedy assistance, and dispatched the commander Aubuston, a person every way qualified for such an important commission, into France and Italy, to make the most pressing instances for it.

- In the mean time the grand master, quite worn out with old age and fatigues, departed this life on the 19th of May, in the 17th year of his government, and was succeeded by Gaubert, or James de Milly, on the 1st of June, whilst he was residing in his grand priory of Auvergne; and who made such timely dispatch, that he arrived safely at Rhodes on the 20th of August following, though not before the order had felt the first effects of Mohammed's resentment, who, impatient to be revenged of an order which he detested above all his other enemies, had already sent a fleet of thirty galleys to ravage all their coasts. But whilst he was making the most effectual preparations to extirpate their very name, a powerful league was forming against him in Europe, of which Calistus III. had declared himself the head, and had gradually brought into it the kings of Hungary and Arragon, the duke of Burgundy, the republics of Genoa and Venice, and some other princes of Italy, and, last of all, the new grand master of Rhodes; whilst Charles VII. of France, who was in no condition to join it, contented himself with transmitting considerable sums to Rhodes for the use of the order, by their ambassador de Aubuffon<sup>c</sup>. This grand confederacy quickly obliged the sultan to suspend his preparations against the Rhodians, and to turn his arms another way. We need not repeat here the mortifying repulse which he met with before Belgrade, from the renowned Hungarian a king, since the reader may see a full account of it in a former volume; the result of which was, that, being more exasperated against them than ever, for having taken the advantage of his absence to ravage the coasts of his dominions, block up several of his sea-ports, and do him very considerable damages both by sea and land, he immediately equipped a powerful fleet, with about 18,000 land-forces on board, with orders to carry fire and sword into all the islands belonging to the order <sup>c</sup>.

THESE made their first descent accordingly on the isle of Cos or Lango, and raised their strong batteries against its castle, where, having made what they thought a sufficient breach, they mounted it with their usual eagerness, not doubting of carrying the place with ease. They met, however, with such an unexpected opposition from the besieged, and were so b terribly annoyed in the attack, from the huge stones, boiling oil, and melted lead, which came pouring upon them, as soon-forced them to abandon it; and, being closely pursued by a timely sally, were glad to gain their ships with greater precipitation than they had landed out of them. Their next attempt was against that of Simia, formerly described, where they undermined the castle with a design to blow it up; but their project was discovered time enough to be prevented by a countermine from within, in which the Rhodians cut in pieces both the miners and all the forces that were ordered to support them. The rest, having recovered their ships, sailed directly for Rhodes, and there landed a few forces to reconnoitre the island. These, finding all things quiet, advanced to a populous town, but weakly guarded, named Archangel, of which they gave notice to their admiral, who c immediately put a sufficient number of his forces in flat-bottomed boats, who surprised the place, killed all that made head against them, and carried off the greatest part of the rest prisoners. In their retreat they committed much the same ravages in those of Lerro, Calamo, Nizara, and Lango, where they likewise destroyed most of the vines and fruit-trees, made a great number of prisoners, and returned to Constantinople. The worst of it was, that the Turkish sultan gave no other chance to those unhappy captives, but either to be butchered upon the spot, or to turn Mohammedans, the greatest part of whom, being base enough to chuse the latter, became in time the most pernicious guides to the Turkish corsairs <sup>d</sup>.

Ravages the rest of the island.

The sultan forces the captives to turn Mohammedans.

THIS sad disaster, which had in a great measure depopulated those islands, obliged those knights who were entrusted with the government, not only to have them better guarded for d the future, but to admonish their fresh colonies to keep the fortifications in better repair, and to add new ones to them, particularly to the unhappy town of Archangel, such precautions being become so much more necessary at this time, not only on account of their war with the Turkish sultan, but as they found themselves upon the eve of a new one with that of Egypt, an enemy no less powerful and irreconcilable to their order than the haughty Mohammed. Before they could be well prepared against those two powers, they saw themselves invaded by a third, on account of the protection which the grand master had given to the lawful queen of Cyprus against the bastard Lusignan, whom both Mohammed and the Egyptian sultan had set on the throne out of hatred to all the Latins. The latter of these had moreover, contrary to the law of nations, arrested the Rhodian ambassador, and seized all e the vessels belonging to the order, on the very same account, whilst Mohammed refused all overtures of peace with Rhodes, from the same resentment.

Rhodes invaded by the Venetians.

IN this dismal situation the grand master was, when the Venetians (who had obliged the bastard above-mentioned to marry one of the senator's daughters, and soon after, as is commonly supposed, caused him to be taken off, that they might govern the island in his widow's name) made a powerful descent into, and ravaged, the island of Rhodes, in a more dreadful manner than ever the Turks or Saracens had done; soon after which, they came with a fleet of forty galleys, and blocked up the port, and threatened the city with a siege <sup>2</sup>. Their pretence, however, for this rupture, was in part given by the grand master, who, by way of reprisals for the retention of his ambassador by the Saracens, had ordered two rich f Venetian galleys, freighted with merchandizes for Egypt, to be seized, the goods to be confiscated, the Saracens to be made slaves, and the Venetians that were in them to return home; so that this second fleet was sent to demand a restitution of all these, threatening, in case of refusal, to ravage all the islands belonging to the order. In this dilemma, some haughty spirits of the Rhodian council were for rejecting the Venetian demands with scorn; but the grand master, who foresaw the dreadful consequence of such a step, chose rather to submit to the restitution, than hazard the loss of so many subjects at such a critical juncture <sup>h</sup>; for, besides their having so many powerful enemies ready to fall upon them from without, their condition was not much more promising within. The partiality of so many French grand masters, who had lately succeeded one another, and bestowed the greatest priories and com- g manderies on those of their own nation, to the prejudice of those of the other tongues, who their debates were immediately disturbed and soured with complaints. These malecontents, as the French writers stile them<sup>1</sup>, went so far, that the procurator for the tongue of Arragon threw down an act of appeal at the grand master's feet, and in an abrupt manner retired predeceſſors, upon any terms but thoſe of his becoming his vaſſal and tributary. His ſuſpicions of that treacherous monarch, one may eaſily believe, rather augmented his fears, than c gave him any hopes of ſucceeding in that negotiation; yet, as he dared not openly reſuſe ſuch an offer, he ſent one of his chief commanders to Conſtantinople, attended with two Greeks, natives of Rhodes, who found the Porte ready to agree to any amicable terms, without inſiſting on its former irkſome conditions; ſo that a truce was quickly concluded with it, though without their being able however to penetrate into the ſecret views of the ſoltan.

They did not continue long a ſecret, before his conqueſt of Paphlagonia and the empire of Trapezond, of which we have formerly given an account<sup>n</sup>, opened the eyes of all Chriſtendom.

THE grand maſter loſt not the advantage of this ſhort truce, but cauſed a very ſtout caſtle to be built for the defence of the capital. The ground he choſe to erect it upon was d a ſolid rock, jetting out into the ſea; no coſt or labour was ſpared to make it ſtrong and laſting; and, as the duke of Burgundy had contributed a conſiderable ſum towards it, his arms were ordered to be fixed upon the walls, which, incloſing a little chapel dedicated to St. Nicholas, occaſioned the fortrefs to be called by that name. All this while the truce did They inſeſt the not hinder the Turkiſh corſairs from making frequent deſcents upon the iſlands, and ſeizing Rhodian as prizes all the ſhips they met with belonging to the order. This obliged the grand maſter coſts.
to ſend his gallies out to make reſpriſals upon them; at which the proud ſoltan was ſo exaſ- Reſpriſals made perated, that he from that hour reſolved to drive them not out of that iſland only; but, if on them.
poſſible, out of Aſia. He began with an attempt upon Lemnos, and other iſles of the Archi- pelago; to prevent their receiving any ſuccour from them; but the grand maſter took care e beforehand to ſend a great number of knights into this iſland, which cauſed the ſiege to be more difficult and obſtinate, and the effuſion of blood greater than it might otherwiſe have been on both ſides. We have already given an account of this ſiege, and of the ſad cataſ- Cruelty of trophe of the two Gattiluſio's, who, tho' ſufficiently acquainted with that monarch's perfidy, the ſoltan to yet delivered up the place, on the promiſe of an equivalent from his no leſs faithleſs vizier, the knights, and became the unhappy victims of their fatal credulity. It ſared ſtill worſe with the Rho- after his con-

and humanity, cauſed to be ſawn in two from head to foot, and their bodies to be thrown Lemnos.
to the dogs, as a cruel earneſt of what the reſt of the order muſt expect from him<sup>p</sup>.

THE grand maſter failed not to interpret it in that ſenſe; and, to ward againſt the effects
f of his fury betimes, convened a general council at Rhodes, ordering all the knights to be preſent at it, and the arrears of all the reſponſions to be forthwith tranſmitted to the treaſury.
But whiſt he was taking theſe and other neceſſary precautions for their ſafety and honour, many of the priors and commanders in Italy and Arragon, to elude his juſt demands upon them, began to make loud complaints againſt him, ſome pretending that he exacted of them much more than he ought, others that his old age and puſillanimity made him look upon every puff of wind that blew from the Turkiſh dominions as the moſt dreadful and deſtructive hurricanes. Theſe complaints were at length laid before pope Paul II. with whom the The grand king of Arragon found intereſt enough to perſuade him to ſummon the grand chapter to maſter ſum-

preferred against him. The chief cause of grudge of the Arragonian monarch against him was, that he had, after his election, appropriated the grand castellanery of the imposts, one of the richest posts in the whole order, next to the grand mastership, to himself. Other princes had their own particular views for desiring that he should be ordered to appear at Rome, though it was in fact delivering up that worthy grand master into the hands of his most inveterate enemies, against which he might moreover have objected his extreme old age, and his obligation to defend the island of Rhodes in person. But that venerable old gentleman, who preferred the clearing of his own innocence to all other considerations, having obeyed the summons, so clearly retorted all those unjust allegations against the authors of them (by shewing, on the one hand, that the exactions charged upon him had no other foundation than the luxury and extravagance of those who urged them against him; and, on the other, that he had retained his castellanery not for his own benefit, but to defray the charges of building the fortrefs of St. Nicholas, which he was ready now to surrender to the order) that all his adversaries were put to silence, and the pope himself was quite ashamed of having given so much credit to them. To make him the amplest amends he could, he not only shewed him the most singular marks of his esteem and intire satisfaction, but confirmed the several regulations which were made by that chapter, especially against all those refractory recusants who had caused him and them so much trouble and fatigue. Zacosta was making himself ready for his return to his government, highly satisfied with the turn which his obedience had taken in his favour, when he was seized with a violent pleuresy, which carried him off on the 21st of February, in the 6th year of his grand mastership. The pope, to shew his great regard for him to the last, ordered him to be interred in the Basilica of St. Peter, with the greatest solemnity<sup>a</sup>; after which the chapter proceeded immediately upon a new election.

37. John
Ursini.

THE choice fell, by the majority of one single vote, on John Baptista de Ursini, then grand prior of Rome, in preference to Raymund Riccard, of the tongue of Provence, and grand prior of St. Giles, and most probably by the influence of the pope over some of the electors, which might perhaps have been much less any-where but at Rome. However that be, the new grand master, knowing how necessary the Turkish soltan's progress made his presence at Rhodes, not only halted thither himself, but ordered, by a particular summons, all the bravest knights of the order to repair thither, especially those of each tongue who were the most experienced in martial affairs. Upon his arrival, he gave the super-intendency of all the fortifications to Peter d'Aubusson, one of the most experienced commanders, and the best skilled in military architecture of the whole order, who immediately set about surrounding the city with a larger and deeper ditch, and fortifying that part of it which lay towards the water-side with a stout wall, 100 fathoms long, six in height, and one in thickness. These new fortifications, and those which had been made under the two last grand masters at the castles of Archangel, and St. Nicholas in the isle of Rhodes, together with those of Lindo, Seraglea, Villa Nova, Catanda, Tiranda, and others, in the other islands, and situate at proper distances for the inhabitants to shelter themselves and their effects against the Turks, corsairs, and other invaders, proved of very singular use at this juncture, in which Mohammed, tho' hindered by sickness, and the then raging plague, had equipped thirty stout gallies, filled with land forces, with orders to make descents upon those islands, where they found them easiest of access, and to put all to fire and sword; for by that means the inhabitants, sheltering themselves in those castles, gave the invaders an opportunity of landing their troops where-ever they found a convenient place, whilst the Rhodian cavalry, being advantageously disposed in distinct bodies, fell upon them so suddenly, that few of them could regain their ships, and the rest were all put to the sword, or made prisoners.

defeated.

THESE ill successes failed not to rouse the soltan's fury to a higher degree, who ordered immediately a powerful armament to be got ready, without giving the least hint where he designed to fall. However, as it was easy to guess that he designed it either against the island of Eubæa or Rhodes, the Venetians, who were masters of the former, lost no time to negotiate an alliance offensive and defensive against him. The grand master at first gladly accepted the offer; but, upon finding that they had glided a clause into the preliminaries, importing that the order should submit themselves to their protection, and not have power to undertake any thing for the future without their leave, some say without their order, he rejected the proposal with that indignation which such an ensnaring league justly deserved; yet did not this mean piece of artifice prevent his sending them a speedy succour, when he heard that Eubæa was really invaded by the soltan, and the capital of it besieged by him. This aid consisted of a number of gallies commanded by Cardono, an old experienced knight of the order, and the famed d'Aubusson, no less expert in whatever related to the attack or defence of a place.

a We shall not here repeat what has been said elsewhere concerning the success of the expedition<sup>r</sup>, much less the treachery and cruelty which the tyrant exercised on all that fell into his hands; what most principally relates to our present Rhodian history is, that Mohammed, having observed the gallies of the order among those of the Venetians, dispatched immediately an herald to declare war against them, with the most dreadful imprecations on himself if he did not kill the grand master, and exterminate all the knights that fell into his hands<sup>s</sup>. But neither did these threats deter the grand master from joining the Venetians in some expeditions against him, of which we have already given an account, particularly that against Attalia, formerly mentioned, nor of making prizes of all the Turkish corsairs that haunted the Rhodian coasts.

b THE Rhodian gallies were hardly returned from ravaging Attalia, when the grand master received a pompous embassy from Hassan Cassan, king of Persia, who was now entered into a new league with the Christian princes against Mohammed, as he had done before more than once. The Venetians, after the loss of Eubœa, were the first projectors of it, and had engaged in it pope Paul II. the kings of Arragon and Naples, the republic of Genoa, and the knights of Rhodes, and, last of all, the Persian monarch, whose ambassador was received with the utmost magnificence. The occasion of this embassy was, to notify his accession to the league against him, and at the same time to acquaint the grand master, as well as the other chiefs of it, that he had taken the important fortress of Torato in Lesser Armenia from the Turks, and was fully determined to pursue the war against them. But that, tho' the Persian troops were invincible, their cavalry the finest and best in all the world, and he neither wanted men or horses, lances, scymitars, or other missile weapons, yet the use of fire-arms being still unknown in his dominions, he made it his earnest request to all his new allies to assist him with some of their best founders, and expertest cannoneers against the common enemy. The grand master not only promised the ambassador to comply, on his part, with his master's desire, but gave him a sight of all his land and sea forces ranged in battle array, and performing all the various evolutions and movements which are used in a real fight; and assigned him a squadron of 12 of his gallies to conduct him to Venice, where the league was to be, and was accordingly, concluded. At his return, that republic took care to have him furnished with a good number of the best founders, gunsmiths, armourers, and other workmen, by whom that kingdom was quickly after supplied with complete trains of artillery, and an infinite quantity of other arms<sup>t</sup>.

c THIS embassy, however, brought the whole weight of the war upon the Persian monarch; and Mohammed, having tried in vain, by fair means and menaces, to make him renounce his alliance with the Christian powers, turned all his forces against him, at the same time that it gave the rest of the league leisure to breathe, and suspended the Turkish sultan's design against the isle of Rhodes, long enough to give the grand master opportunity to make all proper preparations against him. The first thing he did, was, to order every place in it, and all the other islands, to be examined by proper persons, and to have every one put in the best state of defence. He next convened a general chapter, for the reviving of the antient discipline, summoning the payment of arrears, and the absent knights to the convent. The great commander d' Aubusson, now become grand prior of Auvergne, proposed fundry additional fortifications to the old ones; which were accordingly set about under his direction, particularly two towers on the sea shore towards Simonia, and a third towards the little town of St. Marthe. Mohammed turns his arms against Persia.

d ALL this while the grand master had languished near a year under a severe disease, and other infirmities of old age, which ended at length in a violent dropsy, and carried him off on the 8th of June, in the ninth year of his grand mastership<sup>u</sup>.

Death of the grand master. 1476.

e HE was succeeded, with the unanimous votes of the chapter, by the grand prior of Auvergne, the famed Peter d' Aubusson, so often mentioned in this section for his extraordinary skill in military architecture, and the many fortifications which had been made in all the islands depending on the order; and whose election was celebrated with the greatest rejoicings, fire-works, &c. on account of his great merit and signal services. Soon after his being chosen to that dignity, he caused the mouth of the haven to be shut up by a strong chain against the roving pirates; augmented the number of towers in this and the other islands, to prevent their frequent descents; and put such numerous garrisons in them, that, if any ventured to land, they might meet with a suitable reception. With the same view the castle of St. Peter, formerly built by the grand master Naillac, on the coast of Caria, for the security of the island Lango, and its fortifications, were repaired and augmented, and the fosse around it made much wider and deeper, so that the gallies and other vessels could enter the harbour with ease, and be at safety against the corsairs.

Venetian
received.

WHILST he was thus usefully employed, an ambassador arrived from Venice, to reclaim, <sup>a</sup> in the name of that republic, the person of Riccio Martini, a Cypriot of high rank, and a zealous partisan of Charlotte de Lusignan, who had taken refuge in that island. The ambassador demanded that faithful gentleman in very proud, and even threatening terms; such as the grand master had been so little used to, that the council were for sending him away without any answer; but d'Aubusson, who foresaw the danger of disobliging the Venetians at so critical a juncture, so moderated theirs as well as his own resentments, by the prudent answer he gave him, that he sent him away satisfied, without delivering up the person under their protection, or incurring the resentment of the republic <sup>2</sup>.

The grand master redeems the Christian
slaves.

HE had scarcely dismissed that ambassador, before he received another from the sub-basha of Lycia, a Turkish province in the neighbourhood of Rhodes; the pretence of it was, to <sup>b</sup> treat about the redemption of Christian slaves, which that officer had in his hands; but the real intent of it was, to gain the best intelligence he could about the condition the island and order were then in. This did not, however, prevent the generous d'Aubusson from entering into a negotiation with him; and the hopes of freeing so many brave captives from their chains prevailed so far upon him, above all other considerations, that he spared no sums nor presents out of his own private purse to satisfy his avarice, and bring so desirable a treaty to a conclusion; so that he had the inexpressible pleasure in a little time to see a good number of them at his feet, thanking him in the most pathetic terms and behaviour for his generosity to them, and styling him their father, saviour, and deliverer. To these, after he had embraced them one after another, he addressed himself in the following words: My dear children, it is to religion and our order that you ought to pay the grateful acknowledgements, and I doubt not but you will discharge them with your wonted bravery, in our mutual defence against Mohammed, our common enemy, who is hourly threatening us with a siege <sup>c</sup>.

Mohammed
prepares for

THIS was not said without good foundation; for he had been apprised by his spies, of which he kept a great number, that the Venetians were on the point of privately concluding a peace with the Porte: on the other hand, he was apprised, that Hassan Cassan, worn out with age and fatigues, kept himself on the defensive, without undertaking any thing against the Turks, whilst the Christian powers were engaged in most bloody wars against each other; from all which he clearly foresaw, that Mohammed would hardly fail of attacking the isle of Rhodes by the following year. To be therefore prepared against all events, he first of all <sup>d</sup> convoked, as usual on such emergencies, a general chapter at Rhodes; and, finding the number of his forces insufficient to defend the island, dispatched at the same time a general summons, directed to all the grand priors of the order, enjoining the knights to repair thither, with the arms and equipage suitable to their rank. Bosio, an author frequently quoted in this chapter, being the only one who has preserved to us a version in Italian, from the original Latin, still kept in the archives of Malta, of this singular piece of rhetoric, our readers will not perhaps be displeased if we give them to understand, that it was couched in such pathetic terms as could not but inspire, as it actually did, every worthy member of the order with an emulous zeal to hasten to the defence of an island which was become the fear and glory of the order, and the bulwark of Christendom; insomuch that many of them sold <sup>e</sup> or pledged their plate, furniture, and other valuables, to procure the necessary arms and equipage with all possible diligence, in order to be present at the general assembly in due time. Whilst his summonses were thus dispersed over all parts of Europe, he was taken up with viewing in person every island and fortress in it, and supplying them with whatever was wanting towards their making a stout defence. His next care was, to fill up his magazines, arsenals, and other repositories, with all warlike necessaries for a siege; whilst pope Sextus VI. was furnishing him with the most likely means for purchasing them, by the help of a jubilee published on that occasion, which brought immense sums from all parts into the public treasury, by the help of which he was enabled to make some considerable additions to the castle and other fortifications of the city <sup>f</sup>.

Mohammed
amuses him
with offers of peace;

MOHAMMED, vexed at his heart to find, by these vast preparations, that d'Aubusson had <sup>f</sup> got such an insight into his hostile views, and afraid lest they should produce some powerful league in Europe against him, thought fit to try how far that might be prevented by a pacific negotiation; but as his pride could not have brooked a refusal, if the first proposals came from him, he committed the management of it to his son Zem, or Zizim, and his nephew Keleby, whose governments lay most contiguous to Rhodes, who employed a Greek renegado to carry a letter to the grand master, fraught with expressions of esteem and value for him and the order, and in the end inviting him to strike a peace with the sultan, for which they offered their mediation. The Greek carried the letter accordingly; and, upon a delivering it to d' Aubusson, confirmed all the contents of it from his own knowledge, assuring him, that the sultan would readily grant him a peace on so small a condition as the tribute, or, if that term seemed too harsh, a present of 2000 ducats per ann. a thing which the Venetians had not scrupled to agree to, to obtain the same favour.

To all this the grand master, who was thoroughly informed of the artifice, answered, but is out- that, as their order was subject to the pope, and obliged in many respects to several European witted by him; princes, he could conclude nothing without their concurrence; but promised to consult them and his order about it, not doubting but they would all easily agree to it, provided that condition of a yearly tribute or present were set aside, as being of such a nature, that his knights could never submit to it. In the mean time, added he, it would not be at all b inexpedient to make a short truce with the Porte, whilst I send notice of this negotiation to the European princes, which will the more easily obtain their consent to it, as it will be a proof to them of the sultan's pacific disposition. This last article he artfully insinuated to gain time for his knights to reach the island before they came to a rupture; and the Greek, who was sufficiently impowered for it, concluded a treaty with him for a suspension of arms, and free commerce, whilst the negotiation was carried on, which was soon after confirmed A suspension of arms con- by a fresh embassy sent from the Porte. In this last step the proud sultan was no less politic cluded. and artful, as such an embassy, when known by the Christian powers, would most probably cool their zeal, and the prospect of an approaching peace retard the succours which they designed to send to Rhodes, as well as the diligence of the knights to hasten thither<sup>d</sup>.

c In the mean time the sultan of Egypt, who dreaded nothing so much as Mohammed's making himself master of Rhodes, by which he would become a nearer and more formidable enemy, dispatched one of his favourite ministers on an embassy to Rhodes, to renew the last treaty of peace with the grand master, which was accordingly done to the satisfaction and security of both sides. Much such another treaty was concluded with the king of Tunis, with this addition, that the order should, in case of need, be furnished from thence A peace made with Tunis. with 30,000 sacks of corn, without paying any duty.

ALL this while the knights arrived from all parts in great numbers; but as the grand master was still in expectation of many more, he thought fit to put off the chapter till the October following, when he opened it with great solemnity, and a most pathetic address to d them, the substance of which was to this effect:

“ My generous brethren, the time is come, at length, wherein you may display your “ zeal and courage against the enemies of our commonwealth. In a war so holy and just “ as this, Christ himself will be your chief, and will never abandon those who fight for “ his religion and glory. In vain doth the proud and impious Mohammed, who owns no “ other deity than his own power, threaten you with the total extirpation of your order:
“ if his forces be superior in number to ours, they consist chiefly of abject slaves, who “ are dragged by main force, and expose themselves to the danger of death, merely to “ avoid a more sure one with which they are threatened by their officers; whereas I “ behold none among you, but gentlemen of noble and illustrious extract, and fully e “ determined either to conquer or die, and whose valour and piety are a sure earnest of “ victory.”

His speech was a kind of declaration of war against the Turkish sultan, and was answered, as it well deserved, with the most unanimous and repeated assurances that they were ready to shed the last drop of their blood in defence of their religion; after which, they set about the most effectual means to carry it on with success. One of them was universally agreed on as the most conducive to prevent all differences between the commanders, and all other delays in their councils and measures; viz. to invest the grand master with the sovereign power, and with the sole command of the forces both by sea and land, at least till the threatening storm was happily allayed; but it was not, however, without great difficulty, Aubusson is invested with the sovereign power.
f and after the most earnest intreaties, that he was prevailed upon to accept of so dangerous a dignity: after which, his first care was, to nominate the most proper officers to their several posts, to demolish all the villas and houses of pleasure, and even churches, in the neighbourhood of their capital, to have all the grass and standing corn mowed down throughout the island, and to appoint their several duties to the inhabitants both of the city and country during the siege, and to make all proper preparations for a vigorous defence<sup>f</sup>.

WHILST he was thus usefully employed, he had the pleasure to see a fresh supply of knights of the most illustrious families arrive daily from France, and other countries, to fight under his banner, all expressing an impatient desire to signalize themselves on this
g occasion against the enemy. At length the siege of the place was determined, and the con-

duſt of it committed to Miſaoli, or Michael Paleologus, a renegado Greek, of the imperial family of that name, now raiſed to the dignity of grand vizier, and who, to give the ſtronger proofs of his zeal againſt the Chriſtians, had ſolicited that ſiege with uncommon ardour, and had cauſed the plan of the iſland, and all its fortifications, to be taken by three famed renegadoes, whom he ſent thither for that end. The firſt of theſe was a native of Rhodes, who had ruined himſelf by his extravagance, and was forced to abandon the place; the ſecond was the Greek renegado, who had brought ſome time before a letter from the prince Zuzim to the grand maſter; and the third one Francis Frapan, a German engineer, who had travelled through all thoſe Chriſtian countries which Mohammed deſigned to attack, and brought him exact plans of them, and now laſtly that of Rhodes; and from theſe three it was, but more eſpecially from the plan of the German, that Mohammed formed his own for the attack of the place<sup>g</sup>.

The grand
vizier twice repulſed with loſs.

THE grand vizier Paleologus was immediately diſpatched in a ſmall fleet, with his other three renegadoes, to reconnoitre the place before the arrival of the grand army. By the 4th of December, he appeared before Rhodes, and landed ſome of his ſpahis over-againſt the caſtle of Faris, who met with ſuch a warm reception, that they were glad to regain their ſhips, after having loſt a good number of their companions. His next deſcent was on the iſland of Tilo, belonging to the order, where he found the inhabitants all houſed, with their effects, in the caſtle, which was a ſtrong fortrefs, and defended by a ſtout garrifon. This he cannonaded eight whole days, till, thinking the breach ſufficient to begin the aſſault, he mounted it at the head of his troops, and maintained the attack with great firmneſs, till he had ſeen the beſt part of his men lie dead at the foot of the wall, and himſelf forced to find a retreat. This gave him ſuch a taſte of the Rhodian bravery, as made him judge he ſhould never gain the place without attacking it in due form; but as he had not a ſufficient force for ſuch an enterpriſe, and the weather was altogether unfavourable to him, he was obliged, after ſome further loſs, to raiſe the ſiege, and ſail away for Phifco in Lycia, where was to be the grand rendezvous of the Turkiſh armada. Here he was forced to wait for it till the end of the following April, when it entered the mouth of the river Lycia, in full ſight of the iſle of Rhodes, which is not above eighteen or twenty miles from it. The watch on the top of mount St. Stephen's gave the firſt ſignal of its appearing; upon which d'Aubuffon, accompanied with all his principal officers, went thither to take a view of it. It conſiſted of 160 large veſſels, beſides the feluccas, galliots, flat-bottomed and other transport-ſhips, on which were reckoned no leſs than 100,000 land forces.

ſieged by the

THIS vaſt force no ſooner arrived on the coaſts of the iſland, on the 23d of May, than the ſea ſeemed quite covered with their veſſels, and the air with their hideous ſhouts, and the thunder of their artillery, which kept a conſtant firing whilſt the infantry was making towards the land. The cannon of the city was no leſs conſtant and brisk againſt them, whilſt the knights ſallied out ſword in hand, and went into the ſea up to their girdles to oppoſe their landing, till, after a vaſt deal of bloodſhed on both ſides, being overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to retire. The Turks then landed in vaſt crouds, and divers places, and quickly gained the mount called St. Stephen, where being ſtrongly intrenched, they ſummoned the city to ſurrender. The haughty refusal of the beſieged was ſoon followed by ſome bloody ſkirmiſhes, after which the German engineer lately mentioned (and now the only one that was left of the three who had been employed by the grand vizier to take the plan of the city, adviſed him to bend all his force againſt the tower or caſtle of St. Nicholas; aſſuring him, that, if it was once carried, the city would ſoon be forced to ſurrender. His advice was followed, and a battery of three large pieces planted, which made a continual fire againſt it. The grand maſter, on his ſide, cauſed another to be raiſed in a convenient quarter, which returned their fire with the ſame vigour; all which was but a prelude to what enſued ſoon after, when the vaſt number and variety of the artillery which the vizier had brought came to be played againſt the place. That general, according to the German traitor's advice, ceaſed not plying that ſtrong tower with the largeſt artillery, till he ſaw that ſide which looked towards the town, and by much the weakeſt, fall to the ground, after having received near 300 cannon-balls, upon which he ſent a good number of his troops to ſcale the breach; but here they met with ſuch a ſtout oppoſition from the Rhodian knights, and ſuch a bloody conflict enſued on both ſides, that the grand maſter, who knew the importance of that fortrefs towards ſaving the town, came himſelf to defend it in perſon, and took his ſtation on the moſt dangerous part of the breach, telling his officers, in a reſolute tone, that that was the poſt of honour which belonged to the grand maſter of the order.

- <sup>a</sup> OUR prescribed limits will not permit us to enter into a particular detail of that siege, which would require more room than we can afford to this whole chapter; those who desire a more full account, may find it in the authors quoted in the margin<sup>b</sup>; we may only observe here in general, that the contest was carried on with the utmost fury and bravery on both sides; that neither the extraordinary courage of the Rhodian knights, nor the many bloody repulses which they gave the enemy, nor the vast numbers of them which were cut off at every attack, could discourage the grand vizier, who stood in greater dread of Mohammed's relentment than of the Rhodian arms, from pursuing the siege with the utmost fury and obstinacy. The loss of the German renegado, who had conveyed himself into the city as a spy, was detected, and executed by order of the grand master, the frequent discoveries he made, that the besieged received continually fresh intelligence of every step he took, raised in him such suspicion of his officers, that he knew not who to trust to. The vigilance and indefatigable bravery of the grand master, who was every-where, animated every thing, warded against every advantage he gained, and defeated every stratagem he formed against him, joined to the ill success he had in almost every step, had such an effect upon him, that he was three whole days, after a bloody repulse, in a manner senseless and inactive, and awaked out of his lethargy by his fear and despair, and the discouraging news which the deserters brought him from the city. One came and told him, that the grand master had put all the women, children, and useless hands, in such a place of safety, and out of the reach of his engines and artillery, that he only spent all his force against empty houses; another informed him of some new wall, or other work, reared in one night, with incredible diligence, to which persons of every rank and sex put a helping hand, the very nuns coming out of their monasteries to assist the workmen with variety of refreshments. Others assured him, that the place had been so well stored with all kinds of ammunition and provisions, that its numerous garrison was not likely to need any supplies in haste; whilst the continual firing which the besieged made upon him gave him an ample assurance that powder and shot were the least of their wants. All these mortifying reports were interwoven with such encomiums on the grand master's bravery and vigilance, that, despairing to gain the city whilst he commanded in it, he sent thither two renegadoes, in the disguise of deserters, to take him off by sword, poison, or any other way they should find most convenient. The villains soon got access into the city and palace; and would have actually gained their end, had not one of them been happily discovered, who, being put to the torture, confessed the whole design, and informed against his accomplice; upon which, they were both condemned to a suitable death; but were torn to pieces by the people as they were led to execution. This hellish project having failed him, he had recourse to another; viz. to get letters thrown into several parts of the city, fraught with the most insolent bravadoes and threats, extolling the power and clemency of the Turkish sultan, and what happiness it would be for them to exchange the tyranny of the Rhodian order for the mildness of the Othman government; and denouncing the most dreadful rage of fire and sword against them, if they refused the terms he now so generously offered to them.
- <sup>c</sup> THESE letters having met with the contempt they deserved, his next stratagem was that of embassy to the grand master, much to the same purport, and in the same haughty stile. The grand master, who wanted time to repair the dilapidations which the Turkish artillery had made, turned that embassy into a conference, which was held on the skirts of the city ditch between one of the chief officers of the Turkish army and the castellan of Rhodes. In this interview, the Turk appearing wholly divested of that fierce and haughty air which is natural to that nation, contented himself with exhorting the order to avoid the dreadful effects of a general assault, and not let their valour, which, at such a juncture as this, would be justly termed rashness, expose them, and such a vast number of harmless inhabitants, to the horrid slaughter and desolation which are the usual consequences of an untimely and too obstinate resistance, as this would infallibly be deemed by the conqueror. Will it not be even interpreted the highest inhumanity, if, after your walls and bulwarks are destroyed, your towers are levelled with the ground, and your ditches are filled with their dilapidations, you still persist in the fruitless defence of a heap of rubbish, which will cost our grand vizier but two or three hours to be master of? He concluded with begging of him to lay these things before the grand master, and to persuade him, by a wise and timely capitulation, to prevent the massacre of so many noble knights and guiltless inhabitants, the prostitution and slavery of so many virtuous and honourable women, and other terrible consequences that attend the taking of a place with sword in hand.

To this artful speech the grand master, who, tho' designedly it, yet was within the hearing of it, sent an answer to this effect, by the castellan abovementioned, that "the grand vizier had certainly been misinformed by his spies, with it to the condition of the place; and that if he thought fit to try the fortune of an a, he should soon find their want of walls and bulwarks supplied with such barriers and enrichments as would cost him no less blood to gain; and that if he had no such ties to surmount, he would find the city still strong enough, as long as it was defended by a set of knights, who were all of one heart and soul, had no other aim than the defence of their religion, and the honour and interest of their order, and to whom a noble contempt of death gives a strength much superior to that of walls. However, if Mohd, or his vizier, are inclined to peace, let them first remove their forces far enough, we will readily negotiate it with them on such terms as are consistent with our island honour; but, if otherwise, tell them, that we are ready to answer them in their way."

THIS answer soon broke up the conference, and the Turkish commander went away much abashed at it; but the grand master soon found that it had quite a different effect upon several of the order, who began to complain to one another of the want of firmness as they styled it, of the grand master, and to declare for an honourable retreat, rather than sacrifice the rest of the knights and garrison to his obstinacy. Cabals, which daily increased, came at last to his ears; upon which he sent for them to palace, and, as if he had no longer looked upon them as members of the order, instead of the term Brethren, he addressed them with that of Sirs. "Sirs," said he to them, "if you do not think yourselves safe enough in this place, one part is not quite so well blocked up, but I may find means to facilitate your escape out of it: but," adding a higher and more determinate tone, "if you stay with us, let me never hear a word of capitulating, on pain of immediate death." At these words they were all sober-struck, that they knew not how to answer a word to him; but, soon recovering themselves, they expressed the utmost remorse at their pusillanimity, and gave him the strongest assurances, that they would fight under him in defence of the place, to the last drop of their blood. They accordingly behaved upon all occasions afterwards with such intrepidity, and such an emulous ardour to encounter the greatest dangers, as if now their aim was to wipe off the ignoble stain they had brought upon themselves, by the most gallant behaviour, or by a glorious death.

ALL this while, the haughty vizier, exasperated to the highest degree at the answer which the grand master had sent to him, and ashamed to have offers so disdainfully rejected, denounced death and destruction against the whole order, ordered a vast number of sharp spikes to be fixed at the head of his camp, resolved to take all that fell alive into his hands. The fire of the artillery began afresh, and with more fury than ever; every thing was prepared for a most obstinate assault, which was accordingly given at several parts of the city, to oblige the knights to separate themselves, and carried on with such intrepid fury, that, in spite of all efforts of the order, they planted their standards on the ramparts. This produced a new kind of combat, and obliged the besieged to mount the scalade against them, with the grand master at their head, who mounted the ladder foremost of them all, with his half-pike in his hand. They met with an obstinate opposition from the Turks; but at length slew such numbers of them, that they were obliged to retire. These were immediately succeeded by a corps of resolute janissaries, sent to by the vizier, with the largest promises to any that should kill the grand master. They found him out by his gilt armour, and twelve of them forced themselves up to him, in spite of the knights that surrounded him, gave him five wounds in different parts of his; which, however, the heat with which he defended himself did not permit him to feel the knights, who ran to his rescue, and saw him covered with blood, apprised him and begged him to retire; but found him determined to die honourably on that spot. Inspired the knights with new life; they fell with redoubled fury on the Turks, cut in all that made head against them, and struck such a panic into the rest, that neither threats nor intreaties of the vizier could stop them from a most shameful flight. The Rajah pursued them with eager haste, and laid vast numbers of them dead on the ground: altho' being perceived by him, he was obliged to give up all for lost, and to make the speed he could to regain his camp, and soon after his shipping<sup>1</sup>.

THE victory thus happily secured, the grand master was conveyed by his knights, all over covered as he was with his own and the enemy's blood, to cathedral, where a

- a solemn thanksgiving was celebrated, which was concluded with the usual rejoicings. The grand vizier did not leave the island, till he had left behind him the most dreadful marks of his resentment, and seen the rest of his army commit the greatest ravages in it. At length being informed of the arrival of some ships from Spain, and afraid of being surprised by them, he re embarked, and set sail with all possible speed for Constantinople. The grand master being informed of the great losses which the inhabitants and peasants of the island had suffered from the Turkish forces, ordered a sufficient quantity of corn to be distributed amongst them, to last them till the next harvest, and remitted their taxes for some years to come; and, in the same generous manner, rewarded all his surviving knights, in proportion to their merit and valour, from the greatest officer to the meanest soldier; after which
- b they set about repairing the fortifications of the place with the greatest diligence, not doubting but that they would soon hear again from the haughty Turkish sultan.

HE was not mistaken; for Mohammed, after the first transports of fury at the ill success of his vizier, whom he deposed, and sent prisoner to Gallipoli, declared publicly, that, as his arms were never fortunate but when he was at the head of them, he was determined to command them himself, on the next year, against that proud and obstinate order; and forthwith gave directions for making all necessary preparations against that time.

- IN the beginning of this year happened a violent earthquake, attended with frequent shocks, which greatly endangered the city and island, and was felt in all those belonging to the order, and those of the Archipelago. At Rhodes the sea broke out with such force that it laid the city ten or twelve feet under water. The first shock was felt on the 15th of March, the second, much more dreadful, on the 3d of May, followed by a violent lasting rain, which swelled the sea, and caused the inundation above-mentioned. Several others were felt successively in that month; but the most dreadful of all did not happen till the 10th of December following, in the dead of the night. In this the inhabitants, men, women, and children, run out of their houses half-naked, and took refuge in grottos and caverns; many, who ventured to stay at home, were buried under the ruins of their houses by the violence of the shocks. Some churches, the grand palace, and some other public edifices, were terribly shattered, and the ground heaved and undulated in such a dreadful manner, that the Rhodians, who have a tradition that their island sprang out of the sea, imagined
- d that it was going to sink into it again. The grand master, taking the advantage of the general consternation, set about reforming several great enormities which were crept in, by some new statutes and severe penalties<sup>k</sup>.

- WHILST he was employed in this, and in repairing the damages and dilapidations which the earthquake and the Turkish forces had caused in the island, he received a message from prince Zizim, one of the late Mohammed's sons, whom his other brother Bajazet had lately defeated, and forced to seek shelter and assistance out of the Turkish dominions. This message was to implore the aid and protection of the order, and a safe conduct from the grand master, which was readily granted, and a squadron of Rhodian gallies, under the command of Don Alvares de Zuniga, was dispatched to bring him to Rhodes, where he was received with all the marks of honour due to his birth and rank. The grand master himself, with a numerous retinue, went to receive him at the port, and conduct him to the palace prepared for him, which was that of the French tongue. In their march, D'Aubusson, with his usual politeness, gave the prince the right hand, which he offered to decline, alleging, that it did not become an exile and captive to take the upper hand of his patron and protector; to which he obligingly replied, that captives of high birth claim the first rank every-where, and only wished his power was as great at Constantinople as at Rhodes. The grand master took care, during his stay, to entertain and divert him in the grandest manner he could, tho' he had all the reason to apprehend his brother's resentment would terminate in an insolent demand to have him delivered up, or, if he refused, in a declaration of war.

- f WHILST he was in this perplexity, there arrived an envoy from the governor of Lycia, a province parted from Rhodes only by a narrow chanel, who was sent to treat about a commercial truce, but in reality to inform himself of what passed between the exiled prince and the order; which obliged him to prolong the negotiation as much as he could, notwithstanding the readiness which the grand master, who saw through the artifice, shewed to agree to it, and get rid of such a privileged spy. He had scarcely dispatched him, when a new one arrived with a letter from Achmed, Bajazet's favourite prime vizier and general, to propose, as from himself, a negotiation of peace with his master, and with offers of his mediation, if the grand master agreed to it, and thought fit to send an embassy to Constantinople.

Zizim's two treaties with the order.

It was easy to conclude, from all these artful proceedings, that that prince sought only to have his rival dispatched by poison or the sword, or by any other way; for which reason the grand master made all the haste he could to dismiss those authorized assassins, with this answer, that he was ready to accept of the offer, provided nothing was mentioned or insisted on of vassalage or tribute. In the mean time, to prevent all treacherous attempts against the prince Zizim, the council, after several deliberations, resolved to send him safe into France. The grand master communicated the matter to him in such manner as easily gained his consent. Before his departure, he left two instruments in his hands, the one to empower him to treat with Bajazet about an accommodation with him, and by the other obliged himself, if ever he recovered his dominions, to observe a constant peace with Rhodes, to open a free commerce to all their vessels, and to release 300 Christian slaves. Both these treaties, signed and sealed by him, and still preserved in the archives of the island, bear date the 5th of the month Regheb, in the year of the Hejra 887, answering to our 31st of August, 1482. Soon after which he embarked for France, under the conduct of M. De Blanchfort, the grand master's nephew<sup>m</sup>.

Two embassa-dors sent to
ple.

IMMEDIATELY after his departure, the grand master, according to his promise, dispatched two of his principal knights ambassadors to Bajazet, who received them with great marks of honour, and appointed Achmed above-mentioned, and Michael Paleologus, now recalled from exile, to negotiate the peace with them. The former of these was like to have broke up at once the conference, by his insisting on a tribute, and telling the Rhodians, on their rejecting the bare mention of it, that his master would go himself to raise it at the head of 100,000 men. Upon which Paleologus was obliged to remind him, in the Turkish tongue, that the sultan had charged them to conclude a peace at any rate with them. This not only obliged him to desist from it, but furnished the Rhodian ambassadors, one of whom understood that tongue, with a handle to insist upon more advantageous terms than they would otherwise have done, and to which both ministers were glad, in spite of their native haughtiness, to consent.

A peace concluded.

By these articles the grand master obliged himself to keep the prince Zizim in his hands, and under a sufficient guard of his knights; and that he should not deliver him up to any other prince, whether Christian or infidel, who might thence take occasion to give the sultan any disturbance. In consideration of which the Porte should cause 35,000 ducats to be paid yearly into the Rhodian treasury for his expence, and, over and above that sum, that he should likewise pay another of 10,000 ducats per annum to the grand master, as a satisfaction for the damages which the Turkish forces had caused in the Rhodian islands. This peace being signed by Bajazet, was immediately dispatched by one of his chief ministers to Rhodes, to be ratified by the grand master; and the proud Achmed, who had loudly inveighed against the conditions, as dishonourable to the Porte, was soon after disgraced and put to death<sup>n</sup>.

plains loudly of
master.

A general outcry against the peace.

BAJAZET, highly pleased with the peace, was not only punctual, but even before-hand, in the payment of the sums above-mentioned; but the grand master reaped neither comfort nor honour by it. The unhappy Zizim made loud complaints against him, as having agreed to that peace in open violation of the safe-conduct which he had granted him; and was deaf to all the palliatives which the Rhodian knights, who guarded his person, offered to him. What was still worse, many of those, who were no friends to the order, took occasion to throw the severest reflections against him, as having sold the liberty of a prince who had put himself under his protection, and, for the sake of an inconsiderable tribute, had engaged to become his gaoler, in favour of a tyrant, an irreconcilable enemy of the Christians, and, by that means, giving up the most favourable opportunity that could have been wished for of kindling a war in his dominions, which might have proved of the greatest advantage to Christianity. There are indeed two cotemporary writers, who have endeavoured to palliate this step of the grand master; the one by representing the advantages gained from it to the Christian powers in Europe, by the detention of that unfortunate prince, in such a light as shows him to have been more careful to wipe off that stain from the order, than about his own character, as an impartial historian; so that, according to him, it was no more than a chusing the lesser of the two evils. The other, a favourite minister of the grand master, by flatly denying that ever any such safe-conduct was granted by him; and pretending that Zizim was no other than a prisoner of war, who might be therefore disposed of according to the discretion of the person into whose power he was fallen. The misfortune is, that we have no cotemporary authors to direct us to which of those two we ought to give the preference. However that be, pope Innocent VIII. was so far from censuring a this politic step of the grand master, that he made pressing overtures to him for his nuncio to take himself the custody of the unfortunate Zizim, in hopes, as he pretended, that, if he had him once in his power, he could easily put an end to the wars that raged between the Christian princes, by uniting them in a strong league against Bajazet. D'Aubuffon made several very just and strong objections against his proposal; on which, however, that pontif proved so inflexible, that he was at length obliged to send two of the principal knights of the order, one of whom was the vice-chancellor Cacurfin, frequently quoted in this section, to treat with his holiness about delivering him up to him upon the most advantageous terms to himself and his order.

b THESE two politic knights, finding the pontif no less ready to grant, than they were to ask, so he obtained their consent, complied with him upon the following terms: That his holiness should not thenceforth take upon him to bestow any commanderies to the prejudice of the tongues, or the seniority of the members. 2. That the goods and revenues of the order should no longer be included amongst the benefices which the popes had reserved in their own gift. 3. That in case Bajazet should withdraw the payment of the yearly sum stipulated for Zizim's maintenance, on account of this new treaty, the pope should supply that deficiency to the Rhodians, by suppressing the two orders of St. Lazarus and St. Sepulchre, and bestowing their revenue upon it, to prevent, says the pontif in his bull, that order, so useful and necessary to all Christendom, from sinking under the power of the infidels. Neither was the interest of the grand master forgot in this treaty, who, upon the delivery of the prince by his two plenipotentiaries, was to be created cardinal, and his holiness's nuncio in the east, as he accordingly was by another bull, dated March 9th, 1488, or, according to others, 1489; a dignity little suiting that of a secular sovereign, much less that of the chief of a military order<sup>p</sup>. Thus was that unfortunate prince bought and sold to the highest bidder by those religious brokers, from whom he hoped for protection; yet was all this vastly short of the treacherous and inhuman treatment which he met with from that pontif's immediate successor Alexander VI. who, a few years after, caused him to be closely confined in the castle of St. Angelo, and, for the sum of 300,000 ducats, which Bajazet engaged to pay him, ordered him to be privately poisoned, as we have shewn more at large in a former part.

d THE grand master, at the news of that horrid treachery, shewed the most tender concern for the unfortunate prince, though he dared not express his abhorrence against his murderer, who, instead of excusing the fact, sent his nuncio to require him to send immediate word to Bajazet of the preparations which Charles VIII. of France was making against him. On the other hand, Charles sent him a letter, to invite him to come over, and consult with him about his designed expedition against the sultan; but he, who clearly foresaw that the French monarch would soon have other work upon his hands, both in Italy and his own dominions, as it actually proved, neither regarded the invitation of the one, nor the orders of the other: for which that pontif gave him soon after such an earnest of his resentment, as made him and the whole order apprehend some farther attempts from him upon their privileges. For, about this time, the commandery of Novellac, and the rich priory of Catalonia, happening to be vacant, Alexander, by his own authority, as sole disposer, as he stiled himself, of all such preferments, bestowed them on his worthless nephew Lewis Borgia, though the grand master had already conferred them upon Francis Boffolx, one of the most illustrious knights of the tongue of Arragon. Happily for them, Ferdinand king of Arragon and Castile, who was ever at war with the Moors of Africa, and stood in constant need of the assistance of the order, was quickly prevailed upon, by their complaints, to interpose his authority in their behalf; which he did in so effectual a manner, that the pope was forced to submit, and forego his pretended right over their ecclesiastical preferments<sup>r</sup>.

f By this time the pope made so odious a figure in the world, and had raised so many enemies against him, that he thought it high time by some way to wipe off, or at least to take off the eyes of the world from, the scandalous stains which he had brought on his pontifical character. To this end, he ordered his nuncios to invite the Christian princes into a powerful league against the Turks, of which he designed to declare himself the chief. The grand master was not forgot in it, whom he promised to appoint generalissimo of this new crusade. The grand master, who had too much reason to suspect the pontif's sincerity, was much inclined to refuse the offer; but the council representing to him the discredit the declining such an invitation would be to the order, whose profession it was to embrace all opportunities of warring against the enemies of Christianity, joined to an obliging letter which he received from Lewis XII. in which he acquainted him, that he had sent a small fleet to the Mediterranean, under the command of Philip of Cleves, who was expressly ordered to obey and be directed by him in all things, did at length determine him to accept of that high post. He ordered accordingly a suitable number of large ships, galleys, and other vessels, to be equipped, and waited only for the arrival of those of the pope and French admiral. But this last, instead of following his instructions, sailed directly to the island of Metelin, and besieged the capital of it; but was soon obliged to raise the siege, after having sustained a considerable loss, both of his ships and troops, and forced to a shameful retreat into his own country.

D'Aubusson
forsaken by his allies.

Soon after this the grand master received the disagreeable news of it from Venice; and that he must no longer depend on the 15 galleys which the pope had engaged to furnish, for that he had no more than two at sea, and they otherwise employed: so that he saw himself under the necessity either to carry on the whole war without any assistance but that of his order, or to let the league, which still subsisted, come to nothing. He chose the former, as the more honourable of the two; his fleet took the island of St. Mauro, whilst himself was using all his efforts in vain to spirit up the allied powers. The treacherous pontif, thinking he had done enough to save his character, was now wholly taken up with enriching his nephew; whilst the other princes, after his example, were minding their own private interests. So that all the fruit that was reaped from this extraordinary league, besides the taking of the small island above-mentioned, was a considerable prize which Villagarut, who commanded the Rhodian squadron, made of some Turkish merchant-ships bound for Constantinople, richly laden, and which, after having defeated and dispersed their escorte, he brought safe to the haven of Rhodes.

His grief augmented by other disasters.

To alleviate the grief which the ill success of this league, the treachery of the pope, and unfaithfulness of the allied Christian princes, gave him, which was still aggravated by other no less pungent cares, among which the scandalous encroachments which the ravenous pontif made on the privileges of the order on the one hand, and the luxury and effeminacy which reigned among the greater part of the Rhodian knights, were not the least, he spent the short remnant of his life in applying the most effectual means to work a thorough reformation, by reviving the antient discipline. He began with an edict for banishing all the Jews from the Rhodian dominions, not only as enemies to the name of Christ, but as brokers and panders to the debauchery and luxury which he set about to reform. The next was a kind of sumptuary law, by which he expressly forbid the use of gold, silver, and other tawdry ornaments, in the apparel, equipage, and furniture, of the order, under the severest penalties, in which he had the singular satisfaction to see such a general deference paid to his authority, that they seemed to be quite banished out of the island in a very little time. But this was greatly overbalanced by the mortification he received to see all the just complaints he sent to that voracious pontif not only prove ineffectual, but even productive of fresh oppressions and encroachments; so that, oppressed with grief and cares, as well as old age, being now turned of fourscore, he fell into a deep melancholy, which carried him off on the 3d of July, in the 27th year of his grand mastership.

His death.

39. Emeric
d'Amboise.

THE chapter, to retrieve as much as possible the loss of so illustrious a chief, chose in his room Emeric d'Amboise, a person of no less noble a family, then grand prior of France, and residing in his priory, but who left it soon after to attend on the more pressing duties of his new dignity. Upon his arrival at Rhodes, his first care, to inform himself of the true state of the order, was to convoke a general council, to regulate the finances, and put the islands and fleet into a condition of opposing the common enemies, Bajazet and the sultan of Egypt, who had privately entered into an alliance against them. The former, who could never forgive the Rhodians the reception they gave to his brother, nor the great power they had at that time at sea, by which they daily enriched themselves at the expence of the Turkish and Egyptian commerce, which was in some measure ruined by their galleys, no sooner saw himself out of danger from that formidable rival, than he ordered his corsairs to make frequent descents upon all the islands belonging to the order, and commit any other hostilities against them. As for the Egyptian prince, he was not only a great loser by them in the article of commerce, but was no less annoyed by the progress which the Portuguese had made on the coasts of the Red Sea, and in many other parts of the east; but as his country afforded no timber for building a sufficient number of ships to make head against two such naval powers, he was obliged to have recourse to Bajazet, who by this treaty allowed him the liberty of buying merchant and other vessels at Constantinople, and of cutting trees in the forest near mount Negro, along the bay of Ajazzo, for the construction of others. In consideration of which, he obliged himself to furnish the Turkish sultan with a powerful fleet for the besieging of Rhodes.

A league formed against Rhodes.

Bajazet's fleet

WHILST these preparations were carrying on, Bajazet sent out a numerous fleet, consisting of a great variety of galleys, and other vessels, commanded by the famed corsair Gamali,

- a with orders to sail to the islands belonging to the order, and to put all to fire and sword. But the grand master, who had his spies even in the heart of the seraglio itself, having had time sufficient to repair every fortification, and to put into every place a sufficient number of forces, commanded by some of the bravest knights of the order, those invaders met with such a hot reception where-ever they landed, that the greatest part of them were cut in pieces, without being able to succeed in any of them. Gamali, at length, having gathered up the shattered remains of his forces, made his last attempt upon the island; or rather barren rock, of Lindo, guarded only by a castle and a small garrison, which he laid siege to. The governor, an old officer, being then confined to his bed, committed the defence of it to a young Piedmontese knight, named Simoni, scarcely 18 years old, who, after
- b returning their brisk fire for some time, observing that their cannon had beat down some part of the wall, immediately ordered all the inhabitants of the island, who had retired thither, both men and women, to appear upon the breach with the white cross of the order upon their breast, and their weapons in their hands, whom Gamali and his men took for so many Rhodian knights who had landed there in the night to the assistance of the garrison; so that fear of being surrounded by the Rhodian gallies made them raise the siege with the utmost precipitation, and betake themselves to their ships, and to a shameful flight<sup>x</sup>.

- PRESENTLY after this, the sultan of Egypt having, pursuant to his treaty, sent out seven armed pinks to make a descent on the island of Lango, the two first who were sent to reconnoitre it were discovered from the castle; upon which the governor dispatched two
- c gallies out of the haven, which, fetching a compass about, came so suddenly upon them, that they had no other way to escape than by landing on the coast, and hiding themselves in the island; upon which the Rhodian gallies towed the two pinks along, and, having put some of their own soldiers and sailors in them, under two knights of the order, followed the same route with the other five, and fell foul upon them as soon as they had joined them. Their surprise was increased, when they beheld from behind a creek the two Rhodian gallies ready to surround them. They defended themselves briskly for some time, but being forced to surrender, were immediately put in irons, and<sup>1</sup> carried prisoners to Rhodes<sup>2</sup>. These two
- d stratagems were followed some time after by a more considerable one, against a monstrous large carack that sailed yearly from Alexandria to Constantinople, laden with the richest silks, spices, and other valuable merchandize, which the grand signor's subjects brought from the Red Sea. This vessel was of such height, that the main-mast of a Rhodian galley hardly reached its prow. It was seven stories high; and its mast so thick, that three men could scarcely embrace it. It carried, besides its freight, merchants, and other necessary sailors, between 900 and 1000 soldiers for its defence; and was called, on account of its vast bulk and rich lading, the queen of the sea. It had been attempted more than once by the Rhodian gallies in the late grand master d'Aubuffon's time, without success. This did not discourage the present one from trying his fortune against it, as soon as he was apprised of its being at sea. He committed the expedition to an expert and brave knight, named Gastineau, who commanded the first man of war belonging to the order, and was directed
- e to attempt it rather by stratagem than force, but to avoid the burning or sinking of it.

- GASTINEAU*, according to his instructions, sailed directly towards the island of Candia in quest of it, and soon after came in sight of her. The Saracen, who commanded the carack, made not one single motion to shun him, but seemed rather insultingly to come full in his way. As soon as they were got near enough to one another, the Rhodian sent one of his officers in his long-boat to summon him to surrender; to which the Saracen haughtily answered, that the vessel belonged to the sultan his master; that he had had it several years under his command, and had never before met with, in any of those seas, an enemy bold enough to send him such a challenge; that he had on board a vast multitude of brave Moslems, who would hazard their lives in defence of it. Gastineau, having received
- f this answer, dispatched the officer back with this reply; that he was likewise commanded by his grand master to come thither and attack him at all hazards, and he was obliged in honour to obey; and that if he did not immediately surrender, he would either burn or sink him without any further ceremony; but that if he yielded, he would give them quarter. The Saracen, affronted at this second message, bid him go back; and threatened him, that if he came again on that errand, he would order him to be thrown into the sea.

- THE Rhodian commander, by all these intermessages, only meant to amuse him till he had got him within cannon-shot, by which time he gave the carack a broadside with his cartridge guns, which, among other mischief, killed the Saracen commander; at which the merchants, officers, and all that were upon deck, were so dismayed, that they made a signal to surrender,
- g before he could tack about to give them a second. The Rhodian knight ordered the most considerable of them to come into his galley, whilst he sent a sufficient number of his <sup>a</sup> soldiers and mariners into the carack to take care of her. When they came to examine her cargo, they found it immensely rich; for, besides the merchandize she was freighted with, she carried a large quantity of money, gold, silver, jewels, &c. to redeem which, as well as his own subjects, the sultan sent an equivalent in spices, rich stuffs, and other valuable commodities. Not long after this the Rhodian gallies made a considerable new prize, near the isle of Cyprus, of three Saracen merchant-men, which were sent with their lading into France, and there exchanged for cannon, arms, ammunition, and other warlike stores<sup>a</sup>.

defeated.

ALL this while the subjects of Gauri Compson, sultan of Egypt, had been cutting down timber in the woods adjacent to the bay of Ajazzo, in order to build therewith a new fleet <sup>b</sup> of ships, as we lately hinted. As soon, therefore, as he was informed of their being ready for his purpose, he sent out a fleet, consisting of twenty-five vessels of different bulks, to fetch them away. The grand master was soon informed of their arrival in that bay; and, with the advice of his council, dispatched the great carack, attended by four gallies, to go and attack them; and as the designed Egyptian armament was partly intended against the king of Portugal, the Rhodian gallies were put under the command of a knight of that nation, named Andrew Amaral, a gentleman bold and brave indeed, but proud and confident. The rest of the vessels were committed to the care of Villiers de l'isle Adam, since grand master, a knight not inferior to him in courage, but more cool and circumspect. But when both were joined at the place of rendezvous, at the cape of St. Andrew, on the east coast of Cyprus, the Portuguese admiral was for going to attack the enemy in the very <sup>c</sup> bottom of the bay, and the other for staying till their vessels were laden, and got in full sail. The contest would have risen to a dangerous height, if the latter had not yielded to the former, and set sail with him to the gulph. The Saracen commander no sooner espied them entering, than he caused all the men that were on shore to come on board, and sailed away to meet them; but the Rhodians, having got much better pilots with them, had gained the wind of the enemy before the onset began. It proved a very fierce one on both sides, during the space of three whole hours, till the Rhodians, vexed at the obstinate opposition of the enemy, as well as the loss of so many of their own ships and men, agreed to board them at once; which was done with such vigour and bravery, that the Saracens, no-way equal to them in this close way of fighting, abandoned their vessels, <sup>d</sup> by throwing themselves, some into their long-boats, and others into the sea, and happy were they that could gain the shore, where they sought for shelter in the woods. The admiral was the only one that dared to stand his ground, and preferred dying sword in hand to a shameful flight. The result was, that the Rhodians took 11 sail, and four gallies, and sunk all the rest. They next landed some forces to pursue the fugitives, many of whom they killed and took prisoners; after which, they fell to ravaging the country about, from whence they brought some considerable plunder before they left the bay. With all these prizes they set sail for Rhodes, and entered the harbour with the usual signals of joy, and a booty which sufficiently repaid all the expence of that expedition<sup>b</sup>. The grand master ordered great rejoicings to be made both in the city and islands, and dispatched the news of <sup>e</sup> it to the several courts of Europe, and all the priories of the order, intreating the one, and enjoining the other, to send him fresh supplies of men, money, and arms, with all speed, there being so much cause to suppose that the sultan would not let such an affront go long unrevenge.

Death of the grand master.

40. Guy de Blanche
Court, 1512.

THE grand master employed the short remainder of his life in repairing the fortifications under his government, and died on the 13th of November, in the 78th year of his age, and the 8th of his grand mastership. He was succeeded by Guy de Blanche-Court, nephew to the late Peter d'Aubusson, grand prior of Auvergne, to whose custody the unfortunate Zizim had been committed upon his going to France. Whilst the news of his election were hastening thither to him, the chapter received a bull from pope Julius II. now in the chair, <sup>f</sup> and a person of most ambitious views, inviting them to assist at the council of Lateran, the guard of which he designed to commit to them. But they, being well apprised how little religion was concerned in the measures of that pontif, excused themselves from complying during the absence of the grand master, and only ordered their admiral Caretti, then residing at the court of Rome, to convoke as many knights as he could in Italy to perform that office under his command. Neither was this a proper time for the head of the order to be attending the pope and council, when they were threatened with a powerful invasion from the Porte; so that Caretti, instead of staying to attend the council, obtained leave of the pope to repair with his knights to Rhodes with all possible speed, carrying thither two vessels laden with corn.

THE grand master, on his part, being likewise apprised of Bajazet's vast armament, <sup>g</sup> made all the haste he could to reach the island, though at that time dangerously ill, inasmuch

- a that the knights, who embarked with him at Nice, finding him to grow still worse, would have persuaded him to land in Sicily, and stay there till he was recovered; which he utterly refused, and expired by that time they were come to the height of the isle of Zanthus. When he found his last moments approaching, his first care was to have a caravel to row to Rhodes with all possible speed, to carry the news of his death, before the court of Rome could have notice of it, lest the pope should take upon him to appoint him a successor<sup>c</sup>. He died on the 24th of November, and the vessel arrived at Rhodes on the 13th of December, and on the very next day the chapter proceeded to a new election, in which the choice fell unanimously on Fabricius Caretti, lately mentioned, a gentleman who had greatly signalized himself in the last siege of Rhodes, and to whom the great d'Aubussen had in some measure foretold his advancement to that dignity.

- b His first care, after his election, was to assemble a general chapter in the island, in order to make all possible preparations for the approaching siege; soon after which, he caused an extraordinary train of artillery to be brought from France, whither he had sent the grand prior Philip Villiers de l'Isle Adam, as his lieutenant and visitor in that kingdom. The war with which they were threatened was however suspended for some time, through the diffensions which happened among Bajazet's sons, of which we have given a full account elsewhere. Selim, his youngest, having got the power into his hands by the murder of his two brothers, carried his arms into Persia with such success and valour, that the sopher was obliged to make an alliance with several other powers, and in particular with the grand master and the sultan of Egypt, to both of whom Selim was become equally formidable.
- c The consequence of which league was, that Selim, after several vain attempts to bring the latter off, bent his whole force against Egypt, and in less than four years made himself master of Syria, Palestine, part of Arabia, and the whole kingdom of Egypt, by which a final end was put to the Mamluc dynasty.

- THE grand master soon received intelligence of the naval preparations which Selim was now making, and rightly judged that they were designed against Rhodes, they consisting of no less than two hundred gallies, which he ordered to be equipped with all expedition. As he had, at his election, accepted of the sole management of the treasury, he spared no cost to put himself in the best posture of defence. He added some new fortifications to the city and haven, filled his arsenals and magazines, and took all other proper precautions against the enemy.
- d But whilst he was thus employed, a Jew, whom Selim had hired for his purpose, and who, to put himself in a more effectual condition to serve him, had turned Christian, and been baptized at Rhodes, was sending him the news of every thing that was done there, and of all the weak places in the island, which, by his insinuation with the most considerable persons of the city, he had frequent opportunities to examine.

- IN the mean time Selim died, and was succeeded by his only son Soliman II. then scarcely 20 years of age, which gave an encouragement to Gazello, governor of Syria, to revolt from him. As he was in great want of some artillery, he had recourse to the grand master for a supply; to which Caretti readily consented, and sent him a great quantity of powder, ball, and other ammunition, together with some of his expertest engineers, of all which he made singular good use at the head of his Mamlucs, till, being at last overpowered by numbers, he lost at once the battle and his life. Soliman's ministers, after this victory, failed not to exasperate him against the Rhodians, who, they told him, had assisted that rebel with artillery and ammunition, were sworn enemies to the Porte, and held a vast number of his bravest subjects in chains. But what chiefly determined that prince to declare war against Rhodes, was, the instructions which his father had left him in writing; among which was found an exact account of the state of the island, as it had been communicated to him by the Jewish spy lately mentioned.

- WHILST, therefore, he was making all these vast preparations against the grand master, the latter was no less diligent in providing all things for a vigorous defence; and, as he had taken care betimes to secure the assistance of the pope, and some other Christian powers, so he gladly saw arrive at his port three gallies well armed from the pontif, nine from France, together with four brigantines, and as many armed barks, under the command of the baron Blancard, which sailed away, however, homewards, soon after, upon the news that Soliman was going to besiege Belgrade. We have elsewhere spoken of that siege, and the loss of that important place; which, whilst it was carrying on with the utmost fury, was attended with the death of the grand master, who, worn out with age and fatigues, and now with concern and grief, departed this life on the 10th of January, in the beginning of the 8th year of his government. The present state of affairs obliging the order to proceed with all diligence to the election of a successor, to which there appeared a greater number of competitors than usual, the choice would in all likelihood have fallen on Andrea d'Amarald, grand chancellor of the order, and prior of Castile, a person in all other respects well qualified for that dignity, had not his assuming behaviour on that occasion quite disgusted the electors, and induced them to give the preference to Philip Villiers de l'isle Adam, a person of great merit, and at that time absent from Rhodes. The applause of the rest of the order gave to his election threw the haughty Amarald into such excess of resentment, that he could not forbear telling a Spanish knight, his intimate, that L'isle Adam would be the last grand master of Rhodes; as he really proved, through the vindictive perfidy and baseness of that exasperated Spaniard. The method that traitor took to perpetrate his most hellish design, as Bosio informs us<sup>b</sup>, was as follows:

HAVING secured a young Turkish slave to his interest under the hopes of regaining his liberty, he sent him privately to Constantinople, with a letter to the grand signor, in which he gave him the most minute account of the condition of Rhodes, with respect to its fortifications, arms, garrison, provisions, &c. to all which he added, that the order was just then going to pull down the bastion of Auvergne, in order to have it rebuilt upon a former foundation; so that now was his time for executing his design upon that city, seeing he would find it quite uncovered and defenceless on that side. The sultan was still in Hungary, so that the young Turk was obliged to deliver his packet to the prime minister, who caused it to be dispatched to his master. Soliman, beyond measure pleased to find so powerful a privileged spy offering him his services, sent back his slave with the highest promises of gratitude. His treacherous master, to avoid all suspicion, gave out, that he was come back with the price of his ransom, and caressed him after such a strange manner, as gave great uneasiness to some of his order, who yet dared not let it break out for fear of his resentment, especially as the grand master was not yet arrived from France, where he had been procuring all the succours he could get against the approaching war.

master arrives
at Rhodes.

HE went at length on board the great carack of the order, which waited for him at Marseilles, when, through the carelessness of some of his servants, the vessel took fire soon after, and burnt with such vehemence, that the sails, cordage, &c. were all consumed, and nothing was talked of but abandoning it, and getting into some of the other vessels of his retinue. This was however forbidden under pain of death, and his orders so strictly obeyed, that the fire was soon after quite extinguished, and the ship preserved by those who were for abandoning it. This disaster was quickly followed by a more dreadful and irresistible one, viz. a flash of lightning which fell into the stern room, killed nine of his men, and shattered his sword in pieces without hurting the scabbard; which, by those of the meaner sort, was interpreted as a very threatening omen to the order, and obliged him to stay at Syracuse till his carack was refitted. In the mean time news were brought to him there, that the famous Curtogli, a favourite corsair of the grand signor, lay in wait for him at the head of a powerful squadron. Great endeavours were used to dissuade the grand master from encountering so powerful and successful an enemy; he proved deaf to all their intreaties, and ordered his small fleet to make all the sail they could. They saw the enemy waiting for them at cape St. Angelo, and passed by them in the dead of the night, and arrived safely at Rhodes, where his presence gave a kind of new life to the order<sup>d</sup>.

SOLIMAN, having by this time made himself master of Belgrade, and being resolved to follow his father's scheme of making his next attack on Rhodes, in order to put an end to their continual ravages at sea, and to all their future attempts on the Holy Land, had made all the necessary preparations for the siege, and appointed the several officers who were to command in it, when his ambassador arrived at Rhodes to congratulate the new grand master, and brought the following letter to him:

letter and am-bassy to him.

"SOLTAN Soliman, by the grace of God, king of kings, &c.

"To Philip Villiers de l'isle Adam, grand master of Rhodes, greeting:

"WE congratulate thee on thy new dignity, and safe arrival in thy dominions. I wish thou mayest reign in them even with more glory than thy predecessors. Thou hast it in thy power to share in our good-will, and to enjoy the effects of our friendship. As a friend, therefore, to us, be not one of the last in congratulating us upon our conquests in Hungary, and particularly on our reduction of the important city of Belgrade, where we have caused all our opposers to be put to the sword. Adieu.

"From our camp," &c.

THIS letter having been read in council, the grand master returned an answer to it, to this effect:

"Philip Villiers de l'isle Adam grand master of Rhodes,

"To Soliman, sultan of the Turks:

"I THOROUGHLY comprehend the meaning of the letter which thy ambassador hath brought to me. Thy proposals of a peace between us are as welcome to me as they will

- a "be to thy corsair Cartogli, who, in my passage hither from France, hath left no means
 "untried to surprize me; but, having missed his aim, and being unwilling to abandon "these seas before he had done us some damage, he hath failed into the mouth of the "Lycia, and attempted to carry off two merchantmen which were bound from our ports.
 "He had even fallen foul upon a Candian bark, but was forced, by the gallies which I "dispatched after him, to let it go, and to betake himself to a speedy flight, to avoid "falling into their hands. Farewell.
 "Given at Rhodes," &c.

b THIS letter was sent, not by an ambassador, or person of rank, who might have been detained prisoner at the Porte, the Turks not being very scrupulous observers of the laws of nations, but by a private inhabitant of Rhodes. This sufficed, however, to let the soltan know what a brave and resolute order he had to do with; but as it did not answer his purpose, Pyrrus, an old experienced basha, advised the council to send the grand master word, that they had not dared to shew his letter to Soliman, on account of the meanness of the person that brought it; but that, if he was inclined to listen to his peaceful proposals, it might be speedily brought to a conclusion, if he sent some proper person of the order ambaffador to him. The view of that artful minister was in all likelihood to have extorted by that means a more perfect knowlege of the state and strength of that city from him; for which reason that proposal was rejected.

c IT was not long before another messenger arrived at Rhodes, with a new letter from that monarch, but in a very different stile, and little short of a declaration of war; it was to this effect:

"I AM well assured that the letter which our highness sent to thee came into thy hands, His second and
 "and that it hath given thee more uneasiness than pleasure: assure thyself, that I am far threatening
 "from sitting still with the reduction of Belgrade, and that I have another in view no less letter to him.
 "considerable and important, of which thou wilt be apprised in a little while, thou and
 "thy knights being seldom out of my thoughts."

d To this the grand master answered in words to this effect:

"I AM not at all displeased that thou bearest me and my order in thy mind. Thou tellest His brave
 "me of thy conquest in Hungary, and of another which thou designest to make elsewhere, answer to it.
 "in which thou promisest thyself an equal success; but consider seriously, that of all the "projects which men are apt to form, none are more uncertain than those which depend on "the fortune of war. Adieu."

e To this he added a private one to Pyrrus, assuring him, that if his master entertained any pacific views, he would not delay sending one of the order on an embassy to the Porte, as soon as he was provided from thence with proper hostages, or a safe conduct signed with the imperial seal: but the next news he heard from thence was, that they had seized a brigantine belonging to the order, which he looked upon as a sufficient declaration of war, and set about making the most proper preparations against it, by furnishing the city with all kinds of necessaries, particularly by laying up vast quantities of wheat, wine, and oil, from Naples and Sicily, and causing all the grain and forage to be gathered in, that the enemy might have nothing to subsist on but what they brought<sup>k</sup>.

f HERE again the treacherous chancellor betrayed his perfidy, by opposing all these wise D'Amarald's precautions, under divers pretences, such as parsimony, and the danger of exhausting the treachery.
 public treasure, by buying up such quantities of stores before they were sure of their being wanted; and by endeavouring to persuade the council, that Soliman would never have sent such a threatening letter, if his vast armament had been really designed against Rhodes; though the letters which they had from their spies at the Porte assured them, that the siege of that capital was the only object of it. And happy it was that the grand master carried his point against him, or else they must have been reduced to the want of the most essential necessaries, by the vile means which this false brother took to elude all his precautions.
 Wine, in particular, so proper in a siege, was what d' Amarald took upon himself to provide, in such quantity as was agreed upon by the council; yet he was base enough to reject the offers of some merchants who engaged to bring him that supply in good time at a reasonable rate; and was still complaining, that the vain apprehensions which they frequently entertained of imaginary invasions from the Turks had proved more chargeable, and done more g real damage to the order, than all their arms could have done; which obliged the grand master to send Bosio (a serving brother, and uncle to the knight of that name, so often quoted in this chapter) into Candia for it, who returned accordingly soon after which a considerable supply<sup>1</sup>. He was at the same time ordered to raise what recruits he could in that island; but finding that the governor had, out of fear of disobliging the grand signor, forbidden, by sound of the trumpet, any Candiot listing in the Rhodian service, he was obliged to act more cautiously in it; yet, either with his connivance, or in spite of his vigilance, he not only got 500 into his galleys, under the disguise of merchants and sailors, but prevailed upon one Gabriel Martinengo, an excellent engineer, whom the senate of Brescia had sent thither to take care of the fortifications, to go with him to Rhodes, and share in the glory of defending that place against the enemies of Christianity; and who proved afterwards, by his valour and skill, of excellent service to the order during the whole siege, as we shall see in the sequel<sup>m</sup>.

UPON his arrival, the grand master, and the rest of the knights, being told by Bosio with what readiness he accepted of their invitation, and what dangers they had undergone in their flight from Candia, loaded him with caresses; and he soon after became so enamoured with their order, that he begged to be admitted, and was gladly received, into it. Immediately after this he had the superintendency of all the fortifications committed to him; and it was by his advice, as well as by his direction, that the ramparts were raised to a more convenient height, the gates defended by ravelins, new casemates built in the lanes of the bastions, and the counterscarp of the ditch, and other improvements were added, of a most exquisite contrivance to keep off an enemy, or crush him on his too near approach, which we have not room to enumerate.

WHILST these measures were carrying on, a new defection was hatched among the knights of the Italian tongue, whose preferments the pope (Adrian VI.) bestowed upon his favourites at Rome, whilst they were taken up in the defence of the island, on which account they begged leave to go into Italy, and lay their complaints before the pontif. As their request was altogether unseasonable at such a juncture, the treacherous d'Amarald, who had perhaps the greatest hand in it, failed not to interpret the grand master's refusal as arbitrary and unjust, and as a mark of his disrespect for the Italians, which deserved to be equally disregarded by them, especially as there was such probability that he raised these rumours of an approaching siege, merely that he might be at liberty to squander the public treasure as he thought fit among his French favourites. The poison worked just as he wished; and, without asking any further leave, they all withdrew to the isle of Candia, where they had soon after the mortification to hear that the grand master had got them to be publicly condemned as rebels and deserters, and to be degraded and erased out of the order. But as the defection of so many, otherwise brave, knights, could not but be a sensible loss to it, some others were forthwith dispatched thither, to try all proper means to reduce them; and to let them know, that as their city would infallibly undergo a dreadful siege in a short time, all their other pretences would never prevent their flight being interpreted as a mark of cowardice. This quickly brought them back to the feet of the grand master, who, upon their submission, readily embraced and restored them to their dignity and respective posts.

Succours from Europe denied.

Preparations against the siege.

THEIR return, and the desire they expressed to wipe off the stain of their defection by their future conduct, were the more acceptable to him and the whole order, as all his embassies to the European powers for assistance had proved abortive; and they plainly perceived, that Rhodes was not likely to have any other defenders than those of the order. This induced him to make a general review of all his forces, which were found to consist of no more than 500 knights and about 4500 troops, besides a few companies of the Rhodian citizens, and the peasants of the island, who were appointed to serve as pioneers. As for the slaves, those who belonged to private persons were to be employed in the fortifications, whilst the Rhodian cruisers, who were all ordered home, were directed to shut themselves in the port, and to take the guard of it upon them. Besides these, the port was defended by a double chain, one of which went across the mouth of it, and the other extended itself from the tower of fort St. Nicholas to that of the Mills; and, in order to prevent the enemy's attempting the mole, as they had done in a former siege, a number of old vessels were sunk, laden with stones, at the mouth of the Mandrake. The bastions, walls, and ramparts, were likewise filled with artillery, fire-balls, large stones, and other warlike necessities, among which the provident master did not forget a miraculous statue of the Virgin Mary, which had been brought in a former siege from the chapel where it formerly stood, and placed upon the ramparts, and which he caused now to be fetched in solemn procession, and deposited in the church of St. Mark. We have dwelt the longer on these preparations (to which we might have added many other particulars of less moment, which the writers of that siege have thought worth recording) to shew, that nothing was neglected by the grand master to put that capital in the best condition of defence against so powerful an enemy.

- a WE come now to the fatal siege, in which Soliman spared neither stratagems nor forces; for, being still doubtful about the intelligence which d'Amarald and the Jewish physician had given him, one of his first cares was, to be more effectually informed of the state of the city; and, whilst the grand master was taken up in assigning to his knights their proper posts, the Turks were making frequent signals by their fires at night on the Lycian coasts; over-against Rhodes; to reconnoitre which, a Rhodian, named Jaxi, who understood the Turkish tongue, was dispatched in a small pink, who, coming to them under pretence of inquiring after some merchant-men, was to get the best information he could concerning the enemy's fleet. Jaxi refusing to go on shore to them, unless they sent a proper hostage for his own security, a man richly dressed was forthwith sent into his ship; but no sooner
- b was he got to land, but they bound him hand and foot, and sent him with all expedition to Constantinople, where, after having stood against the vast promises of the sultan, he was put to the rack several days successively, till he expired under it, tho' not before they had extorted from him a full account of the strength and condition of the city, and particularly that the Rhodian forces consisted of no more than about 6000 men.

- As soon as Soliman had received the particulars of his deposition, he sent orders to have every thing ready for siege; but, according to the rule which he had prescribed to him-<sup>Soliman's chartel to the order.</sup> self, sent the grand master and knights of the order a declaration of war, in words to this effect: "The continual ravages which you commit against our faithful subjects, and the injury and affront which you thereby offer to our imperial majesty, oblige us to send you our express commands to deliver the island and fortrefs of Rhodes to us; which if you readily consent to, I swear by the great Maker of heaven and earth, by the twenty-six thousand prophets, the four musaphi fallen down from heaven, and by our great prophet Mohammed, that you shall be permitted to quit the island, and the inhabitants to continue in it, without the least injury to either; but if you delay obeying my orders, you will all be put to the sword by my invincible forces; and all the bastions, towers, and edifices, levelled with the grass that grows at the foot of your fortifications."
- c

- THIS chartel was followed soon after by the whole fleet, consisting of 400 sail, whilst the army is said to have amounted to 140,000 men, exclusive of 60,000 pioneers, brought from the mines on the frontiers of Hungary, Servia, &c. to serve at the siege. The council at first proposed the attack of the other islands before they came to that of Rhodes; but Pyrrus, alias Peri, the basha, who was the son of an expert renegado, and burnt with impatience to signalize himself on this occasion, resolved to lose no time about those islands, which would soon be reduced of course after the main one; and therefore proposed beginning immediately with the siege of the capital, which was unanimously agreed to. As soon as the grand master was assured of their design, he forthwith drew the greatest part of his forces out of those islands, to come and defend the city; and, that he might be more ready at hand to give his directions, he left his palace in the upper town, and came to reside near the church of Our Lady of Victory. The trenches were accordingly opened, and a stout battery raised against the place, which was soon after dismounted by the cannon of the besieged; and this was presently followed by frequent sallies, in which they killed great numbers of the enemy, and filled up their trenches again. The same efforts and opposition were daily repeated, in which the very janissaries themselves found such a superiority of skill and extraordinary bravery in the Rhodian knights, beyond what they expected or had ever tried, that they began to draw a bad omen from these unsuccessful beginnings, and to complain that they were brought thither to a slaughter-house instead of a regular siege, and where they had no other chance but that of death or slavery, instead of plunder and conquest. This was soon followed by a general mutiny, in which they shewed rather a singular contempt of their young general, than any regard to his orders; <sup>A mutiny in SUCH disagreeable news soon determined the sultan to go and command the siege in person, in spite of all the remonstrances of his other bashas; but whilst he was making all the haste imaginable to his army, a woman slave had formed such a hellish plot against the place, as might have proved more destructive to it than the united force of 100,000 <sup>A female cerned in it, being put to the torture, disclosed all the particulars of that horrid treason. <sup>a</sup>

The woman who had been the contriver of it was the only one who bore the most exquisite torture, without making the least discovery. She was, however, condemned and hanged, upon the evidence of the rest, and the others drawn and quartered, and their limbs exposed, in terrorem, in different parts of the city. By this time Soliman having reached his camp, at the head of 15,000 of his best troops, which had accompanied him from Lycia, ordered the whole army to appear before him without arms or accoutrements, and caused them to be surrounded by those 15,000 men, whilst himself stood mounted on his imperial throne, elevated high enough to be seen and heard by them all. Then looking about on all sides, with eyes and a countenance full of indignation, after a considerable silence, made them a long and reproachful speech, the substance of which was to this effect <sup>b</sup>: “ I could never “ have thought that those from whom I expected the greatest services, could have betrayed “ their want of duty on an occasion which they well knew I had much at heart. It is “ now near two hundred years since a famished handful of knights, driven out of their “ homes, have perched themselves in this island, and have subsisted there chiefly by the “ rapine which they committed upon my subjects, through the neglect and indolence of “ my predecessors; and even now that the Christian powers in Europe seek my friendship “ and protection, and dread the power of my arms, this one single city, situate in the “ heart of my empire, hath the boldness to resist me, to stop the progress of my victories, “ to interrupt my commerce, intercept my messengers, rob me of my tribute, and receive “ into her havens all the enemies of our faith, and all the apostates from it. Even now, <sup>c</sup>
“ when I send you my ungrateful subjects and slaves, who have reaped so many advan“ tages, so much glory and rich plunder, under my government, to rid me of those mis“ creants, you dare not look them in the face; but because they have surprised the “ pioneers who opened the trenches before you, both janissaries and spahis, bred up under “ my standards, are afraid of returning the affront, to the shame and disgrace of my “ empire. What can I say to such base cowards, and betrayers of my glory? or “ what can you expect from me but the most dreadful strokes of my indignation and “ contempt?”

“ HAD I been now to address myself to soldiers, I should have ordered you to appear <sup>d</sup> “ armed before me; but since I am to speak to base degenerate poltroons, unable to bear “ even the mere shouts of an enemy, how can I suffer my arms to be dishonoured by “ you? I would gladly know whether, when you were sent against this island, you hoped “ to find those Rhodian knights still more pusillanimous than you, and that the dread of “ your arms would make them lay their own at your feet, and offer their hands and feet “ to the fetters you designed for them? Ignorant wretches! not to know that you were to “ encounter the choicest forces of Christendom, men naturally brave, and brought up “ from their tender years to the trade of arms; cruel and rapacious lions, thirsting for “ nothing so much as for the blood of the Mohammedans, and scorning to yield their “ haunt to any but a superior force. It was their valour which hath excited mine, and “ made me look upon them as a conquest worthy of my arms. But how can I expect it <sup>e</sup> “ from such effeminate fugitives as you, who could flee even before you saw the enemy;
“ and would ere now have turned deserters, had you not been hindered from it by the sea
“ that surrounds you? But, to avoid such a shameful disgrace, I will now make such a “ severe example of those wretched cowards, as shall be a sufficient deterrent to the rest “ to follow their steps.”

Pyrrus intercedes for them.

They are forgiven.

THIS dreadful speech was scarcely ended, before the 15,000 armed men had a signal to draw their scymitars, as if it had been to massacre the rest; upon which they all fell on their faces, crying out for mercy in the most doleful tone; whereupon Peri, or Pyrrus, and the other generals, approached the throne with the deepest respect, and interceded for them, as having till this time behaved with a laudable loyalty and bravery. After which, <sup>f</sup> the sultan, who only sought to reduce them to their duty, was graciously pleased to tell that general, that at his request he would suspend their punishment, till they had earned their pardon by seeking it in the bastions and bulwarks of their enemies. This stratagem, and seeming severity, mixed with so much clemency, had such an effect upon them, that their greatest strife was, who should soonest be dispatched upon the most dangerous attempts;
so that we may from that time more properly reckon the siege of Rhodes to have been begun than renewed <sup>g</sup>.

Rhodes cannonaded.

It was accordingly carried on with such diligence and zeal, by the frequent relieving of the soldiery, that the trenches were brought quite close to the counterscarp, and a stout battery raised against the town, which made a constant fire against it, and yet did but as it <sup>g</sup>

- a were graze, rather than damage, the battlements of the walls, of which Soliman failed not to be informed by his spy the Jewish physician. This traitor farther acquainted him, that the besiegers could see all that was done in his camp from the top of the steeple of St. John, from whence he was in danger of receiving some fatal shot, as he rode about to give his orders, if he did not forthwith plant a battery, and bring it down; which was done accordingly with success. Soliman, however, finding the whole place in some measure covered with stout fortifications, of such height as to command all his batteries, ordered immediately an immense quantity of stones and earth to be brought, in which so great a number of hands were employed night and day by turns, that they quickly raised a couple of hillocks, high enough to overtop the city-walls. They plied them accordingly with
b such a continual fire, that the grand master was obliged to cause them to be strongly propped within with earth and timber. All this while the besieged, who, from the top of the grand master's palace, could discover how their batteries were planted, demolished them with their cannon almost as fast as they raised them.

- HERE they thought proper to alter their measures, and to plant a strong one against the tower of St. Nicholas, which, as we observed in speaking of the former siege, had resisted <sup>tower battered</sup> all the efforts of the then grand vizier. This the basha of Romania caused to be battered <sup>in vain.</sup> with twelve large pieces of brass cannon, but had the mortification to see them all dismounted by those of the tower; to prevent which, he ordered them to be fired only in the night, and in the day had them covered with gabions and earth. This had such success, c that, after some 500 cannot shot, the wall began to shake, and tumble into the ditch; but he was surprised to find another wall behind it, well terraced, and bordered with artillery, and himself obliged either to begin afresh, or give up that enterprise; and yet this last was what Soliman preferred, when he was told of its being built on a hard rock, incapable of being fapped, and how firmly it had held out against all the efforts of the vizier Paleologus. The next attack was therefore ordered by him to be made against the bastions of the town, and that with a vast number of the largest artillery, which continued firing during a whole month, so that the new wall of the bastion of England was quite demolished, though the old one stood proof against all their shot. That of Italy, which was battered by seventeen large pieces of cannon, was still worse damaged; upon which Martinengo advised the grand d master, who was always at hand where the greatest danger was, to cause a sally to be made on the trenches of the enemy, out of the breach, whilst he was making fresh entrenchments behind it. His advice succeeded; and the 200 men, that sallied out sword in hand, having surprised the Turks in the trench, cut most of them in pieces. At the same time a new detachment, which was sent to repulse them, being obliged, as that engineer rightly judged, to pass by a spot which lay open to their artillery, were likewise mostly destroyed by the continual fire that came from it, whilst the assailants were employed in filling up several fathoms of the trench before they retired. By that time the breach had been e repaired with such new works, that all the efforts to mount it by assault proved equally ineffectual and destructive.
- UNFORTUNATELY for the besieged, the continual fire they had made caused such a consumption of their powder, that they began to feel the want of it; the perfidious d'Amaraud, <sup>The Rhodians want powder,</sup> whose province it had been to visit the magazines of it, having amused the council with a <sup>thru' d'Amaraud's perfidy.</sup> false report, that there was more than sufficient to maintain the siege, though it should last a whole twelvemonth. But here the grand master found means to supply in some measure that unexpected defect, by the cautious provision he had made of a large quantity of <sup>Make it with salt-petre.</sup> salt-petre, which was immediately ground, and made into gunpowder, though he was at the same time obliged to order the engineers to be more sparing of it for the future, and to make use of it only in the defence of such breaches as the enemy should make. In the mean time the basha, being informed that the peasants were employed
f by Martinengo in repairing those that were made on the ramparts, raised some cavaleers against them, on which he planted a great number of able marksmen, to shoot them with their arquebusses, against whom that engineer soon raised batteries of small cannon on the battlements of the houses, which made a much greater havock among them; but this did not recompense the loss of so many useful hands, the enemy being better able to bear the loss of fifty such than they that of one; so that they now began to fear they should not be able to hold out much longer, unless they received some considerable succours from Europe, or the hardness of the approaching winter obliged the enemy to retire from the island.

- ALL this while the Turks had not gained an inch of ground; and the breaches they had g made were so suddenly either repaired or defended by new entrenchments, that the very rubbish of them must be mounted by assault. Soliman, therefore, thought it now adviseable to set his numerous pioneers at work, in five different parts, in digging of mines, a each of which led to the bastion opposite to it; some of these were countermined by a new-invented method of Martinengo, who, by the help of braced skins, or drums, could discover where the miners were at work. Some of these he perceived, which he caused to be opened, and the miners to be driven out by hand grenadoes; others to be smothered or burned by setting fire to gunpowder; yet did not this hinder two considerable ones to be sprung, and doing a vast deal of damage to the bastion of England, by throwing down above six fathoms of the wall, and filling up the ditch with its rubbish; upon which the Turks immediately climbed up sword in hand to the top of it, and planted seven of their standards upon the parapet; but, being stopped by a traverse, the knights, recovered from their surprise, fell upon them with such fury, that they were obliged to abandon it with b great loss. The grand master, who was then at church, quickly came to the place with his short pike in his hand, and attended by his knights, encouraging all he met with, burghers, soldiers, and others, to fight bravely in defence of their religion and country, and arrived time enough to assist in the taking down their standards, and driving down the enemy by the way they came up. In vain did the vizier Mustapha endeavour to prevent their flight, by killing some of the foremost with his sword, and driving the rest back; they were obliged to abandon the bastion, and, which was still worse, met with that death in their flight, which they had strove to shun, from the fire-arms which were discharged upon them from the ramparts. Three sangiacs lost their lives in this attack, besides some thousands of the Turks; the grand master, on his side, lost some of his bravest knights, particularly his standard-bearer. c who is repulsed.

SEVERAL mines were again sprung at other bastions, which we have not room to mention, especially as the enemy reaped but little benefit by them. The attacks were almost daily renewed with the same ill success and loss of men, every general striving to signalize himself in the sight of their emperor. At length the old general Peri, or Pyrrus, having harassed the troops which guarded the bastion of Italy for several days successively, without intermission, caused a strong detachment, which he had kept concealed behind a cavaleer, to mount the place by break of day, on the 13th of September, where, finding them overcome with sleep and fatigue, they cut the throats of the sentinels, and, sliding through the breach, were just going to fall upon them. The Italians, however, quickly recovered d themselves and their arms, and gave them an obstinate repulse. The contest was fierce and bloody on both sides; and the basha, still supplying his own with new reinforcements, would hardly have failed of overpowering the other, had not the grand master, whom the alarm had quickly reached, timely intervened, and, by his presence, as well as example, revived his Rhodians, and thrown a sudden panic among the enemy. Pyrrus, desirous to do something to wipe off the disgrace of this repulse, tried his fortune next on an adjoining work, lately raised by the grand master Caretti, where his soldiers met with a still worse treatment, being almost overwhelmed with the hand-grenadoes, melted pitch, and boiling oil, which came pouring upon them, whilst the forces which were on the adjacent flanks made as great a slaughter of those that fled; insomuch that the janissaries began to e resume their old murmuring tone, and cry out, that they were brought thither only to be slaughtered.

Mustapha and Achmed make separate attacks without success.

THE grand vizier Mustapha, afraid lest their complaints should reach his master, agreed at length, as the last resort, to make a fresh attempt on the bastion of England, whilst, to cause a diversion, the basha Achmed sprung some fresh mines at an opposite part of the city. This was accordingly executed on the 17th of September, when the former, at the head of five battalions, resolutely mounted, or rather crept up, the breach, and, in spite of the fire of the English, advanced so far as to pitch some standards on the top; when, on a sudden, a croud of English knights, commanded by one Bouk, or Burk, sallied out of their entrenchments, and, assisted by some other officers of distinction, obliged them to retire, f though in good order. Mustapha, provoked at it, led them back, and killed several knights with his own hand; and had his men supported him as they ought, the place must have been yielded to him; but the fire which was made from the adjacent batteries and musquetry disconcerted them to such a degree, that neither threats nor intreaties could prevent their abandoning the enterprize, and dragging him away with them by main force. The Rhodians lost in that action several brave knights, both English and German, and, in particular, John Burk, their valiant commander; but the Turks lost above 3000 men, besides a good number of officers of distinction. Much the same ill success having attended Achmed with his mines, one of which had been opened, and the other only bringing some fathoms of the wall down, he was also obliged to retreat, his troops, tho' some g of the very best, being forced to disperse themselves, after having borne the fire and fury of the Spanish and Auvergnian knights as long as they were able.

THREE

a THREE days after this fresh advantage over the Turks, the Jewish traitor, formerly mentioned, being caught shooting an arrow from the ramparts, with a letter of intelligence; over to the enemy, was seized; and, upon being put to the torture, confessed that he had been hired by the late sultan Selim to reside at Rhodes as his spy, and that this was the fifth letter he had sent over by the same way. He was immediately condemned to be broke upon the wheel, and died penitent, and in appearance a Christian, though probably with no other view than to save his life, or procure a milder sentence.

A Jewish spy discovered and put to death.

By this time the sultan, ashamed and exasperated at his ill success, called a general council, in which he made some stinging reflections on his vizier, for having represented the reduction of Rhodes as a very easy enterprize; to avoid the effects of whole repentment, b the subtle Mustapha declared, that hitherto they had fought the enemy as it were upon equal terms, as if they had been afraid of taking an ungenerous advantage of their superiority, by which, said he, we have given them an opportunity of opposing us with their united force where-ever we attacked them. But let us now resolve upon a general assault on several sides of the town, and see what a poor defence their strength, thus divided, will be able to make against our united one. The advice was immediately approved by all, and the time appointed for the execution of it was on the 24th of that month, and every thing was ordered to be got ready against that day. The town was actually assaulted accordingly at four different parts, after having suffered a continual fire for some time from their artillery, in order to widen the breaches; by which the grand master c easily understood their design, and that the bastions of England and Spain, the post of Provence, and terrace of Italy, were pitched upon for the assault, and took his precautions accordingly.

THE morning was no sooner come, than each party mounted their respective breach with an undaunted bravery, the young sultan, to animate them the more, having ordered his throne to be reared on an eminence, whence he could see all that was done. The Rhodesians, on the other hand, were no less diligent in repulsing them with their cannon and other fire-arms, with their melted lead, boiling oil, stink-pots, and other usual expedients. The one side ascend the scaling ladders, fearless of all that opposed them; the other overturns their ladders, and sends them tumbling down headlong into the ditches, where they d were overwhelmed with stones, or dispatched with darts and other missile weapons. The bastion of England proves the scene of the greatest slaughter and bloodshed, and the grand master makes that his post of honour, and, by his presence and example, inspires his men with fresh vigour and bravery, whilst the continual thunder of his artillery makes such horrid work among the assailants, as chills all their courage, and forces them to give way; the lieutenant-general, who commands the attack, leads them back with fresh vigour, mounts the breach at the head of all; immediately after comes a cannon ball from the Spanish bastion, which overturns him dead into the ditch. This disaster, instead of fear and dread, fills them with a furious desire of revenging his death; but all their obstinacy cannot make the Rhodesians go one step back, whilst the priests, monks, young men and e old, and even women, of every rank and age (V), assist them with an uncommon ardour and firmness, some in overwhelming the enemy with stones, others in destroying them with melted lead, sulphur, and other combustibles, and a third sort in supplying the combatants with bread, wine, and other refreshments.

THE assault was no less desperate and bloody on the bastion of Spain, where the knights, who guarded it, not expecting to be so soon attacked, and ashamed to stand idle, were assisting the bastion of Italy, which gave the Turks an opportunity to mount the breach, and penetrate as far as their intrenchments, where they planted no less than thirty of their standards on them. The grand master was quickly apprised of it, and ordered the bastion

(V) The historians of this siege give us several instances of this female courage and zeal; we shall only mention one, which happened upon this very bastion, where a Grecian woman of singular beauty assisted, with other women, the knights that defended it, till she had seen her lover fall among the rest of the slain, after a most gallant defence; the sight of which so affected her, that she went to her two children she had with these pathetic words; It is better for you, my dear children, to die by my hands, than by those of merciless in-

fids, or, which is infinitely worse, to be reserved for their most infamous pleasures.

This said, she killed them with a knife, and threw them into the fire; immediately after which she returns, puts on the cloaths of her lover, still reeking with his blood, girt his sword about her, ran into the thickest part of the combat, where she killed a Turk, wounded some others, and still kept fighting to the last moment of her life (28).

of Auvergne to play against them ; which was done with such diligence, and such continual a fire, whilst the Rhodians enter the bastion by the help of their casemates, and, sword in hand, fall upon them with equal fury ; so that the Turks, alike beset by the fire of the artillery, and the arms of the Rhodian knights, were forced to abandon the place with a considerable loss. The aga with great bravery rallies them afresh, and brings them back, by which time the grand master likewise appeared. The fight was renewed with greater fierceness ; and such slaughter was made on both sides, that the grand master was obliged to draw 200 men out of St. Nicholas tower to his assistance : these were commanded by some Rhodian knights, who led them on with such speed and bravery, that their very appearance on the bastion made the janissaries draw back, which Soliman observing from his eminence, caused a retreat to be sounded, to conceal the disgrace of their flight <sup>u</sup>. In these b attacks there fell about 15,000 of his best troops, besides several officers of distinction.
 The loss of the besieged was no less considerable, if we judge from the small number of their forces ; but the greatest of all to them was that of some of their bravest and most distinguished knights and commanders, many of whom were killed, and scarce any escaped unwounded. But the most dreadful fate of all had like to have fallen on the favourite vizier Mustapha, who had proposed this general assault ; the ill success of which had so enraged the proud soltan, that he condemned him to be shot with arrows at the head of his army ; which dreadful sentence was just ready to be executed, when the old basha, by his intreaties, obtained a suspension of it, in hopes that, when his fury was abated, he should likewise obtain his pardon <sup>w</sup>.

A dreadful havoc made of the Turks.

Soliman renounces the attack.

SOLIMAN, however, was so discouraged by his ill successes, that he was on the point of raising the siege ; and would have actually done so, had he not been diverted from it by the advice which he received from an Albanian deserter, some say by a letter from the traitor d' Amarald, that the far greater part of the knights were either killed or wounded, and those that remained altogether incapable of sustaining a fresh assault. This having determined him to try his fortune once more, the command of his forces was turned over to the basha Achmed ; and, to shew that he designed not to stir till he was master of the place, he ordered a house to be built on the adjacent mount Philermo, for his winter quarters. Achmed marched directly against the bastion of Spain, which had suffered the most, where, before he could open the trenches, his men fell thick and threefold by the constant d fire both of small and great guns from the bastion of Auvergne. He lost still a much greater number in rearing a rampart of earth to cover the attack, and give him an opportunity of sapping the wall ; and, as soon as he saw a large piece fall, ordered his men to mount the breach. They were no sooner come to the top but they found a new work, and entrenchments which Martinengo had reared ; and there they were welcomed with such a brisk fire from the artillery, that they were glad to recover their trenches with the utmost precipitation, and after having lost the much greater part of their men. The attack was renewed, and a reciprocal fire continued with great obstinacy, till a musquet-shot deprived that indefatigable engineer of one of his eyes, and the order of his assiduous services for some time.
 The grand master, having ordered him to be carried to his palace, took his place, and c kept it till he was quite cured, which was not till thirty-four days after, and continued all the time in the intrenchments with his handful of knights, scarcely allowing himself rest night or day, and ever ready to expose himself to the greatest dangers, with an ardour more becoming a junior officer than an old worn-out sovereign, which made his knights more lavish of their own lives than their paucity and present circumstances could well admit of.

 shot in the eye.

This bastion being almost ruined and lost, Achmed pursued his attacks on those of England, Provence, and Italy, with equal vigour and loss, meeting every-where with the same obstinate opposition from the few surviving knights, who now sought for a glorious death, being quite exhausted with fatigue, and too much overpowered by numbers to hope to drive the enemy away ; yet were they, even in this very extremity, timely succoured by f the grand prior of Navarre, who with his troop renewed the combat, and forced once more the Turks to retire with considerable loss. These continual repulses would most probably have discouraged the proud soltan from going farther, had he not received constant advices from the traitor d' Amarald, of the dreadful condition to which the place and garrison were reduced, without being so much as suspected of so horrid a treason. But about this time a servant and confidant of his, being observed to shoot an arrow with a billet over to the enemy, was forthwith seized and brought before the council, where his illusory and contradictory answers having increased their suspicion, he was immediately applied to the torture, where he confessed that he had sent frequent advices to the enemy, by the same way, of the weakest and most proper places for them to attack ; and added, that he acquainted them, g in his last letter, of the small number of knights that were left, and that they began to be

- a in want of powder, ball, and other warlike stores, as well as of all kinds of provisions for the mouth; notwithstanding which, the soltan must not expect the grand master to surrender the place till he was reduced to it by force of arms. D'Amarald was forthwith seized, and confined to the tower of St. Nicholas, where his servant's deposition was read to him; and soon after at his public trial, where he was charged with the whole treason by His trial, him, and accused as the person by whose order and direction he had acted what he did. Several other corroborating evidences also appeared against him, which confirmed the servant's deposition, and, among other things, his formerly saying, that Isle Adam would be the last grand master of Rhodes. All this he eluded with the utmost confidence; and, when he was himself put to the torture, endured it with the most surprising constancy, and with- torture, b out owning any part of the accusation, except what he had said at the election of the grand master, which he pretended was spoken partly out of resentment at seeing him preferred to himself, and partly out of diffidence of his competitor's martial capacity. This did not hinder his and his servant's being adjudged guilty, and condemned to death, him to be degraded, and stripped of the habit of the order, and his servant to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.

THE sentence was according accordingly executed, first on the domestic, and on the day and public following on the master, who was carried in a chair, on the 5th of November, to the place execution of execution, and beheld the whole apparatus of his death with surprising unconcern, and a constancy which made many people believe him innocent; and yet Fentanus, an author
c often quoted in this section, who was not only cotemporary and an eye-witness, but one of the judges, plainly intimates that he was guilty (W); in which he perfectly agrees with other writers of that time, particularly with Peter Gemellino del Campo, the commander Bourbon, and others, who were then at Rhodes. But, whatever some people may have inferred from his constancy, it is plain that he shewed in these last moments as little sign of devotion or religion as he did of repentance, and died more like an abandoned traitor than a suffering innocent *.

By this time Rhodes was reduced to the last extremity; the pope, emperor, and other The dismal crowned heads, had been long and often importuned by the grand master for speedy assistance without success; and, as an addition to all the other disasters, those succours which condition of were sent to him from France and England perished at sea. The new supply which he had
d sent for of provisions from Candia had the same ill fate; so that the winds, seas, and every thing, seemed combined to bring on the destruction of that city and order. The only resource which could be thought on, under so dismal a situation, was, to send for the few remaining knights and forces which were left to guard the other islands, to come to the defence of their capital, in hopes that, if they could save this, the others might in time be recovered, in case the Turks should seize upon them. On the other hand, Soliman, grown impatient at the small ground his general had gained, gave him express orders to renew the general attack with all imaginable speed and vigour, before the succours, which he apprehended were coming from Europe, obliged him to raise the siege. Achmed instantly obeyed, and raised a battery of seventeen large cannon against the bastion of Italy, and quickly after e made himself master of it, and obliged the garrison to retire farther into the city. Here the grand master was forced to demolish two of the churches, to prevent the enemy's seizing on them, and, with their materials, caused some new works and entrenchments to be made, to hinder their proceeding farther.

THE Turks, however, gained ground every day, though they still lost vast numbers of their men: at length the 30th of November came, when the grand master, and both he besiegers and besieged, thought the last assault was to be given. The basha Pyrrus, who commanded it, led his men directly to the intrenchments, upon which the bells of all the churches sounded the alarm. The grand master, and his few knights, troops, and citizens, ran in crowds, and in a confused disorderly manner, to the intrenchments, each f fighting in his own way, or rather as his fear directed him. This attack would have proved one of the most desperate that had yet been felt, had not a most vehement rain intervened, which carried away all the earth which the enemy had reared to serve them as a rampart against the artillery of the bastion of Auvergne; so that being now quite exposed to The Turks re- their continual fire, they fell in such great numbers, that the basha could no longer make pushed with them stand their ground, but all precipitately fled towards their camp. This last repulse great loss threw the proud soltan into such a fury, that none of his officers dared to come near him;

(W) We say intimates, because, in the account which he gives of his trial and execution, he only says, without naming him, that God had reserved the last person of the triumvirate for a more shameful death, and such as he had richly deserved; alluding, doubtless, to his having been one of the three knights who were appointed to see the magazines well stored for the siege; which trust, as we have elsewhere shewn, he had most shamefully betrayed, both with respect to the warlike provisions and those for the mouth (29).

and the shame of his having now spent near six whole months with such a numerous army a before the place, and having lost such myriads of his brave troops with so little advantage, had made him quite desperate, and they all dreaded the consequences of his resentment.

PYRRUS at length, having given it time to cool, ventured to approach him, and propose a new project to him, which, approved, could hardly fail of success; which was, to offer the town a generous capitulation; adding, that in case the stubborn knights should reject it, yet being now reduced to so small a number, as well as their forces and fortifications almost destroyed, the citizens, who were most of them Greeks, and less ambitious of glory than solicitous for their own preservation, would undoubtedly accept of any composition that should secure to them their lives and effects.

THIS proposal being relished by the sultan, letters were immediately dispersed about the b city in his name, exhorting them to submit to his government; and threatening them at the same time with the most dreadful effects of his resentment, if they persisted in their obstinacy. Pyrrus likewise dispatched a Genoese to approach as near as he could to the bastion of Auvergne, and to intreat the knights to take pity of so many of their Christian brethren, and not expose them to the dreadful effects which must follow their refusal of a capitulation, so generously offered them at their last extremity. Other agents were likewise employed in other places, to all of whom the grand master ordered some of his men to return this answer: That his order never treated with infidels but with sword in hand. An Albanian was sent next with a letter from the sultan to him, who met with the same repulse; after which, he ordered his men to fire upon any that should present themselves c upon the same pretence, which was actually done. But this did not prevent the Rhodians from listening to the terms offered by the Turks, and holding frequent cabals upon that subject, in which the general massacre of a town taken by assault, the dreadful slavery of those that escaped, the rape of their wives and daughters, the destruction of their churches, the profanation of their holy relics and sacred utensils, and other dire consequences of an obstinate refusal, being duly weighed against the sultan's offers, quickly determined them which party to take. The grand master, however, proving inexorable to all their intreaties, they applied to their Greek metropolitan, who readily went and represented all these things to him in the most pathetic terms, yet met with no better reception; but was told, that he and his knights were determined to be buried under the ruins of the city, if their d swords could no longer defend it, and he hoped their example would not permit them to shew less courage on that occasion. This answer produced a quite contrary effect; and, as the citizens thought delays dangerous at such a juncture, they came in a body to him by the very next morning, and plainly told him, that, if he paid no greater regard to their preservation, they would not fail of taking the most proper measures to preserve the lives and chastity of their wives and children *.

THIS resolution could not but greatly alarm the grand master; who thereupon called a council of all the knights, and informed them himself of the condition of the place; who all agreed, particularly the engineer Martinengo, that it was no longer defensible, and no other resource left but to accept the sultan's offers; to which all the rest unanimously agreed; e adding at the same time, that though they were all ready, according to the obligations of their order, to fight to the last drop of their blood, yet it was no less their duty to provide for the safety of the inhabitants, who, not being bound by the same obligations, ought not to be made a sacrifice to their glory. It was therefore agreed, with the grand master's consent, to accept of the next offers the sultan should make. He did not let them wait long; for the fear he was in of a fresh succour from Europe, the intrepidity of the knights, and the shame of being forced to raise the siege, prevailed upon him to hang out his pacific flag, which was quickly answered by another on the Rhodian side; upon which the Turks, coming out of their trenches, delivered up the sultan's letter for the grand master, to the grand prior of St. Giles, and the engineer Martinengo. The terms offered in it by Soliman f appeared so advantageous, that they immediately exchanged hostages, and the knights that were sent to him had the honour to be introduced to him, and to hear them confirmed by his own mouth, tho' not without threats of putting all to fire and sword in case of refusal, or even delay. Two ambassadors were forthwith sent to him, to demand a truce of three days, to settle the capitulation, and interests of the inhabitants, who were part Greeks, and part Latins; but this was absolutely refused by the impatient monarch, out of a suspicion of the rumoured succour being near, and that the truce was only to gain time till it was come.

HE therefore ordered the hostilities to be renewed with fresh fury, in which the Rhodians made a most noble defence, considering their small number, and that they had now only g the barbican, or false bray of the bastion of Spain, left to defend themselves in, and once

- a more repulsed the enemy ; at which the sultan was so enraged, that he resolved to overpower them by numbers on the next day ; which was, after a stout defence, so effectually done, that they were forced to abandon that outwork, and retire into the city. In the mean while the burghers, who had but a day or two before raised a fresh uproar against the grand master, under pretence that he was going to give them up a prey to an infidel who regarded neither oaths nor solemn treaties, perceiving their own danger, came now to desire him to renew the negotiations, and only begged the liberty of sending one of their deputies along with his, to secure their interests in the capitulation. He readily consented to it ; but gave them a charge to shew the basha Achmed the treaty formerly concluded between Bajazet and his predecessor d' Aubusson, in which the former had entailed a dreadful curse on any of his successors that should infringe it. This was done, in hopes that the shewing it to his master, who valued himself so much upon his strict observance of his law, might produce some qualm in him which might lengthen the agreement, for they were still as much in hopes of a succour from Europe as he was in fear of it ; but, to their great surprise, Achmed had no sooner perused than he tore it all in pieces, trampled it under his feet, and in a rage ordered them to be gone. The grand master found no other resource than to send them back to him the next day ; when that minister, who knew his master's impatience to have the affair concluded, quickly agreed with them upon the terms, which were in substance as follows :
- b
1. THAT the churches should not be profaned.
  2. THAT the inhabitants should not be forced to part with their children, to be made
- c janissaries.
3. THAT they should enjoy the free exercise of their religion.
  4. THAT they should be free from taxes during five years.
  5. THAT those who had a mind to leave the island, should have free leave to do so.
  6. THAT if the grand master and his knights had not a sufficient number of vessels to transport themselves and their effects into Candia, the sultan should supply that defect.
  7. THAT they should have twelve days allowed them, from the signing of the articles, to send all their effects on board.
  8. THAT they should have the liberty of carrying away their relics, chalices, and other sacred utensils, belonging to the great church of St. John, together with all their ornaments,
- d and other effects.
9. THAT they should likewise carry with them all the artillery with which they were wont to arm the galleys of the order.
  10. THAT all the islands belonging to it, together with the castle of St. Peter, should be delivered up to the Turks.
  11. THAT, for the more easy execution of these articles, the Turkish army should be removed at some miles distance from the capital.
  12. THAT the aga of the janissaries, at the head of 4000 of his men, should be allowed to go and take possession of the place<sup>r</sup>.
- e THESE articles were hardly signed and sealed by both sides, before a numerous fleet was perceived making all the sail they could towards the island, and was immediately supposed by both parties to be that which had been so long expected from Europe ; but, upon their nearer approach, they proved to be a Turkish armament, with a fresh reinforcement of troops, which the sultan had purposely sent for from Persia to relieve those who were quite spent with the fatigues of so long and bloody a siege. Had these arrived a few days sooner, the sultan would not in all probability have granted the besiegers such a favourable capitulation. These articles, however, did not prevent the rapacious janissaries from entering and plundering the churches, and even the tombs of the grand masters, and committing many other outrages against them, particularly in the noble infirmary, where they turned out all the sick and wounded, and seized upon all the plate, which, as was formerly hinted,
- f the patients used to be served in ; but upon the grand master's complaining of it to Achmed, he sent the aga word, that his head should answer for the breach of the capitulation, if every thing was not punctually restored.
- g In another conference which that basha had with him, he signified to him, that his young master had an extreme desire to see him, and that it would be looked upon as an high affront if he left the island without paying his respects to him. The grand master easily foresaw the danger either of complying with or declining the invitation ; yet, rather than give him a pretence for retracting any of his concessions, he chose to run the hazard of waiting upon him ; but such was the barbarous affectation of Turkish grandeur, that they kept that venerable old sovereign and his attendants at the tent-door, without any refreshment, during a whole snowy and frosty day, before he was admitted into his presence. At length, towards the evening, both he and his knights were presented with rich vests, and other garments, fit to appear in before him. Upon their admission, Soliman was struck a with the magnificent appearance of so old a gentleman; and, to comfort him under his present misfortune, ordered his interpreter to tell him, that the conquest and loss of empire were a mere common game of fortune: “ You see, said he to him, how all your hopes in “ your Christian friends and allies have been frustrated; but, could you be once prevailed “ upon to exchange your religion for ours, there is no honour or preferment that I would “ not gladly bestow upon you.” To this he answered with his usual piety and politeness, That such an apostasy would rather render him most unworthy of his least regard; forasmuch as it would be the highest dishonour to so great a prince, to be served by such a traitor and renegado; and that all the favour he had to request of him, was, that his retreat and embarkation might not be molested by any of his men. To which request he condescended b to give him his royal word, and his hand to kiss, assuring him, moreover, that if the term granted him proved too short, he would readily grant him a longer. Some days after, when he came to take a view of his new conquest, in which he was received at the grand master’s palace with all the honours due to so great a conqueror, he gave him several fresh marks of his esteem; and, upon his going out of his palace, he bid his interpreter tell him, that it was not without some reluctance that he obliged so brave a Christian at his years to abandon his habitation.

SOLIMAN resolving to depart for his capital two days after, the grand master, fearing he might not meet with the same generous usage from his ministers, being determined not to tarry behind, gave orders for their embarkation; which was done in the night-time, and not without great clutter and confusion, considering that, besides those of his order, he was followed by above 4000 inhabitants, whom he saw safely on board; and was the last of the whole company that left the shore (X), after having taken his last farewell of the sultan. They set sail soon after for the island of Candia, leaving him in possession of that, and of all the other islands which had belonged to the order, as well as of the castle of St. Peter, or Bidrsu, on the coasts of Caria; to the governors of which he sent express orders, by a felucca, to abandon the place, and to embark with the whole garrison, and sail after him for Candia. After having suffered the shock of a most violent storm, he at length came in sight of the island: he did not however immediately make for the haven, but staid riding in the road in his great carack, waiting for the rest of the vessels, which, having been d separated by the tempest, came gradually one after another to join him.

Complaints against the Genoese.

As soon as they were all landed, he took a melancholy review of them: some of the vessels, having been overladen, he was informed, were sunk; the rest that came safe on shore amounted to about 5000 souls, most of them in such a sorrowful and languishing condition, as drew tears from his eyes. His first care was, to send for provisions for them, cloaths, linen, and other necessaries, at his own charge, from the neighbouring countries, and he strove to comfort them all by his pious discourses and example. By this time the governor of the island, and other principal officers, attended, and gave him a grand reception, which, though no other than was due to his character and dignity, was however received e with no small reluctance; nor could he forbear expressing his resentment against the ungenerous policy of the Genoese, who, though they had above sixty gallies riding in the harbours of that island, yet could suffer that of Rhodes to be surrendered to the Turks, without lending him the least assistance; neither would he stay longer there, notwithstanding the governor’s earnest invitation to him to wait at least till the winter was over; but, as soon as he had got his fleet refitted, resolved to sail for Italy, in order to consult the pope about a new settlement. In the mean time, the Latin metropolitan of Rhodes arrived there with all his clergy, whom Soliman had been obliged to send away, out of complaisance to the Greeks

(X) The grand master was not a little grieved that he could not bring with him the young Amurat, the son of the unfortunate Zizim, as he had agreed to do in some disguise. This young prince had been left under the care and protection of the order when his father was conducted into France. We do not find that any mention was made of him in the capitulation, both Soliman and the grand master might have their reasons for not doing it; and as the latter would never have consented to deliver him up to the former, nor he have agreed to any articles if he had not, we may reasonably suppose, that each had formed his project concerning him; the one to convey him in some disguise on ship-board, and the other to have him so closely watched, as he accordingly was, that he should not escape him. The unfortunate young prince, finding himself thus unhappily beset, had no other way left but to conceal himself among the ruins of the houses which the cannon had overthrown, and wait for some favourable opportunity of gaining the sea-side, where a vessel or two were waiting to convey him away. But Soliman, who was resolved to have him at any rate, gave such strict orders to have him sought out, that he was quickly discovered and brought to him, with his two sons and two daughters. Soliman, who highly valued himself upon the character of a just prince, being unwilling to put him to death without some plausible pretence, asked him what religion he was of? To which he readily answered, that he was a Christian; upon which he condemned him and his two sons to be put to death for apostasy; and, to prevent any impostor being trumped up in their name, caused them to be strangled at the head of his army, and the daughters to be sent to Constantinople, and shut up in the seraglio (31).

a and Rhodians, who could not brook to have any Latins live among them. The grand master, to indemnify him for his loss, assigned him a pension out of the common treasury, admitted him into the order, and appointed him prior of their church, a dignity which gave him a seat in council, and the next to that of the grand master; and this prelate it was who informed them of the sad catastrophe of prince Amurat and his sons, mentioned in the last note <sup>z</sup>.

THE fleet was no sooner refitted than they set sail for Italy, about the beginning of March, Sails for Italy, after having dispatched some other vessels to carry the melancholy news of the loss of Rhodes to the pope, and other European powers. He had indeed no great hopes of that pontif's assistance, who had always acted as the same servile creature to the emperor as he had been before his election to the pontificate, yet, without a particular bull from him to confirm all the antient privileges and institutes of the order, and restoring the antient discipline, he easily foresaw it would be next to impossible to reunite them into one body or settlement; and this was what he sent a previous ambassy to him to solicit at the court of Rome, and what that pontif readily complied with. His next care was, to apply to the Christian powers for some proper sea-port where to reunite the members, and enable them to resume their pristine discipline and employment; without which, he reflected, they would quickly be dispersed, beyond the possibility of their being rejoined again; for if, whilst they reigned absolute sovereigns in Rhodes, he and his predecessors found it so difficult a task to keep them up to their respective duties, and to a due regard to their authority, as we have had frequent occasion to observe through this section, how much more unlikely was it that they should do so under his present circumstances? The pope had indeed granted him the desired bull, by which he obliged all the knights of the order to continue still under the authority of their exiled chief, under the severest penalties; and his ambassador had already sent it to Messina, to be delivered to him at his arrival, that being the place where he had appointed his fleet to land; but there being no Christian power to apply to for a fixed settlement, after they had so unanimously abandoned him in his greatest extremity, was a consideration that afforded him but a most hopeless prospect; yet did not this hinder him from taking with him all his Rhodians, who, being mostly sick and languishing, were all shipped on board a number of proper vessels, which he himself vouchsafed to accompany in a galley belonging to the order; and, for their better conveniency, he chose to sail from coast to coast, rather than to venture them on the wide sea; and this, joined to some bad weather they met with, so much retarded his arrival at Messina, that the caraccas and other galleys of the order, which had taken the shorter route, had reached that port long before him. Their apprehensions and vast concern for him were such as may be better imagined than expressed, not only from the violent storms which they themselves had experienced in their passage, and might, they justly feared, have proved more fatal to him nearer the land, but likewise from the multitude of Turkish and other corsairs which swarmed along those coasts.

AT length, after a long and impatient expectation, during which that considerate old gentleman had safely landed his Rhodians at Otranto on the Adriatic gulf, they had the inexpressible satisfaction to see him safely arrive at that of Messina with his small fleet, not now with the usual flag of the order, but with one that bore the image of the blessed Virgin, with her divine Son in her arms, and with this motto under her, Afflictis spes mea rebus. He was immediately surrounded with all the nobility and principal officers of the city, attending the Sicilian viceroy, who came to receive him on his landing, and whose eyes were all intently fixed on his venerable person, now no less to be admired for his firmness under his present misfortune, than for the glory which he had gained by the noble defence of the city of Rhodes. The viceroy, Count Monte Leone; immediately after the first compliments, offered him that port, in the emperor Charles V.'s name, to serve for a retreat and settlement to him and the knights of the order. The archbishop, and the rest of the nobility, expressed an uncommon satisfaction at the proposal, though it was answered only by a compliment of thanks on his part; after which they accompanied him to the palace in a silent and mournful procession, suitable to so great and so irretrievable a loss.

THE regret of having been forced to deliver up so considerable an island into the hands of the enemies of Christianity, in which his predecessors had reigned with so much glory, as we have seen, during the space of near 220 years, displayed itself plainly in all his words and actions, as well as in his looks; but, to prevent its occasioning the least diminution of his authority, his first care, after providing all proper accommodations for the sick and wounded, was, to call all the priors and commanders, who had been tardy in their duty, to a severe account. The first of those that were summoned before his council were the grand priors of St. Stephen and Barletta, who, in their own justification, produced a vast quantity of corn, arms, and other provisions, besides a great number of volunteers, which they had got ready to sail to Rhodes, but which had been unhappily kept back by violent storms and contrary winds during the two last months, insomuch that none of the captains or commanders had the courage to venture out, except the English chevalier Nieuport, who, being resolved at all hazards to convey a supply to the place, was driven back by the tempest against a rock, where his ship and whole cargo were sunk and lost. Several others from Spain, Portugal, Catalonia, France, and England, made it likewise appear, that the succours which they had severally got ready were retarded by the same unavoidable cause; all which was so fully proved, that the grand master intirely acquiesced, and could only utter these words, Blessed be God, who, in the midst of all our disasters, hath given me this satisfactory evidence, that they were not owing to the neglect of my religious brethren; after which, having tenderly embraced them, he added, It was highly necessary, for the honour of our order and your own, that such a strict examination should be made of your conduct; which will now testify to all the European powers, as well as to posterity, that if Rhodes could have been saved by the sole force of our order, we should not now bewail that bulwark of Christendom being in the hands of infidels<sup>a</sup>. But neither this, nor his other pious exhortations, could have prevented the greatest part of them from dispersing themselves, if he had not caused the pope's bull, which expressly forbade it, to be read before them, and mixed with his gentle threats some comfortable assurances of speedily obtaining perhaps a more safe and convenient one than that which they had lost.

*He sails to

In the interim a pestilence, which began to rage in Messina, soon spread itself among his small Rhodian fleet, and obliged him, with the governor's leave, to remove them to Baia, where, by his care to have their camp well intrenched against the insults of the corsairs, as well as supplied with proper medicines, and other necessaries, together with the change of air, they gradually recovered; so that, after a month's stay in it, he found them all fit to reimbarc, and sailed with them for Civita Vecchia, where they safely arrived soon after; and he took the direct road to Rome, impatient to consult the pontif about a new settlement for his order. This being just about the time that Adrian VI. was going to sign a shameful league with the emperor, the king of England, and the duke of Milan, against France, the pontif was obliged to put off giving him audience till that ceremony was concluded, being ashamed to have it performed in his presence; but received him afterwards with all the pomp and marks of esteem due to his merit and dignity. Having given him all the just praises that were due to his conduct and bravery, he assured him, that he would do all that lay in his power to preserve an order in every respect so useful and advantageous to Christendom; and, at his parting from him, honoured him with the title of the great defender of the Christian faith, and other such pompous epithets<sup>b</sup>, which he could more readily spare than the succours which he had so often begged of him in vain. The pope dying soon after of a violent fever, the guard of the conclave, which proceeded to a new election, was committed to him, and the knights that were then with him.

*The order set-

ADRIAN was succeeded by Julius de Medicis, a knight of their order, and the very first that was ever elected to that dignity, to the no small joy of the grand master and the whole order, who might now more safely depend upon his assistance and friendship, than on all the fair promises of his predecessor, for their happy re-establishment. They were not disappointed; for never did a pontif before Clement VII. which was the name he took, express more zeal or esteem for the order than he did; to which the account which was given him in a full consistory, by the grand master and chancellor, of the siege and defence of Rhodes, by 600 knights against 200,000 Turks, did not a little contribute. It was immediately agreed, that the order should at Viterbo till a more convenient place could be thought upon; whilst their gallies and other vessels continued at Civita Vecchia. To all these favours the new pontif was pleased to add another, that the grand master should hold the first place on the right of the throne in the papal chapel, and march alone before his holiness in all future cavalcades.

From this time the pontif and he held frequent conferences about the most proper place for the order to be settled in. Several of them were proposed, against which some material objections were started by one side or other; and, in the conclusion, the island of Maltha was agreed on as the strongest by nature, most conveniently situated, and having the most convenient ports; to which that of Gofa, contiguous to it, was to be joined, as a bulwark to the greater. We have described them both at the beginning of this chapter, and hinted, that they both belonged to the emperor Charles V. as king of Sicily; who had expressed a great readiness to grant it to them, on condition they should engage them-

- a selves in the care and defence of the city of Tripoli, which he had lately made himself master of, as we have seen in another place, but which being so unhappily surrounded on all sides by infidels and barbarians, would have cost more to keep it than it could be worth to them. There was still another no less considerable danger to be apprehended, viz. lest that politic monarch should take occasion, from his grant to the order, to bring it into some kind of subjection to him. The pope, therefore, having cautioned the grand master to be careful not to give him any handle for it in their subsequent negotiation, three of their ablest knights of the order were sent on an embassy, to treat with that prince about a grant; these were the grand prior of Castile, the famed engineer Martinengo, so often mentioned in this section, and the commander Bosio, the best and most exact author of the history of that order, of which he was then chaplain.

- b THESE three, being arrived at Madrid, where the emperor then was, requested him, in the name of the whole order, to make them a grant of those two islands, free from all manner of subjection to any but to their grand master and sovereign. This they did likewise without making the least mention of Tripoli: and only represented to him, that such a generous grant would make him esteemed as the second founder of an order which had proved, during several centuries, the most effectual bulwark of Christendom; and that the knights would be thereby put in a condition to suppress the swarms of Mohammedan corsairs, and secure his dominions, the islands of Sicily, Sardinia, the kingdom of Naples, and coasts of Italy, from their outrageous incursions. But to these proposals the crafty emperor refused to assent, unless Tripoli was included in the treaty; and insisted moreover, that the whole order should acknowledge him, and take the oaths to him as their lawful sovereign, without at the same time engaging himself to furnish them with any corn from his Italian dominions, which was in fact the most effectual means of starving them into his subjection, seeing they could not possibly subsist without such a supply <sup>f</sup>.

Hard terms offered by the emperor.

- c THESE hard terms, which the ambassadors well knew would never be accepted, obliged them to dispatch the commander Bosio to Viterbo, for new instructions, whilst the other two continued at the imperial court. By that time he was arrived at Viterbo, the grand master received a proposal much more glorious and advantageous, made to him, of recovering the island of Rhodes, and which could not but make that of the emperor still more distasteful.
- d The proposal was sent to him by that very basha Achmed who had had the greatest hand in the conquest of that island from them; but who, being now in open rebellion against soltan Soliman, offered to assist him in the recovery of it. However, as it would have been dangerous to reject the emperor's offers, considering what a number of rich priories they had in his dominions, which he perhaps would have been glad of any pretence to have seized to his own use, the grand master thought it more politic to defer giving a positive answer, till he had made a proper inquiry into Achmed's proposal; but, to amuse the emperor whilst that was doing, he begged leave to send a number of commissioners to go and take an exact view of the two islands of Malta and Gosa, and city of Tripoli, that, upon the report they made of them, he might take his measures how far he could comply with his terms. But whilst he was negotiating in this procrastinating manner with the court of Madrid, an accident happened, which determined him to prefer the attempt to regain their antient seat to the emperor's harsh conditions.

Achmed offers to restore Rhodes to the order.

- e ONE of the knights of the order had met a Rhodian ship at sea, whose company made grievous complaints against the tyranny they were under, and expressed an ardent desire to see themselves again under the milder and happier government of their ancient masters; assuring him at the same time, that the regaining of the island would not prove a difficult task at this time, when the fortifications continued still for the most part unrepaired, the garrison weak, and the aga, who commanded under the soltan, a renegado, who would be glad to efface his crime, by his timely assistance in an enterprize so advantageous to Christianity. These men, being some of the richest merchants and citizens of that island, were gladly prevailed upon to go and pay their respects to the grand master; and the knight accordingly brought them to him, where they confirmed to him all they had said before. The grand master dismissed them with all the caresses and encouragement they could wish; and, having acquainted the pope with the matter, they agreed that the commander Bosio should be dispatched thither with all possible haste and secrecy, who arrived there safely in the disguise of a merchant, and had by that means all the opportunity he wanted to inquire into the condition of the city, and how far the renegado aga might be wrought upon to assist in the affair. At the first opening of the matter to him, he seemed quite confounded; but, having recovered himself, gave Bosio the most satisfactory tokens of his feat and death.

remorse, and readiness upon any terms to be reconciled to the church, and expiate his apostasy by his future services to the order. He engaged to admit the grand master's forces into every place under his command, provided they were able to maintain themselves in them; and a sufficient quantity of arms and provisions was sent, to put the Rhodians in a condition to join with them. All this hopeful prospect was, however, unexpectedly quashed by the death of Achmed, whose head was sent to Constantinople by basha Ibrahim, as we have formerly shewn; at the news of which the aga was greatly alarmed, as well as the commander Bosio, who with great difficulty and danger got away from that island, and brought an account of his ill success, through the defeat of Achmed, and the discovery of his project against Rhodes, which had by that time hung too long in suspense, and been intrusted to too many persons to continue longer a secret<sup>a</sup>: so that Soliman had notice of it timely enough to take all proper precautions to render it abortive. b

BUT whilst Bosio continued at Rhodes, another proposal had been made to him by two other renegadoes, who had in a great measure the chief command of the maritime fortress of Modon in Morea, taken from the Venetians by Bajazet, anno 1498. These two men engaged to surrender the place to the order, out of a deep remorse for their apostasy, and represented that enterprize as much easier than that against Rhodes; and Bosio, upon a nearer inquiry into it, found many other conveniencies in it, which we pass over, because the project was over-ruled, and came to nothing, notwithstanding the many arguments which that commander offered in favour of it<sup>1</sup>.

geous report of the commissaries concerning Malth.

FOR by this time, the commissaries, sent to take a survey of the islands of Maltha and Gosa, and city of Tripoli, being returned, gave such an advantageous account of those two islands, the city, towns, havens, &c. as well as their strong situation by nature, command of those seas, and due distance from the Turks, as quite determined the pope and the order to prefer them to all others, in case the emperor could be prevailed upon to part with them upon more moderate terms; to obtain which, the pontif readily offered his interposition. We shall refer our readers, for the fuller account of those two islands, to the description we have given of them at the beginning of this chapter; but the report which they gave concerning the city and castle of Tripoli was vastly different. Its distance of 80 leagues from Maltha, the town being almost without fortifications, and situate on a sandy ground, on which no new ones could be reared; the castle quite out of repair, and commanded behind by a high hill; the whole place surrounded by the king of Tunis's dominions, who would never suffer it to continue long in the hands of the Christians; the barrenness of the soil round it, which produced nothing but dates; the danger of its being invested and famished: these, and such-like discouragements, did no less deter the council from taking the care of it upon them. And here the pope was likewise desired to interpose his good offices, to obtain a release from it<sup>1</sup>; but the pontif had but little sway with that monarch at this time, forasmuch as he was then negotiating a league with England and Venice, to maintain the liberty of Italy, after the famous battle of Pavia, and the imprisonment of Francis of France. We have elsewhere observed to what a degree of jealousy the grand master's voyage to Mar-seilles, to confer with the queen regent at that pontif's request, had raised at the imperial court, which at once seized on all the revenues of the order in Italy. On the other hand, his affected delays of coming to a resolution about accepting the emperor's offers of Maltha and Tripoli, had so far raised the resentment of Charles, that he sent a haughty embassy to the order at Viterbo, requiring a speedy compliance with his proposals, and threatening those that should oppose it with the highest marks of his displeasure. This high tone did not fail of alarming the council, especially those of it that were his subjects; yet did not this produce any other effect than a fresh representation to him of the importance of the matter in question, and of the necessity of proceeding in it with the utmost caution, especially as the grand master was then absent, without whose consent, and the participation of the pope, they could come to no resolution. They concluded with assuring him, that they would forthwith dispatch expresses to them both; adding, that they were informed, that the former was actually gone to the imperial court, in hopes of obtaining some abatement to the conditions insisted upon by it, particularly with respect to that of swearing fealty to the imperial crown<sup>a</sup>. They accordingly sent the commander Bosio to the grand master, who, being apprised by him of the sequestration above-mentioned, delayed sending an answer to them, and ordered him to follow him to the imperial court. f

UPON his arrival, as he had brought with him the princess d'Alençon, according to the queen regent's desire, and had by that means saved the emperor a great deal of ceremonial, he was readily admitted to treat with him about the two islands in question. The extreme

- a politeness and address with which he complained of the sequestration in Italy, quickly obtained a reversion of it; and the arguments he used to convince that monarch of the impossibility of the knights of such an order as his, which is composed of the subjects of several princes and states, owing subjection and fealty to any other than their own, failed not to make a due impression upon him. But, lest that should prove too short-lived, he artfully interlarded the proposal that had been made to him of recovering the isle of Rhodes, the strong party he had in its capital, whose inhabitants would be glad and ready to receive him again, as soon as they could be supplied with a sufficient number of arms in lieu of those the Turks had taken from him; and, with his majesty's leave, ordered the commander Bosio to come in, who confirmed the whole affair, as being the principal person employed in negotiating it. They farther assured him, that the sum of 50,000 or 60,000 crowns was all they wanted, to hire about 4000 men, and furnish the inhabitants with arms; upon which the emperor, who seemed to relish the enterprize, told them, that in case the duke d'Alva thought it practicable, he would readily contribute 25,000 crowns towards it. Before his departure, he obtained leave to pay a visit to king Francis, and was conducted thither by one of the emperor's guards to his narrow prison, where he assured that prince of his best endeavours and good offices towards obtaining his liberty, and mediating a peace between them; and he applied himself to those two grand points with great assiduity and success °. He was no less mindful of those that related to his order, in favour of which he got a clause inserted in the treaty between those two monarchs, by which they both engaged to solicit the pope for a new crusade against the infidels. Before he left Spain, he not only obtained a redress from the king of Portugal for some infringements made on the privileges of his order, with regard to the bestowing of some priories, together with a promise not to interfere any more in such matters, but likewise a sum of 15,000 crusadoes towards the holy war against the Turks.

The emperor approves their new design upon Rhodes.

- His ambassadors to Henry VIII. had not so good success on the like complaint. Tho' backed by a pressing recommendation from the French king, they could obtain no redress from him, for the much more considerable sequestrations he ordered on the lands and revenues of the order; so far from that, he absolutely forbid any money or effects belonging to it to be carried out of England. This measure being apprehended to proceed from a resentment of the English monarch, on account of the grand master's not having paid him the ceremony of a visit, as he had to those of France and Spain, he resolved to pass over into England, and sent the commander Bosio thither before him. He accordingly went into that kingdom, and met with a noble reception from that monarch, through the interest of his favourite minister the cardinal Wolsey p. All that we need repeat here is, that king Henry highly applauded his design of reconquering the island of Rhodes, and promised to contribute 20,000 crowns towards it, the value of which he actually paid afterwards in cannon, and other fire-arms. Many other civilities passed between them before the grand master left England; and he was on his journey to Italy highly satisfied with his success, when he heard the mortifying news of the civil war raised by the emperor's partisans the Colona, in the heart of the pope's dominions, in revenge of the league which that pontif had made against him; which war soon after spread itself over the greatest part of Italy, and not only reduced Clement VII. to the greatest difficulties, dangers, and indignities, but obliged him to submit to the most shameful conditions.

The grand master's voyage to England.

His hopes defeated by the war in Italy.

- The grand master spared no pains, after his return to Viterbo, to mediate a peace between the emperor and the pontif, as the only means to renew either his attempt on the isles of Rhodes, or his negotiations about those of Malta and Gosa. The former was earnestly pressed by the Greek patriarch Eutymius, who having deeply embarked in that progress, and in continual apprehensions of its being discovered, was most earnest with him for the speedy execution of it. On the other hand, as the necessary supplies for it were slow in coming, and the grand master not yet determined which of the two to fix on, the commander Bosio was dispatched thither a second time, to inquire into the state of the island, the people's dispositions, and to keep up the hearts of the inhabitants; whilst he assembled a grand council of the order at Viterbo, to consult about that important alternative. But as he had entrusted his design upon Rhodes but to very few, the majority quickly declared for Malta, provided it could be obtained without the irksome clog of subjection and fealty. Upon which new ambassadors were dispatched to Madrid, to treat about it; but these, to their great surprise, found the emperor as cold as he had been hot before for their settlement in these islands. New jealousies were started in his mind at this juncture, lest the grand master, who was a Frenchman, might pay too great a regard to the king his master; and the major-

rity of the order, who were attached to the pope, should shew the like partiality for him. <sup>a</sup>
This made him prolong the negotiation with them, and still insist upon the former terms; whilst the grand master, keeping his views intensely towards Rhodes, was in as little haste to come to a determination about the one, till he had tried what could be done to obtain the other, which could hardly be done before a peace was effectually concluded between the contending powers.

The project
against Rhodes discovered.

THE dismal and melancholy condition Italy was in at this time, the close imprisonment the pope was kept in by the emperor, and the motives which at length induced that monarch to offer him his liberty, though on such hard terms as forced the pontif upon the stratagem he made use of to escape out of his confinement, all these gave the grand master but a hopeless prospect of an accommodation between them; and, what was still worse, his <sup>b</sup> project upon Rhodes had by this time been wholly disconcerted; the sultan, to whom the secret had been betrayed, had now changed the garrison and its officers, and put to death all those who were suspected to have been concerned in the treason, both Christians and Turks. There was therefore no other way to obtain a speedy establishment, than the enterprise which Bosio had proposed against the city of Modon, or accepting of the islands of Malta and Gosa, upon the harsh conditions insisted upon by the emperor. Bosio was still very pressing for the former; but the grand master was more inclined to the latter, provided that monarch could be prevailed upon to recede from some of his demands. All this time the peace was still negotiating between him and the pope, and was at length concluded the 29th of June; upon which Bosio was dispatched to beg the pope's interposition <sup>c</sup> in favour of the order, who readily engaged to obtain a free grant of the two islands from the emperor, at their next interview at Bononia, where he was to give him the investiture of Naples. He did so accordingly; and with such a true zeal and affection for the order, of which, as we observed before, he was a member, that the emperor, who at such a juncture proved more pliable than he would yet have been at any other time, granted him whatever he asked; and the treaty was signed at Castel Franco, on the 24th of March, to the great joy of the grand master and of the whole order, to whom Bosio was ordered to bring it immediately after its being signed.

Bosio's disaster
and death.

THEIR joy, however, was not a little allayed, by finding the city of Tripoli still tacked <sup>d</sup> to the grant, which they were in hopes the pope's interest would have got off; but that which most sensibly affected them was the unfortunate loss of their brave and worthy ambassador Bosio, of which they were informed by the very person who brought the grant to them, who acquainted them at the same time with the double disaster that occasioned it, in his return from the emperor. The impatience he was in, he told them, to deposit that so long-desired instrument in the hands of the grand master, made him drive with such speed, that his coach was overturned, by which accident he was dangerously hurt; an unskilful surgeon, being brought to let him blood, chanced to wound the artery, upon which his arm immediately swelled, and the gangrene followed, which put an end to his life. He had, however, time and presence of mind enough, before he expired, to intrust <sup>e</sup> all his papers into the hands of a faithful Rhodian, named Staticogulo, and to convey them to Viterbo. He likewise charged him to communicate his dying request to the grand master, and to press him earnestly to keep up an intelligence with his private friends at Modon, from which he was fully persuaded the order would in time reap some considerable advantages. The Rhodian gentleman faithfully executed his commission, and was sent by him with some considerable presents to the two renegadoes, whom he found still firm in their first resolution, and ready to undertake any thing for the service of the religion or the order. The next thing the grand master had to do, was to send some of the principal knights on an embassy of thanks to the emperor; and another set of them into Sicily, to take the usual oaths to him before his viceroy, in his and the order's name; after which, he sent six others, <sup>f</sup> as his commissaries, to take possession of Malta and Gosa, and to secure the liberties and privileges of the inhabitants in his name, and in the usual form. He likewise dispatched some of his gallies, with a number of knights, on the same errand, to Tripoli, together with the commander Sanguess, whom he appointed governor of that city. With these he sent a good number of workmen, and materials for the repairing of the castle of St. Angelo, which was almost gone to ruin, together with a fresh supply of arms and ammunition; all which being gone before, he was preparing to set out himself with all the knights of the order, to take possession of his new dominions, after having been obliged to wander several years both by sea and land, without any settlement, and often in danger of seeing his flock dispersed through the world, and his order intirely ruined, and in continual fear lest his old <sup>g</sup> age and fatigues should carry him off before he could have the pleasure of seeing them possessed of a settlement.

THERE

a THERE were, however, two unforeseen difficulties started, which obliged him to delay his voyage; the one was, that when he came to ship away the corn that was bought in Sicily, the viceroy insisted upon its paying the usual duty which other vessels did: the other was about the privilege of coining money in his new government, which it was pretended the emperor would never allow, unless it were with his own stamp, and by his own officers. These unexpected proceedings not only caused a great surprise, but was likely to have occasioned a general murmuring through the whole order, some of the warmest among which immediately proposed to the council to send back the deed of gift to the emperor, as being granted to them with no other view than to ensnare them into a downright subjection to him, and, instead of those islands, to turn all their efforts against Modon, where the b order would be out of all danger from the ill designs of an ambitious and equivocating monarch, who, under the clearest and plainest expressions, was known still to reserve some latent ill meaning, ready to break out upon the first occasion. Their resentment gradually arose to such a height, that the far greater part declared themselves against having any thing to do with those two barren islands, or rather rocks, where they must at his pleasure either be starved or enslaved, and which consequently were not worth the parchment which the grant was wrote upon. Thus vehemently did the major part of the knights then present inveigh against that hypocritical monarch, and his ensnaring treaty; and insisted upon its being openly broke, and his grant rejected.

c BUT here the grand master interposed, with his usual calmness and prudence; and though he could not directly confute what was objected against both, yet greatly blamed their imprudent warmth, and represented to them the danger of such an open and violent rupture, at least till they were well assured that the proceedings of the viceroy were directed or countenanced by the emperor. To know which with greater certainty, he thought fit to send a fresh embassy, to represent to him the unreasonableness of that minister's demand, seeing both the Maltese and Tripolitans could not be looked upon in any other light than as regnicolæ, and ought of course to be as exempt from paying any duty on the corn that was sent thither for their subsistence, as they had been hitherto, since neither of their territories are capable of producing any, either for the garrisons or natives; the former of which spent, communibus annis, above 340,000 livres in that one article. And as to the privilege of coinage, it was no less unreasonable to deny it to a free republic, as they had been hitherto,
 d and as they thought his imperial majesty had continued them. But when the ambassadors came to represent these things to him, they not only found that his viceroy had done nothing but by his orders, but that he was fully determined to refuse them these two privileges, in spite of all their remonstrances; and, with respect to the last, he haughtily told them, that he would never consent to have money coined in Malta, nor any but his own to go current in it.

THIS inflexible denial must have infallibly been followed by the total breach of the treaty, if the ambassadors had kept close to their instructions; but they rather chose to send an express to acquaint the grand master with it. The whole council was more than ever e inflamed at that monarch's behaviour, it being now visible that he had no other design than that of enslaving them to his own will. The grand master had much ado to pacify them; yet at length his advice so far prevailed, that they agreed to wait till the pope had made a further trial of his interest with him, on condition that, if he did not succeed, the grant should be immediately sent back, and the order should seek for another settlement either at Modon, or at any other place, rather than where Charles V. had any title or pretence. The pope, having readily agreed to try once more his good offices on that important point, immediately sent orders to his nephew Salviati, who then resided at the emperor's court, as ambassador from the grand master, and the whole order, to use his utmost efforts in his name, and as chief protector of it; and that minister executed his commission with such f zeal and address, that he at length obtained a fresh treaty from him, in which those two privileges were included. All difficulties being now happily removed, the grand master ordered his two large caracks, the gallies of the order, and a good number of other transportships, laden with great quantities of arms, ammunition, and troops, to be got ready to sail for Malta; he and his knights embarked in the former, with all the effects, records, and treasure, belonging to the order; and the rest in the latter. In their passage they suffered g very much by a violent storm, in which one of their gallies split against a rock, and one of the caracks was run aground by the violence of the waves, after having broke her three anchors; and stuck so fast, that they expected every moment to see it split in pieces, when, by good Providence, a contrary wind disengaged her, without any farther damage, which was universally looked upon as a lucky omen; after which they all arrived safe at that island on the 26th of October. The grand master and principal officers landed at the chief port, which we have already described; and went thence directly to the church of St. Laurence, to return thanks for their new settlement and happy arrival; then they proceeded to the poor town or borough, which is situate at the foot of the castle of St. Angelo. Here they were forced to take their first lodgings in poor fishermen's huts. The grand master went and made his residence in the castle, with the principal knights, where he found the accommodations were somewhat better, tho' very mean, and out of repair. Three days after which he went to take possession of the city, which, from the beginning, bore the name of the island, but was since called the Notable City, which the reader will find described at the beginning of this chapter, and, after that, of the whole island, from which the order thenceforth assumed a new name, and the knights have ever since stiled themselves, and been known by the name of, knights of Maltha.

S E C T. IV.

The history of the order of Maltha, from their first settlement in that island.

THEIR first care, after having settled their authority through the two islands, was to provide some better accommodations for the present, and to chuse a proper place where to fix their habitation. But as the island had no other defence than the old castle of St. Angelo, and lay so open on all sides that it would have required greater sums than their exhausted treasure would at present allow of to put it in a thorough state of defence, he was obliged to content himself with surrounding that borough above-mentioned, wherein he had ordered new buildings to be reared for the present habitation of his knights, with a stout wall, to prevent its being surpris'd by the Turkish and Barbary corsairs. His design, indeed, was not at this time to have fixed the abode of the order in that bare and defenceless island, but to have followed the brave Bosio's last advice, which was to stay only in it till he had got a sufficient force to attempt the conquest of Modon, which was not only a populous and opulent place, but did moreover lie more convenient for a future attempt, whenever fortune threw an opportunity in their hands, to recover the island of Rhodes, their antient seat, from the Turks, which the barrenness and naked condition of this, together with the rudeness of the inhabitants, made him and the whole order cherish a constant desire after. However, this did not hinder his taking all the proper measures for securing of this as well as that of Gosa, and laying out a proper plan for securing them from attacks, in case their design against Modon should fail<sup>a</sup>. In the mean while, as the superstition of those times reigned equally among those of the order, the grand master, among other precious relicks which they had brought away from Rhodes into this island, caused the arm of St. Catherine, a favourite saint of the Italian tongue, to be carried in a grand procession to the cathedral church, it being then her festival day. Whilst they were on their march, one of the centinels gave them notice that a large Turkish merchantman was wrecked on that coast. The grand master immediately dispatched some of his knights and other soldiers thither, who, among the rest of the passengers that had gained the shore, took particular cognizance of two, viz. Isaac the patron of the ship, who was a native of Modon, and of one Maurithisela Nocker, an excellent engineer, whom the grand master retained in his service, and whom he immediately employed in the new fortifications of the place, in which he shewed a more than common skill and diligence<sup>b</sup>; all which was looked upon as a good omen of their future establishment.

ABOUT the same time, Mr. Sangeffe, the knight who had been sent governor of Tripoli, having received some fresh reinforcements from Maltha, was making frequent incursions on the territories of the adjacent cities of Gienson and Tachora, which had lately revolted from the king of Tunis, from whence he brought both plunder and slaves, in such quantity as obliged the inhabitants of the first of those cities to buy their peace from him, with the grand master's consent, by a small tribute, which they engaged to pay yearly to him<sup>c</sup>; whilst that of the latter, scorning to be tributary to the order, continued making reprisals on the Tripolitans, which ended in a bloody war between the states of Barbary, and the Christian powers, and in which the knights of Maltha signalized themselves no less than they had hitherto done against the Asiatic Turks, as we have formerly seen in the several histories of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, and as we shall have occasion farther to shew in the sequel of this chapter.

THE grand master was hardly well settled in Maltha, before the emperor and other European princes endeavoured to engage him in a war against these Barbary infidels, and to enlarge his dominions there, especially as the city of Tripoli could hardly subsist long in

- a their hands within the narrow territory to which it was confined. But the enterprize on Modon at this time appearing to him more considerable, his first care was to furnish himself with a sufficient number of troops and shipping; the command of which, as it was not expedient for him to leave the island, he gave to two of the bravest and most expert commanders; a considerable number of other knights embarked with them for that expedition; and the whole fleet set sail for Modon on the 27th of August 1531. We shall not enlarge on the particulars of that unsuccessful enterprize, which ended so little to the honour of the order; but only observe upon the whole, that tho' every thing seemed to promise a more happy event, the two renegadoes not only continuing true to their promise, but even impatient to signalize themselves by their zeal and bravery, yet the attempt miscarried through
- b the baseness and avarice of the Malttese forces, which were privately conveyed thither in the night, and who, instead of waiting for any farther orders, dispersed themselves through the town, and began to pillage it, and commit the most cruel outrages, which drove the greatest part of the inhabitants into the castle, where the governor resided, with a small garrison. As soon as he was informed of the matter, he forthwith caused arms to be distributed amongst them, and marching at their head with some of his regular troops, fell upon these stragglers, before they could re-unite, and made a bloody slaughter among them, though they quickly rallied, and made an obstinate defence against him.

- In the mean time, the signal which had been given to the gallies, that stood off the small island of Sapienza, to approach, which was by the firing of a cannon, not being perceived by them, the sound being carried off by a contrary wind, they did not move towards the city till they were fetched by a shallop, which was sent to them by young Salviati, the son of one of the two renegadoes; so that they did not approach the place till about noon; by which time the governor had ordered matters so well, and received such a strong reinforcement from a neighbouring camp, designed for the war in Hungary, that they saw themselves obliged to abandon the enterprize, after having lost some of their bravest knights, and a good number of their troops. The worst of all was, that the grand prior of Rome, who commanded in chief, having blocked up the gates of the castle into which the governor had been obliged to retire, did not cause the retreat to be sounded till he had seen his Malttese troops glutted with the richest plunder, in which the knights and chief officers of the order
- c carried off the most considerable share, and, among other spoils, above 800 women and virgins captives into their vessels; all which sailed back to Malta without opposition or disaster.

The gallies come too late to their assistance:

- THE news of this disappointment gave the grand master the most sensible displeasure, which yet he endeavoured to dispel, by looking upon it as a sign that Providence designed their fixed settlement to be at Malta; from which time he bestowed his whole care in fortifying it. This mortification was soon followed by another, which did not less affect him. The episcopal see of that island being become vacant, the chapter immediately named three persons, one of whom was, according to agreement, to be nominated to that dignity by the emperor. Among these was Thomas Bosio, vice-chancellor of the order, and brother
- e to the late commander of that name, so often mentioned in the last section, whom the grand master more particularly recommended, both to that monarch and to the pope, as the person whose nomination to that see would be esteemed as a singular favour both by him and the whole order. The emperor accordingly declared him bishop of Malta, and gave his diploma to the Malttese ambassador, who sent it with all speed to the grand master by an express, whose arrival caused an universal joy. The grand master in particular, to testify his gratitude to the pontif, sent an extraordinary embassy to thank him for his concurrence in the choice, together with Bosio to receive his consecration from him. But how thunder-struck were they both, when, upon their first audience from him, they were told in a
- f haughty tone by him, that the see of Malta was already filled up by cardinal Ginucchy, whom he had nominated to it, and who was then sending his vicar thither to take possession of it in his name. The ambassador tried in vain to represent to him, that the choice of a Malttese prelate was wholly invested in the emperor, according to the treaty between him and the order; but he was answered in the same tone, It belongs to us, and not to the emperor, to provide for the church, since the island is now passed into other hands. Immediately after which they were both dismissed.

- If the news of the pope's proceedings affected the grand master and the order, they did much more incense the haughty monarch, who is said to have vented the first effects of his resentment in the most bitter invectives against that artful pontif. Sundry conjectures have been made concerning the motives which induced him to so sudden and surprising a change,
- g which we have no time to dwell upon. As to the grand master, as he was not at that time in a condition to oppose that politic and arbitrary proceeding, he therefore thought it the wisest way to leave it to Charles to dispute the matter with him; which he accordingly did, and left no stone unturned that could induce him to desist from his nomination of that cardinal. Clement not only insisted upon his having the right to it, to his death, but even in his last moments charged the cardinal Caraffa to press his successor, whoever he was, to follow the same interesting tract, and insist upon the validity of Ginucchy's right to that see. But as he died soon after, his successor Paul III. who had other interests in view, was easily prevailed upon to yield to the emperor, and the matter was easily compromised in favour of Bosio.

ABOUT this time it was also that Diego de Toledo, grand prior of Castile, obtained a division of that rich priory in favour of his two nephews; from which time they were called the grand priories of Castilia and Leon.

The Maltese fleet joins that of the emperor.

ALL this while the emperor and new pope were making great preparations against the Turks, according to the league which the former had made with the predecessor of the latter. b

The grand master failed not to be earnestly invited by both to join his forces to theirs, which his obligations to them made him readily comply with. He accordingly equipt the great carack of the order, to which he joined as large a number of his gallies and other vessels as he could spare; on board of which he sent some of the best commanders and bravest knights of the order. These quickly joined the confederate fleet, commanded by the famed admiral Doria, on the 8th of August 1532. The event of which was, that the expedition of this united fleet was successful, and would, in all likelihood, have been attended with the conquest of Modon, if the soldiery, discouraged by the ill success of the last attempt against it, had not openly murmured, and obliged the admiral to turn his forces against Coron. The Maltese commanders would indeed have been much better pleased to have displayed their valour against the other; but the disappointment did not hinder them from acting with their usual zeal and bravery. Never did men mount to the assault with greater courage, and maintain their post with more intrepidity, against the fire, darts, melted lead, and other destructive efforts of the besieged, or more quickly fill up the places of those that were killed, till they had the very first of all planted the standard of the order on the walls: a circumstance which had such an effect both on the besiegers and besieged, that, whilst the former were inspired with fresh courage by their example, the others were so disheartened, that they immediately displayed the white flag, and hastened to capitulate<sup>1</sup>. Before the winter came on, the Maltese fleet sailed along the same coast, where they made themselves masters of the castle of Ardinel, and some other fortresses situated upon it, whilst Doria did the same by the city of Patras; by which time the weather obliged them to separate, and each to return to their respective homes<sup>2</sup>. c

THEY were all obliged again, in the next year, to appear before Coron, which had been invested by the Turks by sea and land. The Maltese Caracca was placed in the front of the confederate fleet, and by its height made a dreadful havock amongst the Turks, whilst Doria was endeavouring, under the covert of the fire and smoke on both sides, to convey some vessels through those of the enemy, with fresh troops into the place; but the attempt was so ill-managed, that a great number of them were lost; yet the Maltese gallies coming in time to their assistance, gave a sudden turn to the engagement, and the Turks, who had boarded some of their vessels sword in hand, and thought themselves masters of them, had the mortification to see themselves loaded with those chains which they had designed against the order, and to be carried away prisoners to Malta; for their fleet was quickly recalled by the grand master to the defence of the island, which was now threatened with an invasion by the famed Turkish corsair Barbarossa, who ranged those seas at the head of above fourscore gallies. At their arrival, the council were of opinion, that, as the island had hardly any other fortifications than the castle of St. Angelo, the grand master should transport himself from thence into Sicily, with all the relicks, church-ornaments, and treasure of the order. But the brave old gentleman rejected the proposal with a becoming firmness; telling them, at the same time, that as he had never yet fled from the enemies of Christianity, so neither would he now consent to give such an ill example to the order, merely to preserve the short remains of a weak and worn-out life. This said, he immediately ordered the fortifications to be forthwith carried on with all possible speed, both in the borough and city, and all the inhabitants of the island, and a new chapter of the order, to be summoned from all parts of Europe, into which the major part of them were dispersed<sup>3</sup>. e

THIS last step was the more necessary at this time, though the Turkish corsair had taken a different route, in order to call in all the responsons, arrears, and other revenues, of the order, to supply the expence of these fortifications, maintain their army and fleet, and such-like exigencies, but likewise to rectify a number of other abuses which were crept in during the eight years of their wandering without a settlement. Thus far had all things been carried on to the satisfaction of the grand master, and the more sober and zealous part of the order; when, on a sudden, a scuffle happening between a young Florentine secular, belong- g a ing to the grand prior of Rome, and a young French knight, in which the latter was run through, had like to have proved of the most dangerous consequence, and hastened the grand master's death. For the commander Servier, of the Provencial tongue, suspecting that the Florentine had killed his nephew by some foul stratagem, sought him out with a full design of revenging his death; and having found him, accompanied with some of his young countrymen, attacked and wounded some, and put the rest to flight; the quarrel soon became universal, in which some knights declared for the one, and others for the other side. The whole order and city was up in arms, and such a dreadful uproar ensued as had never been known since the foundation of the order.

b THE grand master, respected as he was by them all, in vain interposed his authority to oblige them to retire; his commands were now disregarded, and each party listened only to the dictates of their fury. The intervening night rather increased than allayed the tumult and mutual hostilities; insomuch that the council were obliged to oppose the grand master's coming out to them, lest he should meet with some random shot in the dark; in whose stead they sent one of their number, named Manosc, a person highly revered for his years and merit, who, by his address and persuasions, prevailed upon both sides to lay down their arms, and retire to their respective quarters, where they had time to cool, and reflect on the sad effects of their seditious madness. The result was, that the grand master found himself obliged to make a severe example of a few of the most desperate offenders; some of whom, refusing to acknowledge their crime, were ordered to be thrown into the sea, and about a dozen of the rest to be publicly degraded, and stripped of the cross and other ornaments of the order<sup>m</sup>. This disaster, joined to the mortifying news he received at that time, of what our king Henry VIII. was doing in England, threw the old gentleman, already worn out with age and fatigues, into a violent fever, of which he languished till the 21st of August 1534, on which he expired, to the great loss and regret of the whole order, by whom he was so justly and universally beloved and respected. He died in the 70th year of his age, and 14th of his grand mastership. In justice to his great merit, the following epitaph was ordered to be engraved over his tomb: Here rests Virtue victorious over Fortune. Before he died, he caused a noble palace to be built in the castle of S. Angelo, for himself and successors, and another in the old city of Malta, besides other edifices for the order, and several necessary fortifications both in this island and that of Gosa. He likewise obtained several very considerable grants and privileges, both before and after the loss of Rhodes from the popes, the emperor, the kings of France and Spain, in favour of the order, which we have not room to repeat<sup>n</sup>.

c He was succeeded by Peter, al. Perino de Ponte, a native of Ast in Italy, and uncle to pope Julius III. on the 26th of the same month, being then absent in his bailiwick of St. Euphemia in Calabria. He received the news of his election from T. Bosio, the new bishop of Malta, with the greatest regret; but upon his receiving another express from thence, with an account of the wars that reigned in Tunis, and the danger Tripoli and Malta were in from the formidable and successful Barbarossa, who was by this time become master of Algiers and Tunis, he made all the haste he could to his new government, where he arrived on the 10th of November following. His first care, after having dispatched a strong reinforcement into Tripoli, was to send an embassy to the emperor, to desire him to equip a powerful fleet against that corsair, without which it was impossible for that city, even with a much stronger force and garrison, to make any long opposition against him. Charles V. received about the same time another embassy from Muley Hassan, the deprived king of Tunis, much to the same effect; and both these took care to represent to him the danger which his dominions in Naples and Sicily would be in, if he did not quickly send a superior force to suppress those of the Turkish corsair, now king of Algiers, and in possession of Tunis. The emperor was, upon these motives, as well as to suppress the corsairs, which quite interrupted the commerce of those seas, easily prevailed upon to carry his arms into Africa, especially as soon as he found that his double artifice against the corsair had been discovered, and his private ambassador put to death by him<sup>p</sup>.

f As soon as the grand master and order were assured of that monarch's designs and preparations for a war in Africa, they ordered four of their best galleys to be equipped, together with their large carack, which of itself is almost equivalent to a squadron, which were attended by eighteen brigantines of different sizes and uses. A considerable number of the bravest knights went on board this fleet, which was commanded by the brave Aurelio Bottigella, an old experienced officer, whilst the knight De Grotee was made captain of the great carack, and the whole furnished with a proportionable number of troops, and with all necessary provision for such an expedition, fit to join the emperor's armament, which consisted of 300 sail, 25,000 foot, 2000 horse, and a very great number of volunteers of the best families in Europe; all which that monarch resolved to command in person. We shall not here repeat what hath been related at full length in another place, of this long expedition; but as our present subject is confined to the history of Malta, we shall only observe, in justice to the valorous knights, such instances in which they signalized themselves most by their bravery and services.

THE first was at the siege of Goletta, which was the first place the imperial fleet attacked with success. In this one of the knights of the order, named Couverfa, an excellent engineer, found out a stratagem to come almost close to the main tower, by means of a Barcalonga, armed with long cannon, and filled with musketeers, and which, by its continual plying it with broadsides, kept battering with strange success, whilst the small-arms destroyed by the same constant fire, all the Turks that appeared on the breach, and prevented their defending or repairing it, till it was become wide enough for the assault, which it quickly was, by the large artillery which cannonaded it, not only from that but from the rest of the vessels, and more particularly from the great carack, which was situated behind all the rest, and, by its advantageous height, could fire over all others, and made a most dreadful execution against the place. The breach was hardly made wide enough to be scaled, before the knights of Malta jumped out of their gallies into the long-boats, and thence into the sea, with their swords in their hands, and waded through the water above their girdles, it being too shallow for boats to approach the shore. The standard-bearer of the order was the first that jumped into the water, and led the rest to the attack, they claiming everywhere, as has been often hinted, the post of honour, and, through volleys of terrible firing and missile weapons, gained the shore, and quickly after the top of the breach, where they planted their great standard. A great number lost their lives, and scarcely one of them came off unwounded; and the emperor did them that justice to own, upon his being congratulated on the taking that important place, that it was chiefly owing to the valour of the Maltese knights. He made the same acknowledgement to the grand master, who, upon his return, sent him a congratulatory embassy on his great success in Africa. The city of Tunis soon followed the fortress of Goletta; after the surrender of which, the emperor, designing to return into Europe, took his last dinner on board the great carack, where he was magnificently entertained, and gave the surviving knights the greatest encomiums, and marks of his esteem and gratitude to the order. These he accompanied with considerable presents, and with two new grants; by one of which they were permitted to send for what corn or other provisions they wanted from Sicily, without duty or demur; and by the other he engaged that none of the order should be permitted to enjoy any of the estates or revenues of the order, throughout all his dominions, unless they were lawfully authorized thereto by the grand master and his council, or till the originals had been examined and registered by himself, or such ministers as he should appoint for that purpose<sup>a</sup>. The fleet sailed for Malta, where, at their arrival, they received the melancholy news of the grand master's death, on the 17th of November, before he had enjoyed that dignity a whole year.

HE was succeeded by Didier de Tolon de St. Jalle, in Latin, Desiderius de Tollone de Sancta Jalla, a native of Provence, and then grand prior of Thoulouse, where he resided at the time of his election. The noble conduct and bravery which he had formerly shewn in defence of Rhodes, had gained him long ago the esteem, and now the majority of votes, of the order. The present juncture required a person of his experience and merit at this time, in which the Turkish corsairs, quite tired with the dreadful havock which Botigella, grand prior of Pisa, who seldom quitted the sea, and never sailed out without sinking or making some considerable prizes on them, had agreed to enter into a strong confederacy, either to surprise the city of Tripoli, where his retreat was, or, if that failed, to lay close siege to it by sea and land; in either of which they were sure of all the assistance of Barbarossa, and Hayradin, the then lord of Tagiora. This last had undertaken the command and conduct of the whole enterprize; but had not carried it on so secretly, but the governor had timely notice enough of it to be able to give him a warm reception. Hayradin accordingly came thither in the dead of the night with his whole force, and began to scale the walls, where he imagined them to be most defenceless. They no sooner appeared at the foot of them, but the garrison, which had been kept up in arms, poured down such streams of wild-fire, boiling oil, melted lead, and such volleys of stones, whilst the small and great guns annoyed those that stood farthest off, as quickly gave them to understand how they were ready prepared for them. Yet did not this discourage them from following the attack with great fury and vigour, till Hayradin, who was foremost in one of the escalades, was knocked down by a musket-shot from the top of his ladder. He fell down into the ditch below, and was taken up breathless by his troops, which threw them into such a panic and confusion, that they immediately dispersed themselves, leaving a vast number of their slain at the foot of the walls<sup>b</sup>.

a THE governor, however, rightly judged that this would not be the last visit that Hayradin Tripoli newly fortified. would pay him; and as the walls of the city were quite out of repair, and defended by no bulwarks, whilst that Turkish corsair held the strong tower of Alcaid on that coast, whence he could at any time make some fresh attempt upon it, he immediately sent an express to Malta, to propose to the council the fortifying of the one, and the demolishing of the other. His advice being approved of, the commander Botigella, now general of the galleys, was forthwith dispatched thither with a sufficient force, who, having landed his men at Tripoli, immediately marched with his troops, and a body of horse of hired Arabs, towards the tower above-mentioned, and, without staying to open the trenches, or any other covering than his gabions, levelled his artillery against it. Hayradin, being informed of it, came at the head of his Turks to its defence; but was intercepted by a stout detachment of Maltese knights, at the head of the hired Arabs, and repulsed with loss; so that all he could do was to convey about 50 or 60 Turks into the place, and to annoy the Christians with some slight skirmishes. Botigella, perceiving that his cannon did not make so quick a dispatch as he wished, sent for some of his galleys, under the shelter of which he quickly sprung a mine, which brought part of the wall down, and buried the greater part of the corsairs under it; whilst the rest, hardly recovered from their fright, seeing the Maltese mount the breach with sword in hand, laid down their arms. The tower was forthwith razed to the ground; after which Botigella, at the head of his little army, marched towards the town of Adabus, whence he drove Hayradin, who had intrenched himself in it, and gave the plunder of the place to the Arabs.

In his return to Malta, he attacked a large galleon coming from Egypt, richly laden, Takes a rich and commanded by a brave Turk, named Ardor, who gave him a very warm reception; prize. notwithstanding galleys which his made their way up to him through all his fire, and boarded it sword in hand. This prize was reckoned worth 160,000 crowns, besides 200 Turkish prisoners, with which he entered the harbour, and was received with the loud acclamations of the whole order, who came to meet him on his landing, and to congratulate his success. Their public rejoicings were greatly damped, not only by two till unheard-of crimes, committed by two young persons belonging to the order (B), but, what was still more afflicting, by the news which was soon after brought of the death of the new grand master, who fell The grand master dies. ill on his way to Malta, and died at Montpelier on the 26th of September, about ten months 1536. after his election.

THE chapter soon proceeded to a new election, which the generality hoped would fall 44. John de either on the brave and hitherto successful Botigella, or on Goleo bailiff of Lango, both Homedes. intitled to it, not only by seniority, but much more by their singular merit, and the important services they had done to the order; when, to their great surprise and mortification, the electing members, by the artifice and cabals of Garcia Cortez, of the tongue of Aragon, gave their votes in favour of John d'Omedes, or de Homedes, of the same tongue, and bailiff of Capse, who had formerly signalized himself likewise, and had lost an eye in the defence of Rhodes. Botigella, in spite of his high merit, not only lost the election, but quickly after the command of the Maltese galleys, that post being bestowed upon a younger knight, named Leo de Strozzi, then grand prior of Capua, who had received that dignity, together with the habit of the order, from his uncle pope Clement VII. some time before. This young admiral, though as yet neither soldier nor sailor, quickly signalized himself at the head of his four galleys, in the first expedition he made under the famed Andrew Doria, against about a dozen of stout Turkish ships, commanded by the warlike Ali Zelif, at the head of a number of as desperate janissaries as perhaps ever appeared on these seas.

DORIA, who had no less than 34 galleys, besides the four Maltese commanded by Strozzi, Strozzi signalizes himself. met the Turks in the chanel of Corfu, with a kind of confidence of obtaining an easy victory; but met with a most obstinate repulse, vast numbers falling on both sides; and the Turks attacked the Maltese, their antient enemies, with such fury, that the knight Operto, who commanded the Capitana, was killed in defending it. They were just ready to board it sword in hand, when Strozzi ordered a culverine to be levelled against them, which had the good-fortune to sink both them and their galley. The Maltese, thus happily disengaged, bent their whole force against the Capitana of the Turks, where a more bloody battle began, wherein the Turks could not prevent the knights from boarding it,

(B) The first of these crimes was the stripping of the image of the Virgin Mary of Philermo, brought away from the island of Rhodes, of every thing which the devotion of these times had enriched it with, and were esteemed of immense value; which theft was committed by a young novice, named Diacono, who was a candidate for a chaplainship of the order.

The other was a murder committed by one of the knights, a native of England, upon a Maltese woman, with whom he was desperately in love, and upon a slight suspicion, in a mad fit of jealousy, he had stabbed her to death with his own hand.

They were both apprehended, and, by order of the grand master's lieutenant, turned over to the secular court, where they were both condemned, and soon after executed, about a mile from the haven, to which place they were conveyed, sewed each in a sack, and flung alive into the sea*.

although they defended it as long as there was a man left alive in it; so that Strozzi made himself master of it without taking one single prisoner. This made the victory incline towards the Christians, though it proved a dear one both to the imperial and Malthese squadrons, by the loss of some of the best officers<sup>7</sup>.

His reception
at Maltha.

DORIA, resolving soon after to attack the squadron which was conducting the French ambassador to the Porte, Strozzi withdrew with his Malthese. In his way, he had the good-fortune to chase and take two large corsairs, and a small galley, in which were about 400 Christian slaves, on the coast of Calabria, from whence he brought them all safe to Maltha, where he met with the congratulations of the whole order, on his having so gloriously concluded his first expedition, and on the great hopes which this happy beginning gave them of his future services to the order. They had indeed no small reason to commend his singular bravery, of which he gave in the sequel so many signal instances; the misfortune was, that being quickly after apprised of his father's being taken prisoner in a battle against Cosmo de Medicis, and on the point of being tried and condemned as a rebel; he was obliged to quit the island, and pass into Italy; by which the order lost one of the bravest and best commanders of the age.

The grand master sets out for Maltha.

WHILST these things were transacting, tidings were brought to the new grand master of his election; at which the French court was so little pleased, that the king could not forbear asking the commander Trevoux, what could induce the order to make such a choice? to which he could not think of a better answer than saying, that there had been always a strict friendship between him and the late worthy Isle Adam. Upon which that prince readily ordered his safe-conduct to be sent him, together with a permission to take with him what assistance he thought necessary for the service of the order out of his dominions. However, he was obliged to embark for Maltha without the great carack, and usual escorte of Malthese gallies, which were commonly sent to fetch his absent predecessors; which, whether done out of disrespect, as was pretended, because they could not at that juncture be spared without imminent danger to the island, he was glad to dispense with. Certain it is, Soltan Soliman was then equipping a fleet of 300 sail with all expedition, which made the council think it unsafe to venture them out, when they did not know how soon they might be attacked by the Turks.

An embassy
from Tunis.

ABOUT the same time arrived an embassy from the king of Tunis, whom the Turks, since the departure of Charles V. who had, as we have elsewhere seen, restored to him his dominions, had stripped of several towns and fortresses along the coasts, and scarcely left him any other port but that of Tunis. The ambassadors further complained, that Barbarossa had put a strong garrison in Tachora, under command of his best captains, who was expected with a powerful fleet upon some design against Tripoli, or his own capital, neither of which would be able to oppose him, unless a speedy succour was sent to both. To all this he added, that the sea-port town of Susa, which had lately revolted from him, would not fail joining forces with the Turkish admiral. Susa being then a very strong fortress, about eight or nine leagues from Tunis, the council thought proper to dispatch Paul Simeoni, who had now succeeded the brave Strozzi as admiral of the Malthese gallies, and had signalized himself at the taking of Tunis, to join the marquis de Terra Nova, sent thither from Sicily, and assist the Tunesian monarch to cover that important place, whilst they sent to the emperor for some succours to secure these coasts against the Turks.

Susa besieged.

THESE two accordingly laid close siege to the place, the marquis by land, and the Malthese by sea; but the former, being unhappily betrayed by a renegado, who, under pretence of having deserted the Turks out of a sincere remorse, gave him a quite contrary account of the fortifications to what he afterwards found them, spent his forces and ammunition against the strongest part of it, till they were both exhausted. A great number of knights, who mounted the breach against the incessant fire of the place, not without a considerable loss, were strangely surprised, when they had gained the top, to discover new bulwarks and fortifications behind, which would require a still greater force to reduce; they therefore made the best retreat they could. The marquis found his mistake when it was too late, and was forced to raise the siege for want of men and ammunition; and the Malthese, after having lost a great number of their bravest knights and best forces, retired to their own island, not a little dissatisfied with the emperor for committing the management of that siege to such an unexperienced general<sup>b</sup>.

Bad state of Tripoli.

ABOUT the same time arrived the brave Botigella from his government of Tripoli, in which he had been succeeded by two experienced commanders, and represented with no less warmth the injustice which that monarch did to the order in committing the care of that place to them, without giving himself any trouble about repairing the fortifications, or about the maintenance of a sufficient garrison; whilst the Moors, out of enmity to the Christians, joined all their forces to make themselves masters of all places they held along that coast.

- a From all which miscarriages he plainly told the council, that it would be impossible for them to keep Tripoli much longer in their hands against such united force, unless speedy care be taken by the emperor to put the place into a better condition, which had already cost them so much to preserve. The council, before they would apply to that monarch, resolved to have those matters examined by some of their most expert officers and engineers, suspecting perhaps the account which Botigella gave of them to be exaggerated, out of dislike to the grand master; but as soon as they found it verified by such able judges, they instantly dispatched the commander Groleo to the imperial court, with orders, if possible, to persuade that monarch to demolish the city, and blow up its castle, as costing more to keep than it was worth; and, if not, to have the fortifications repaired with all possible speed, and the place supplied with all
- b necessities for a siege. The former of these expedients the emperor would by no means listen to, but promised to send express orders to the governor of Sicily to set about the second with all possible diligence; declaring, at the same time, his resolution to drive all the Turkish corsairs out of Africa; and that he should be much obliged to the order, if they would let their gallies act jointly with the fleet he was equipping for the Mediterranean.

- We have formerly seen that he made a powerful alliance with the pope, the king of France, and some other Christian powers, against Soliman. The gallies of the order, commanded by the knight Simeoni, had been ordered to convey that pontif to Nice, where these two monarchs met and concluded it with him. The grand master, in consequence of it, ordered four of his gallies to join the confederate fleet at Messina, which was wholly to be commanded as before
- c by Andrew Doria, whom the emperor soon after found means to engage intirely in his own service, to the great regret of the French monarch. We shall not repeat here the result of that expedition, of which the reader will find a full account in a former part; neither was there any occasion for the Maltese to signalize themselves in a war in which the two admirals Doria and Barbarossa played so artful a game between them. The emperor had no better success in his Hungarian operations; the care of which he turned over to his brother, in order to pursue the project he had so long formed against the corsairs of Africa, in which he at this time hoped to meet with better success, whilst Barbarossa was absent, consulting measures with Soliman at Constantinople. But tho' the juncture was so favourable to him in that respect, yet the season of the year was too far advanced for any considerable enterprize. Yet that did not
- d discourage the Maltese knights, whom he had earnestly invited to his assistance, from offering themselves in such vast numbers, that the grand master was forced to quell their untimely zeal, and reduce them to 400, who accordingly set sail in four of their gallies to join him at the head of his fleet. The emperor, too much flushed with hopes at the sight of so powerful a force under his command, to listen to the wholesome advice of Doria, the only one who dared to represent to him the danger of those boisterous seas at that time of the year, resolved upon the siege of Algiers, in spite of the entreaties, and even tears, of that old experienced admiral; and Simeoni, who commanded the Maltese gallies, tho' no less sensible of the danger, yet made no demur to follow him thither.

- The ill success of that expedition need not be repeated here, nor the extreme danger that
- e monarch was in both by sea and land, from the last of which it is much questioned whether he could have escaped, had not the Maltese knights repulsed the Turks, who had dared to attack even the imperial quarters, with an incredible fury, and pursued them to the very gates of the city, in hopes of entering the place after those fugitives. They were, however, disappointed, by the governor's ordering them to be shut up, even before the Turks were all got in; at which the standard-bearer of the order, who was one of the foremost in the pursuit, was so exasperated, that he left his dagger closely stuck into the gate, and retired with the rest in good order. His danger was still greater, as we have elsewhere seen, upon his re-imbarkation, by the furious storm which shattered most of the fleet, and the strenuous efforts of the Moors, Turks, and Arabs, made to take or sink as many of their vessels as they could. Here again the Maltese knights
- f proved of special use in repulsing them, as they were better acquainted with those seas, and more frequently employed in these kinds of exercises. On both occasions they behaved with such courage and intrepidity, that the rest of the allies could not sufficiently admire or commend them. The misfortune was, that the loss they suffered both of men and ships, and especially of some of their best commanders, more than equalled the glory they gained. The emperor, before they parted from him, gave them the most ample testimony of his satisfaction and gratitude, as far as words and encomiums could go; and with these the Maltese commander set sail with the small remains of his order in three shattered vessels, and arrived safely at the port of Malta, about the end of November 1548<sup>f</sup>.

- g Whilst the Maltese were employed in that unfortunate expedition, the island was so terribly annoyed with the Turkish and other corsairs, that the port was in some measure blocked up by them, whilst the coasts both here and of Gosa lay exposed to the frequent insults and depredations, and often to the loss of their inhabitants. This obliged the great baily Simeoni, at a his return from Algiers, to cause his shattered gallies to be refitted with all possible speed, in order to clear the chanel of that pernicious vermin; which he did with such surprizing success, that he took several of them, and their Rais, or captains, and brought them home in chains. This quickly spread the terror of his arms all over those seas, so that scarce any of them dared to shew themselves in the chanel. Being obliged by the weather to put in at Tripoli, the governor informed him, that he had just received an express from the king of Tunis, to acquaint him that Barbarossa was making the most pressing complaints to the Porte against the Malttese knights, whilst his lieutenant Morat Haga was making great preparations at Tachora for the siege of Tripoli, which he doubted not would be soon followed by that of Tunis, where Hassan was become odious to the Turks and Moors, on account of his alliance with the emperor, b after whose late defeat a great number of towns in that kingdom had revolted from him, and a much greater number of his subjects had put themselves under the protection of the Algerine monarch, who was expected shortly from Constantinople at the head of a powerful fleet, whose arrival would be quickly followed by the sieges of Tripoli and Tunis.

A new but ineffectual embassy to the emperor.

THE admiral lost no time to bring these unwelcome news to the grand master; for though the emperor had promised him so solemnly that he would order the fortifications of Tripoli to be repaired and enlarged, yet nothing had been done to it since; so that it was impossible for it, in the condition it was in, to hold out any time against such powerful force. The council being assembled upon it, agreed that a fresh embassy should be sent to the imperial court, to renew their instances for a speedy execution of its engagements; but which succeeded no better than the former. That polite monarch gave them many fair promises of a powerful succour, in case the place was besieged; but neither sent them any supply of men or money, which he pretended he had too great an occasion for in Sicily and other parts of his empire. The admiral was sensibly affected with the ill success of the embassy, as well as the rest of the order; but as he was likewise grand baily of Germany, he thought himself obliged to do what he could for the preservation of that place, and caused the crew and slaves of his gallies to dig a pretty large fosse round it, and added some few other repairs and outworks, which, tho' done in haste, could not but be better than none, and saved, in some measure, the credit of the order. On the other hand, that he might not seem too pressing with the emperor, he prevailed upon the king of Tunis to take a second voyage into Italy, and solicit for fresh succours d from him, which, if he obtained for himself, would be likewise of service to Tripoli. Hassan accordingly disposed all things for his departure with a grand retinue, and with considerable presents for the viceroy of Sicily, and the imperial court; and, being safely arrived at Naples, dispatched some couriers after the emperor, who was gone to quell some troubles in Germany, to beg the favour of an interview with him. We have seen elsewhere the issue of that expedition, which cost that unfortunate prince his eyes and his kingdom, through the treachery of his son Hamida <sup>e</sup>.

Tripoli in great danger.

Valetta sent governor thither.

THIS revolution, which so greatly endangered the city of Tripoli, at the same time that it increased the power of the Turks, especially of Barbarossa, with whom that treacherous prince made a speedy alliance, in order to preserve himself on his throne, failed not to put e the order into the utmost consternation. Tripoli, at a great distance from Maltha, surrounded on all sides by enemies, and in so bad a condition of defence, especially as it was commanded all around by high hills, gave its governor such apprehensions of its approaching siege, that he ceased not soliciting the grand master for his discharge till he had obtained it, and another was sent in his stead. This was soon after exchanged for a new one, and the commander John de Valetta, of the tongue of Provence, a man of great experience, conduct, and intrepidity, who had already signalized himself by a long course of naval expeditions, especially against the corsairs, and a great variety of successes, sometimes conqueror, and at other times conquered, and even laden with chains, and condemned to a severe slavery, or cruel imprisonment; but no sooner redeemed and at liberty, than at sea again in search of new adventures. Such was f the character of John de Valetta, whom the grand master pitched upon to go and defend that place. He was perhaps the only one that would accept of that commission under such disadvantageous circumstances, wherein so little, if any, honour could be gained.

His first care, upon his arrival at his new government, was to take a review of all his Moors and Arabs, as well as Christians, and to introduce a strict discipline among them, officers as well as soldiers. Next to that, he applied his time, and the small quantity of money which the grand master had intrusted him with, in repairing the old and adding some new fortifications to the place; and more than these he would have caused to be made, had not the famous Dragut, a mortal enemy to all Christians, and especially to the Malttese, of whom we have had frequent occasion to speak in some foregoing chapters, seized, some time before, upon one of their gallies, which a storm had separated from the squadron, in which was the g a sum of 60,000 crowns, designed for the service of the place. The last precaution the new governor took was to send all useless mouths out of it ; after which he ordered a plan of all the coasts of Barbary to be taken, which, with that of the city, and the account of its present condition, he caused to be sent to the emperor with all possible expedition.

b By this time Dragut, who had obtained from Soliman the government of the Turkish fleet in the room of Barbarossa, lately dead at Constantinople, through his excessive debaucheries, had made himself master of the sea-port of Africa, al. Mehedia, on those coasts, by the vilest of treacheries, designing to make it his place of arms and rendezvous. This roused at once the emperor's attention to that side. He engaged the pope and the grand master to assist him to wrench that place out of his hands, without which no part of Italy, Sicily, or other adjacent islands, could be safe from his bloody incursions. The grand master, no less interested in that expedition, readily furnished his usual squadron of four gallies, under the command of the baily De Sangle, since then grand master of the order, who had under him 140 knights, and a battalion of 400 men in the Maltese pay. Young Doria, the nephew of the admiral of that name, who commanded the emperor's fleet, sailed straightway to Cape Bone, where he landed his forces, and made himself master of the fortress of Calibia, supposed to be the Clypea of the Romans, from which he advanced towards Monasteer, both which had submitted to Dragut. At their approach to the place, the Turks and Moors made a large sally, not so much to engage as to reconnoitre them ; but the Maltese knights, who marched in the front, and were supported by a third part of the Spanish forces, rushed out upon them with such speed and fury, that they killed a great number of them, and followed the rest with sword in hand into the town. This was soon abandoned by the inhabitants, most of whom retired with the governor into the castle. This, refusing to surrender upon the first summons, was immediately cannonaded with such force, that a breach was quickly made, tho' scarcely wide enough for an assault. But our young admiral, above minding such a circumstance, ordered his forces forthwith to mount, which occasioned the attack to be more fierce and bloody, and, which was still worse, the loss of the greatest part of the Maltese, who had the post of honour. The inhabitants would have been glad to have capitulated ; but the governor, an old experienced corsair, rejected the proposal, and held his post on the top of the breach, till a musket-ball put an end to his fighting and life. The rest, quite discouraged by his death, surrendered at discretion, and were made prisoners of war <sup>k</sup>.

AFTER this successful expedition, Doria, having been promised a vast reinforcement from Naples and Sicily, resolved to make his next attempt on Africa, whilst Dragut was out at sea with his squadron ; and, to prevent his throwing any forces into the place whilst the succours were coming from Italy, went and posted his fleet at the Conigliari or Comiliary Islands, almost over-against it, and by that means kept the place in some measure blocked up. About that time he received advice from the viceroy of Naples, importing, that the succours designed for him were not quite ready, and desiring him to come to him at Trepano in Sicily, the place of their rendezvous. This request (which could not be complied with without giving Dragut an opportunity, which he was not likely to neglect, of throwing some fresh succour into Africa), highly disconcerted the young admiral ; but, as he had been charged not to undertake any thing without the advice of Don Juan de Vega, an old experienced general, he was obliged to go and consult him at Palermo, from which he sailed away to Trepano, where the Neapolitan and Maltese fleets were already arrived. Unfortunately the former was commanded by young Don Garcia, the viceroy's son, who, from thence, claimed a privilege of the sole direction of the siege, to the great mortification of young Doria, who expected to have had the sole glory of it. The contest lasted some time, and was likely to have been attended with some ill consequence, when the Maltese admiral De Sangle undertook to interpose, and, by his address and superior sagacity, after several conferences with the two contenders, brought the matter to a compromise, in which it was agreed, that, when they were at sea, Garcia should pay a due regard to the imperial admiral ; and, at land, they should each command their own troops, and the council of war direct the attacks, and other measures relating to the siege, in the name of the emperor, as if he was really there present <sup>l</sup>.

THERE was now nothing more to do, but to sail away for Africa, and to form the siege of it ; but Dragut had taken such care, during Doria's absence, to supply the place with brave and expert officers, fresh troops, and other ammunition, that he should have nothing to do but to scour the sea with his squadron, and intercept all the provisions that were sent to the besiegers. On the other hand, the grand master, sensible of the loss of so many of his knights at the last siege, took care to send a fresh supply of them ; whilst the emperor, on his part, sent express orders to the governor of Goletta, an old experienced commander, to come and assist at the siege. We have given, in a former chapter, a full account of the most material transactions of it; to which we shall only add here, as more nearly relating to the history of a Malta we are upon, that the admiral of it, De Sangle, mindful of the religious as well as moral duties of his order, caused an hospital and infirmary to be erected in his camp, under a sufficient number of tents, in which the sick and wounded of the imperial army were taken all due care of, and were served by the knights under his command by turns; a conduct which made their charity no less conspicuous and admired than their valour, especially as the number of the unhappy objects were so considerable, and their condition for the most part deplorable and desperate without such a timely and extraordinary assistance<sup>n</sup>. But their intrepid bravery displayed itself more eminently upon the signal being given for the general assault, at which, as usual, they claimed the privilege in being foremost in mounting the breach. Finding the water too shallow to bring them close to the shore, they waded through the sea up above their middle, b with their swords drawn, and through the continual volleys of small shot, arrows, and other missile weapons, as well as through streams of melted lead, boiling oil, stink-pots, &c. till they gained the top of it, and planted the standard of the order on the wall, with such surprising speed and undaunted courage, as quite astonished the besieged. The standard-bearer, named Gaon, was instantly killed by a musket-shot; but the standard was as quickly seized by the commander Copier, who, in spite of all the fire and smoke from within, kept it still displayed, without losing an inch of his ground, during the whole time of the attack, though he saw a vast number of knights, and other brave volunteers, that fought under it, fall down dead on each side, by the continual fire of the artillery, without being able to make the Turks give c way. At length the commander Guimerano, who continued still at the head of the rest, looking about on all sides, and perceiving something like a narrow path leading into the place, tho' some say it was the fragments of a gallery which had been demolished by the cannon of the besiegers, opened himself a way, and led the rest through all the rubbish into the heart of the place, where they made such a terrible havock of all that opposed them, that happy were they who could get farthest from them, and gain the adjacent plains with what they could save out of their houses; so that it was intirely owing to the intrepid bravery of the order, that this important place was carried, in spite of all the force, art, and stratagems, of Dragut, to prevent it<sup>o</sup>.

THE plunder of the place was immense; Dragut kept all his treasure in it, as one of the strongest fortresses in all Africa, and a great number of corsairs and merchants, Turks, Moors, d and others, made choice of it as the surest repository of all their wealth; to say nothing of the opulence of the inhabitants, who were mostly become very rich by the vast piratical commerce which was carried on, as well as by the great concourse of piratical crews, who made it their principal mart. The young Don Garcia vainly strove to attribute the whole glory to himself, whilst the rest of the officers more justly gave the palm to the Maltese. Dragut, in particular, shewed his resentment against them in the most public manner, by the complaints and misrepresentations he sent against them to Soliman immediately after taking of the place. His well-instructed agent easily convinced both him and the divan of the danger of suffering them to continue longer in their new settlement, from which they had not only suppressed the naval commerce of his subjects, but had assisted the emperor in making such conquests on the Barbary e shore as must one day endanger his dominions in Egypt and Palestine; for the re-conquering of which last, they need but apply to their sure friend the Roman pontif for a new crusade, to engage all Christendom to assist them with men and money, and whatever else they wanted for such an enterprize. He moreover represented to that soltan how vain and fruitless it would be for him to attempt the retaking of Africa, Monastier, Tripoli, and other places along that coast, so long as that order was continually ready to traverse and obstruct every such attempt by their desperate courses from Malta and Tripoli, in which, tho' few in number, they still multiply to such a degree, that nothing can succeed that is undertaken against the Christians, until those knights are totally exterminated by fire and sword.

SOLIMAN was easily convinced by these arguments, as well as his divan by Dragut's presents, of the necessity of entering into a war against the Maltese; and ordered that corsair, whom he had honoured with the title of general, to give him the greater credit, to gather up all the corsairs he could meet with in the Levant under his standard against the Maltese, whilst he ordered a most powerful fleet to be equipped for the same service. The news of this armament quickly alarmed the whole order, as well as the imperial court; and as Dragut was justly suspected to be the first mover of it, the emperor ordered Doria to sail with his fleet in search of him, and to try all possible means to rid him of so dangerous an enemy. The grand master was earnestly desired to join his gallies of the order to the fleet, which he readily complied with, though against all politics, and the opinion of the council, who loudly declared how imprudent and dangerous it was to send their ships abroad, at a time when the island was g threatened a threatened with a powerful invasion. But the grand master, who, as a Spaniard, was a mere creature of Charles V. stopped their mouths, by pretending, that he was sufficiently informed that the Turkish armament was designed to assist France against the emperor; but, to amuse the most discontented, he gave express orders to the admiral, in case he found that the Turks should take their route towards Malta or Tripoli, to separate immediately, and sail back to Malta with all speed<sup>p</sup>.

He was scarcely sailed away for the rendezvous at Messina, before news was brought by the chevalier De St. John, who had been scouring the coasts of Morea, that the armament was universally reported to be designed either against Tripoli or Malta. Presently after came a letter from the commander Villegagnon, lately arrived from France at Messina, to acquaint b the grand master and the rest of the order, that the armament in question was solely intended against them. This gentleman, who was in the highest esteem both at the court of France and among the Maltese, had no sooner received sufficient information about what he wrote, than he earnestly begged leave to carry the news to Malta; and only stopped in Sicily to acquaint the viceroy with it; and to represent to him the defenceless state of that island, as well as of the town of Tripoli, in order to obtain some speedy succour for both; during which time he dispatched the above information to the order, that they might take all proper precautions against the threatening danger. At his arrival at Malta, being asked by the council from whom he had his information, he readily told them, that the constable Montmorency, out of his singular regard to the order, had assured him of it, when he took his leave of him; and c that Soliman was so exasperated at the part which the Maltese had acted at the taking of Africa, that they must expect to see speedily his whole force turned against them<sup>q</sup>. This greatly alarmed the major part of the council; but D'Omedes, having dismissed him with cold thanks D'Omedes's for his zeal, and the French prime minister for his care, told some of the principal members extreme of it with a scornful smile, as soon as he was gone, Either this Frenchman is the high constable's avarice, &c. dupe, or he wants us to be his; after which, assuming a more serious tone, he said, it was absurd to suppose so great an armament could be designed against such barren rocks as Malta and Gosa, or even Tripoli, which, put together, could never answer the tenth part of the cost. But that they were sure enough designed to assist the French against the emperor, the former of whom was politic and rich enough to compensate all that expence by some new conquest in Italy; d so that, upon the whole, he did not think it proper to put the order to such extraordinary charges, till he received more positive news about it. In consequence of this parsimony, he obtained from the Sicilian viceroy about 200 Calabrians for the defence of Tripoli, most of them raw and undisciplined, but which the grand master palliated with saying, that they would soon be made fit for business when they were once come to that garrison. The difficulty was to make them embark, the greatest part of them having concealed themselves, and the rest complaining that he sent them thither only to spare his own knights; whereupon he was obliged to put about 25 of them at their head, who were of the younger sort, and, having been confined some time for misbehaviour, could easily be spared<sup>r</sup>.

THIS was all they had been able to persuade him to do for the preservation of Tripoli, and The Turkish e the islands of Malta and Gosa, when news was brought that the Turkish fleet had appeared fleet appears. 1551. along the coasts of Sicily on the 13th of July, and was supposed to be in full sail for Malta, without raising the least apprehension in him, till he beheld it from his own window making towards it with a favourable wind. Sinan, the head commander of this armament, was ordered by the sultan to attempt the islands of Malta and Gosa, if he found it practicable; if not, to sail directly to Tripoli, and lay siege to that place. He was moreover enjoined to consult Dragut in every thing, who was best acquainted with the sea-coasts, and all their fortresses. According to which order, the Ottoman fleet came directly before the bay called Muset, which is divided from the great bay only by a long and narrow slip of land, or rather solid rock, named Scerberas. It is easy to imagine the dread and consternation which the sight of such a f powerful fleet caused, both among the order, and much more among the poor inhabitants. The knights, however, having soon recovered their usual presence of mind, agreed to divide themselves into two different bands according to their present exigence; and whilst one body was employed in securing the women and children in the borough and the town of Malta, or notable city, and others in arming the men, and placing them in different posts, others were taken up in running along the coasts, to descry the extent of the enemy's fleet.

AMONG these the Spanish commander Guimerano, with 100 other knights on foot, and 300 musqueteers, gained the top of the rock Scerberas above-mentioned, where they lay concealed with their bellies close to the ground, whilst Upton, an English commander, and one of the bravest, at the head of 30 more of the order, and 400 of the inhabitants, stood boldly on the

The capitana was no sooner got within gun-shot of the Scerberas, than he was saluted with such a brisk discharge, as threw the whole crew into the utmost confusion, and made them abandon their oars; which so exasperated the proud Turk, that he swore he would destroy them all, for daring, such a handful of men as they were, to make their first fire on his ship. He accordingly disposed all things for landing; but Guimerano, contented with the affront he had given him, got all his men on board their vessels, and quickly gained the borough without the loss of one man. Sinan fought for them a while, wondering how they had escaped him; at length, getting up to the top of Scerberas, whence he could descry the castle of St. Angelo, and observing its situation and bulwarks, he cast an angry look at Dragut, Is that, said he to him, the castle which thou didst represent to the soltan as a place so easy to be reduced? Surely no eagle could have chosen a more craggy and difficult place to make her nest in. Dost thou not see that men must have wings like them to get up to it, and that all the artillery and forces of the universe would not be able to take it by force? To all this an old Tachoran officer added, whether to curry favour with the general, or out of hatred to Dragut, “Seest thou that bulwark which juts out into the sea, and on which the Maltese have planted the great standard of their order? I can assure thee, that, whilst I was a prisoner with them, I have helped to carry part of the huge stones of which it is built on my shoulders; and am pretty sure, that, before thou canst make thyself master of it, thou wilt be overtaken by the winter-season, and probably likewise prevented, by some powerful succour from Europe, from going any farther.” These words threw the old corsair, who never thought any place too dangerous or difficult, into a violent passion. He endeavoured in vain to convince Sinan how easy it would be, after demolishing the castle with his artillery, to spread as it were his net over the borough, and take the grand master and his knights prisoners, seeing the place where they had imprudently shut themselves in had no other defence than that of the old castle. Sinan, more diffident and cautious, called a general council, in which he represented the siege of the borough and castle as a long-winded work, which would prevent his passing over into Africa, where he would much better answer the intentions and orders of Soliman; for here, said he, when we have destroyed all these fortifications, our work is hardly half done, we have still a vast number of desperate knights to encounter, who must be all destroyed to a man before we can enter either of them.

Dragut's advice to besiege the capital. His opinion was at first approved of by the majority of the council; but Dragut, whom the loss of Africa, his treasure, and numberless slaves, still fired with an insatiable desire of revenge, proposed, that before they left the place, they should at least lay siege to the capital of the island, where all the inhabitants had shut themselves up with all their wealth, and which they would find without any fortifications, or any other garrison than a parcel of armed peasants, ready to abandon it upon the very first appearance of the Turkish standards; after which they might safely plunder both that and the rest of the island, and carry away a vast number of prisoners. Sinan, not daring to oppose too far Dragut's advice, which the soltan had enjoined him to follow, consented to the siege: immediately after which, the forces were ordered to land, and the artillery to move towards the place. This last they found a most difficult task; the carriages falling in pieces as they went over these hard rocks, obliged them to stay whilst new and stronger were made, which met with the same mischance as they moved farther on; so that they were forced at last to have them drawn by slaves, which took up some days before they could raise their batteries against the town. Whilst these preparations were making, the Turks, who had dispersed themselves over the whole island, put all in their way to fire and sword, and covered with fire and smoke not only the houses, but also the trees, hedges, and fields, from one end to the other. After having destroyed all the corn, fruits, and every kind of sustenance, they repaired to the siege of the place. Malta had then above 13,000 persons of both sexes in it, and but few soldiers to defend it, except the peasants whom the governor had armed for that purpose, but who now murmured against him, and were ready to abandon the place; so that it was with the greatest difficulty that they consented to stay, and submitted to be distributed into companies, and taught how to handle their weapons.

The governor sends for succours to D'Omedes. In the mean time the brave baily Adorno, who commanded in the place, found means to dispatch an express, in the dead of the night, to acquaint the grand master with the dangerous condition it was in, and to desire him to send some regular troops to him, and as many knights as he could spare, more especially the commander Villegagnon, an old experienced officer, to assist and direct him. But how great was his surprize, when the messenger came back without being able to obtain any supply from him, except the brave commander above-a named, whom D'Omedes permitted to go thither, for no other motive than to be rid of a person who had the interest and honour of the order too sincerely at heart to forbear making frequent and pressing complaints to the council against his strange proceedings. Before he dismissed him, however, he told him, that, having the highest idea of his conduct and bravery, he was now sending him to the defence of their capital, which he looked upon as sufficiently guarded by the number of citizens and peasants that were in it, who he knew were capable of being made good soldiers, provided they were commanded by an experienced officer, who might supply the governor's absence where-ever his duty would not admit of his being present.

HERE Villegagnon, with his usual modesty, replied, that he was willing to obey, pursuant to the strict obligations to which the profession of his order bound him; but begged of him to b consider, that the defence of the city did not depend upon a multitude of undisciplined citizens and peasants, whom the first appearance of danger would put to flight, but upon such brave and intrepid leaders, who, from a principle of honour and religion, may inspire and encourage, and, by their example, inspire them to that bravery with which they are naturally strangers; so that, if he really designed to have the town preserved against so powerful an enemy, he could send no less than an hundred knights to assist them in defending it. To this he was coldly answered, that it had been decreed by the council, that the knights should be reserved for the defence of the castle; but that, rather than see him go alone, he would obtain leave to send six more to accompany him; but, upon his offering to represent the small service which that number would be of in such an emergency, D'Omedes told him, in a higher tone, c that he expected in those of the order less reasoning and greater compliance; and that if he was afraid of the danger of obeying, he would soon find a number of others that would be proud of exposing themselves to it. "Sir," replied the commander, "I will quickly convince you, that fear never made me shun any danger;" so saying, he immediately took the road to the capital with the six other knights; and, upon their giving the signal, they were drawn up with cords into the place, without being perceived by the enemy. Their arrival was welcomed with the universal shouts of the people, and a discharge of all their musquetry; which gave the besiegers room to conclude, that some considerable reinforcement had been conveyed into the place in the dead of the night. Villegagnon made the inhabitants believe, that they were the forerunners of a much more considerable body of forces which were in full d march to their relief; but privately acquainted the governor with the grand master's inflexible behaviour, that they had nothing to depend upon but their own bravery, and must resolve to make such a defence as might procure them the greatest glory, and the enemy the greatest loss. Accordingly, the walls of the city being found too weak to stand long against the besiegers artillery, they agreed to make as many intrenchments within-side as might oblige them to fight inch by inch, and in this men, women, and all hands, fell to work, under the direction of Villegagnon.

WHILST this was done within the walls, a lucky stratagem was contrived without by the receiver general of the order, which had all the success that could be wished: it was a letter e written by himself, and directed to the grand master, from Messina, informing him of a powerful armament ready to sail with the first fair wind, out of that port, for Malta, under the command of the famed admiral Doria, the terror of the Ottoman forces, who had been dispatched from Spain to raise the siege of Malta, or give the enemy battle. The letter farther added, that he had detached that bark to bring timely advice to the order, that they might be ready to act in concert with him at his arrival. The project succeeded to admiration; the vessel was seized by some of the Turkish ships, and the letter conveyed to the camp. This fiction, which was chiefly designed to intimidate and create an uneasiness in the Turkish army, wrought much more powerfully on the mind of the admiral than was expected. He caused it to be read before a council of war; and, as he had undertaken the siege merely in compliance with Dragut's advice, he now expatiated much on the danger of pursuing it, without hazardf ing either his fleet or army, and, if it was not speedily raised, all the artillery he had with so much labour brought before the place. To all which he added, that September would soon be at hand with its usual storms, which would not fail to prevent their making their intended and more important descent on Tripoli; all which was received and applauded by the greatest part of the officers, and the raising of the siege readily agreed to. A lucky stratagem.

HOWEVER, to satisfy the insatiable greediness of the Turks after plunder, and thereby prevent any complaint being sent to the Porte against him, he abandoned the island of Gosa to their mercy, which, being in a much worse condition of defence, met with a severer fate. They immediately crossed the narrow chanel which divides it from Malta, ravaging it all the way. The inhabitants were retired into the castle with their families; and told the governor, that,
 g if he would stand by them, they would defend it to the last; but he no sooner saw the enemy present themselves before it, than he retired into the inmost of his apartments, and kept himself shut up for some time. This was the young knight, on whose bravery the grand master pretended Gosa's castle besieged.

pretended to put so much confidence, that he rejected the proposal of blowing up the castle with great indignation: his name was Galatian de Sessa, a young swaggering beaush blade, without courage or thought; and his shameful conduct on this occasion did not a little discourage the small garrison, as well as inhabitants. They were however kept in heart for a while by a brave Englishman, who, pointing a piece of cannon (the only one in the place, and which had been with much difficulty brought thither since the siege of Malta) against the enemy, killed several Turks, and kept the rest from approaching the walls; but, he being soon after killed by a shot from the enemy's battery, none of the rest had the courage to take his place.

GALATIAN, afraid of exasperating the Turkish general, continued inactive all the while, but sent a monk to him, with offers to surrender the place, on condition that the lives, liberties, and effects, of the inhabitants, were granted to them. Sinan sent him for an answer, that, if he did not immediately abandon the place to him, he would cause him to be hanged at the gates of it. The monk returned quickly to him, with a new promise of delivering it up, provided the governor, with 200 of the chief inhabitants, such as he pitched upon, were allowed to go off unmolested; but Sinan refused to grant him above 40; and told the monk, that, if he dared come a third time, he would cause him to be flayed alive. This answer so terrified the cowardly governor, that he ordered the gates to be forthwith opened, and the Turks made no less speed to take possession of the castle. His apartment was the first that fell a prey to them, who, to shew their contempt of him in the most mortifying manner, obliged him to carry some of the lumber of it on his shoulders, quite into their ships. Sinan, instead of giving him leave to chuse the number of inhabitants agreed on, pitched upon 40 of the oldest, whom he immediately discharged, telling the governor, with a contemptuous smile, that the most aged ought to be accounted the chiefest. All the the rest, to the amount of 6,300, of every age and sex, were ordered to be loaded with irons, and himself at their head, and to be conveyed on ship-board, and carried into a miserable slavery" (F).

THIS dreadful catastrophe of the Gosans produced the loudest murmurs and complaints against the grand master, especially among those of the French tongue, who insisted, that his cowardly governor should be forthwith tried, and sentence passed upon him; but this D'Omedes evaded, with his usual coldness, under pretence that the accused was not now in his hands, but in those of the Turks; and that he could not lawfully condemn him, till he had heard his defence; so that, to prevent the dishonour of so shameful an action affecting the whole order, they all, except the grand master's creatures, unanimously agreed to send an account of it through all Europe; but he took what care he could to be beforehand with them, dispersing a very different one in his favour, in which it was pretended, that he fought with incredible fury at the head of the Gosans, till he was shot by a cannon-ball; upon which these, being quite disheartened at the loss of their brave commander, and desirous to save the honour of their wives and daughters from the known brutality of the Turks, agreed to an honourable capitulation; but which the treacherous Sinan made no scruple to violate, as soon as the place was delivered up into his hands*.

THESE opposite reports met with different credit in Europe, according as people were biased either for one or the other nation; but the animosity which reigned at this time in Malta between the French and Spaniards, will hardly give us room to doubt that they had been greatly exaggerated on both sides. We shall meet with other instances of it during the grand mastership of this Spaniard, which will hardly fail of convincing our readers of the more than probability of our conjecture. However, that part of it which related to the young governor's being killed, passed current for some years, that is, till he had, by dint of money, gained his liberty, and had the imprudence to appear again at Malta, where he was immediately seized, and put in arrest. His trial came on soon after, where, whether by the intrigues of his friends, or remissness of his prosecutors, he was acquitted of the crime of cowardice, and restored to his dignity, and had several considerable commanderies bestowed upon him.

(F) We are told, that a wealthy Sicilian, who had been settled some time with his family in this island, seeing it reduced to so dreadful a state, and preferring death to so dishonourable a slavery, in a fit of jealousy and despair, first stabbed his wife and two daughters to death, then, rushing armed among the thickest of the enemy, killed and wounded some of them, expiring soon after of the wounds which he received from them (8).

- a SINAN had no sooner left the island of Gosa, in the miserable condition we have related, than the council agreed to send a new governor thither, with some few troops, to repair the breaches of the castle, together with some other commanders, to ascertain the lands of those who were either killed or carried away captives, either to them or their relations, in order to have it the sooner colonied and manured. All this while the grand master could not be persuaded that the Turkish armament was intended for any other design than to assist France against the emperor; and his surprise, as well as mortification, was inexpressible, when the news came, that, instead of Toulon or Marseilles, Sinan had sailed directly to Tripoli, with Sinan sails for Tripoli. full design to lay siege to it both by sea and land. About the same time arrived at Malta the French ambassador d'Aramont, in his way to Constantinople, whither he was now sent the
- b second time by the court. In his audience with d'Omedes, whom he was ordered to assure of his master's inviolable friendship for him and the whole order, he expressed a more than ordinary concern that he had not come a little sooner, and prevented, by his mediation and good offices, the hostilities which Sinan had committed in these two islands. To this d'Omedes answered, that he was arrived time enough, if the commission with which he was charged by his court could but permit him to take Tripoli in his way, and make use of his and his master's interest to dissuade the Turkish basha from besieging Tripoli: "and this, added he, "is what I conjure you, for God's sake, and the honour of your royal master, to do; and, "if you cannot prevail with him, that you will use your utmost efforts to prevail on soltan "Soliman to countermand it."
- c D'ARAMONT faithfully promised him all the good offices that were in his power; and, leaving two large vessels in the port, embarked in a brigantine belonging to the order, and sailed away for Tripoli with such expedition, that he arrived before Sinan had opened the trenches before the place. As he had formerly contracted an acquaintance with the Turkish Basha during his residence at the Porte, he met with a most obliging reception from him, especially as he had taken care to have his visit preceded with some considerable presents; after which, he communicated to him the occasion of his coming; and used all the pressing arguments he was master of to prevail upon him to desist from his enterprize against an order so highly and justly respected by the king his master, and by the powers of Europe. The answer which Sinan gave him was, that he had received express orders from Soliman his master
- d to wrest that place out of their hands, and that he could not act contrary to them without Detains the French ambassador. endangering his head; upon which the ambassador offered to take his leave of him, with a design to try what he could do with his master. But Sinan, who quickly perceived his drift, which, if he succeeded in it, would deprive him of the glory of reducing the place, plainly told him, that he could not suffer him to go till the conclusion of the siege; and accordingly caused the Maltese brigantine, and his own two galleys, which had joined him by that time, to be secured, and, without any regard to the law of nations, detained him and all his retinue, though in other respects he caused him to be used with all the honour due to his character, and immediately ordered the trenches to be opened<sup>2</sup>.
- e WE shall repeat here the particulars of that famous and obstinate siege, whereof we have given a full account in a former chapter, as far as relates to the surrender of the place to the Turks, and the dreadful disgrace it brought upon the governor, the brave commander Gaspar de Valier, of the tongue of Auvergne, then grand marshal of the order; and a person of such known experience and valour, that he was marked out by the major part of the order as a fit person to succeed old d'Omedes in the grand mastership. Whether this very consideration, it being common for persons in such high rank to look upon their presumptive successors with an envious eye, or any other pique, whether national or personal, was the cause of the extreme ill-will which d'Omedes bore to him, is not easy to know with any tolerable certainty, from the various accounts we meet with in the writers upon this siege, every one being apt to lean
- f to the side of his own nation; though they seem all to agree in one main point, that the misunderstanding that reigned between those two great men, the one a stiff old Spaniard, and the other a highly distinguished Frenchman, was the chief cause of the former's so obstinately refusing to take the proper precautions to have that important place put in a due state of defence, and consequently of all the disorders, murmurs, and cabals, that happened during the siege of it, and hastened its being surrendered, in the manner we have formerly described.
- g WE come now, according to our promise, to relate what happened at Malta upon the return of the governor and garrison to that island. It is not to be doubted that the just complaints, which even the most impartial and bravest officers of it made against the grand master, and his unaccountable behaviour towards them during the whole time of the siege, had as highly exasperated him, as the consciousness of his own neglect and misconduct had affrighted him. The dread he had cause to be in of the emperor's resentment made him industrious to hear every report that was made both for and against him, in order to take his measures accordingly. Among other things that were reported by some of his servile creatures, one <sup>a</sup> was, that the French ambassador would not have shewn such diligence to sail to Malta, if he had not had some private design or instructions to confer with the Turkish Basha about some other affair, very different from that he pretended; and that his real errand there was, to hasten, instead of preventing, the siege, that the Turkish fleet might have time enough, after its surrender, to go and assist the king of France against the emperor; and consequently that the governor was inexcusable for having ventured to capitulate without the grand master's leave. Whether or no these reports were not hatched by him or his emissaries, we will not pretend to say; however that be, he relished them so well, that he built his plan upon them of ruining him, and of having him publicly tried for it, as soon as d'Aramont was sailed away, who might otherwise have proved too powerful an evidence in his favour. In the mean <sup>b</sup> time, to let the order see that he suspected those flying reports to have some foundation, the ambassador making towards the port with his two gallies some time after sun-set, instead of giving him admittance, he refused to have the chain taken down, caused the guard of the castle to be doubled, and took the same precautions as if the Turkish fleet had come back to make a second attempt upon the island; and on the next day he caused the report to be spread abroad by his private agents, that Tripoli had not fallen so easily into the hands of the Turks, if there had not been a private intelligence between the basha and the ambassador, and if the governor had not been weak enough to follow the perfidious council of that Frenchman. He went still farther, and caused the same report to be spread through all parts of Europe by the knights of his cabal; who, in the letters to their acquaintance, added, that the castle of Saint Angelo would have undergone the same fate with Tripoli, had it not been for the wise precautions which the grand master had taken to prevent it. <sup>c</sup>

Spreads accusations against him.

The ambassador's speech to the council.

D'ARAMONT was soon apprised of these flying rumours, who immediately demanded an audience; which being granted to him in full council, instead of taking notice of, or going about to confute them, he addressed himself to d'Omedes, at whose right hand he sat, and reminded him that he did not sail into Africa till earnestly intreated to it by him; and assured him, that, after his arrival, he had not ceased his good offices, and was fully resolved upon going to try the effects of them at the Porte, when he found them ineffectual at the camp; after which he acquainted the council how he had been detained by the basha till the conclusion of the siege; in which, he added, he had been so happy, however, as to become security for <sup>d</sup> so many brave knights, whom he had brought away in his gallies, in consideration of an equal number of Turkish slaves, which he had engaged to carry back in exchange, and which he hoped should now be delivered into his hands, in order to discharge himself of that engagement, to which he pledged his word and honour to the basha. To this d'Omedes coldly answered in few words, that he was obliged to him for his care and kind offices; but, as to the slaves he spoke of, they were the property of those knights that had taken them, and that he had no power to dispose of them; that he must apply to them, and, if they refused to surrender them, the governor Valier must be answerable for them to the basha. D'Aramont might have justly told him, that he had still a more expeditious way of doing it, by delivering up the Spanish knights into his hands, who were the chief cause of the capitulation and sur- <sup>e</sup> render of the place; but, being above such low recriminations, he chose rather to leave the island, and sail away for Constantinople, which he did a few days after.

D'OMEDES, now at full liberty to pursue his design against Valier, called a new council, in which he declared how inconsistent it would be with his and the order's honour to forego the loss of so important a place, without obliging the governor, and such of the knights as had the greatest hand in that capitulation, to give an account of the motives that induced them to it, in order, as he artfully worded it, to clear the innocent and punish the guilty, if any should be unhappily found to be such<sup>a</sup>. The motion being readily agreed to, three knights of three different tongues were immediately appointed to draw up the indictment against them, all of them being in the grand master's interest. But as the crime, if proved, was of a capital nature, and <sup>f</sup> consequently out of their cognisance as a religious order, they appointed, at the same time, a secular assessor, who should be authorized to pronounce sentence against the guilty, according to the nature of their crime. The governor was accordingly clapt into a dark and dismal dungeon, and an express prohibition was published against any of the order's interceding in his favour. To this was added, an order to the commissaries to reject every objection which the accused should offer against any of the witnesses; and to hear every deponent that offered himself, without the usual formality of confronting, cross-examining, &c.<sup>c</sup>. This was looked upon as a strange way of proceeding; but the grand master's party was by that time grown too powerful to be withstood, and the judges so much his creatures, that they admitted men of the most scandalous characters, renegadoes, fellows forsworn on record, deserters, and <sup>g</sup> others of the like stamp, to be the chief evidence against the accused, that is, against the Unjust prosecution against him.

a governor and three other knights, named Soufa, Herrera, and Fuster, who had the greatest hand in negotiating the capitulation.

THIS did not, however, prevent the French tongue from making loud complaints against these proceedings; amongst them, Villegagnon, whom we have already mentioned on some other occasions, made no scruple to say, that the place having been lost through the negligence and avarice of those whose duty and business it was to have fortified it both with proper outworks and a sufficient garrison, it was highly strange and unjust to call the governor to an account for other people's crimes: he had moreover above 60 unexceptionable witnesses ready to produce against those who had deposed against him; when the grand master bethought himself of a new stratagem to destroy their credit abroad, by causing letters to be sent, as before, giving an account, that the French knights, apprehensive that his conviction would cast an infamy upon their tongue, had taken arms, and actually kept the grand master prisoner in the castle of St. Angelo. Whilst this news flew abroad, he was privately hastening the trial of the four knights, which concluded, at length, in this sentence, which was pronounced in full council, by the grand provost, to this effect:

“ THAT, in the loss of Tripoli, there had happened nothing that could be deemed treasonable: that the whole disaster was owing to the cowardice of the mutinous Calabrians; and that though there were no imperial laws or constitutions that ordained any punishment in such a case, either against a governor or his officers, nevertheless, as it was enacted by the statutes of the order, that any governor, who should abandon a place that had been committed to his care, should be expelled; they, pursuant to that statute, had condemned the said governor, and the three knights, Soufa, Herrera, and Fuster, to be deprived of the habit and cross of the order, as accomplices in the loss of the city of Tripoli.”

THIS sentence was so far from satisfying the grand master, that it disconcerted all his measures, it being his chief design to have the governor alone punished, and not the other three, two of whom were Spaniards, whom he had caused to be joined with him in the accusation, merely to avoid the suspicion of national partiality against the French. He therefore declared the sentence to be too precipitate; and that, in condemning them all alike, they had not duly weighed the difference there was between the guilt of the three knights and that of the governor; and that, though they ought to stand to the sentence adjudged against the latter, yet that against the former might be justly suspended, in order to their being each separately tried, according to the nature of their respective crimes. The judge, or provost, finding that he had disobliged the grand master, was shameless enough to own his pretended error, and to offer to retract it, by substituting a milder punishment for them; but the council crying out shame on him, and some of them protesting that they should fare all alike, d'Omedes desired to be heard, and then insisted upon the great guilt incurred by Valier and Fuster, and also upon that of the two Spanish knights, alleging, that the former being of a capital nature, the council ought to refer it to the secular judge, who had already given such proof of his impartiality; but the council crying out against him, he thought proper to put off the matter to another time, and so dismissed the assembly<sup>2</sup>.

IN the mean time the king of France, having been informed of the calumny that had been raised against his ambassador, sent a gentleman, named Belloy, who was of his privy chamber, to Malta, with a letter to the grand master, in which he desired him to send him a faithful account of the case, that he might punish d'Aramont if he was guilty; but, if innocent, that he would justify him to the world by an authentic testimony under his own hand. D'Omedes was not a little embarrassed at this letter; however, he took the surest measure, and shewed it to the council, who unanimously agreed, that he ought to thank the French monarch for the good offices of his ambassador; and to assure him, that they were so far from having the least cause of complaint against him, that they should always gratefully acknowledge the services he had done to the order; and ordered their secretary to write a letter according to that tenor, and to bring it forthwith to be signed by the grand master. D'Omedes, vexed at the heart that he had shewn them the letter, took the secretary aside, and told him, that the matter was of too nice a nature to be dispatched in such haste, and that he would take time to consider on the properest manner of wording it; bidding him, in the mean time, keep himself out of the way of Belloy and Villegagnon. Some weeks were already passed before the secretary put pen to paper; during which time d'Omedes had, partly by threats, and partly by promises, induced the secular judge lately mentioned to engage, under the forfeiture of 500 gold ducats, to resume the trial of the governor; and, upon his denying the accusation, to have him put to the torture, in order to extort a confession from him against himself; which confession was to be sent to the French king, instead of the answer which the council had ordered to be drawn.

The French king complains of d'Omedes.

New artifices of the grand master.

Discovered by VILLEGAGNON having, by some means, got information of this hellish plot, boldly chal-
Villegagnon. lenged the grand master, in full council, either to deliver the answer in question to the envoy, or, if the assembly had changed their minds in that respect, to give him, instead of it, an authentic copy of the judge's process against the accused knights, in which he expressly declares, that the loss of Tripoli was not owing to any treasonable practice or intelligence with the enemy, but to the cowardice of the Calabrians, which would equally satisfy the king his master. To this one of the members, a creature of d'Omedes, replied, that the king's enquiry being only about his ambassador's conduct in Africa, they ought to confine their answer to that. Soon after this, d'Omedes asked Villegagnon, in a haughty tone, where he had learnt that the order was to give an account to the secular powers of the processes they carried on against any of their members? To which he gave the following answer: "That such a thought
 " had never come into his head; but that he imagined, nevertheless, that as such an account
 " would equally serve to satisfy the French king, it might be properly enough communicated
 " to him, since he, d'Omedes, had so long declined sending him the answer which the council " had agreed on. However," added he, "seeing you seem so desirous to know my mo" tives for pressing this affair as I have done, I will freely acquaint you with them. There " goes a rumour, not much to your honour, that you have engaged the judge to renew the " prosecution against the governor, and to torture him into a confession of such crimes as he " never was guilty of; after which, having condemned and put him to death, this extorted
 " confession is to be sent to the French court, instead of the answer which you was to send " back by its envoy."

ONE may easily imagine the confusion and astonishment the grand master was in; he asked him, in an angry tone, where he had heard those scandalous reports? To which the French knight calmly answered, that was out of the question at present; which is only, whether the reports were true or false? False as hell, replied he. Then all I beg, said Villegagnon, is, that you will publicly discharge your judge of the sum of 500 ducats, which he hath engaged to pay you, in case he did not condemn the governor to death. He would stay no longer in the council, but withdrew, and left the assembly in the deepest amazement, who immediately nominated another judge, and ordered the secretary to postpone all other matters, and write an answer to the French king, according to the tenor prescribed to him, and, under the severest penalties, to deliver it, signed by the grand master, on that very day, either to the French envoy or to Monf. Villegagnon. He did so; but when he shewed it to d'Omedes to sign it, he was ordered by him to alter that clause, which was designed to justify the French ambassador, and, instead of it, to write, that the council had not as yet been able to make any discovery upon which they might form an accusation against him. The letter being delivered to Villegagnon, he easily saw through the artifice, and complained of it to the council, who forthwith dictated a new one, and, having obliged d'Omedes to sign it before them, ordered it to be delivered into the hands of the French envoy Belloy. Thuanus, who had no hopes of it, tells us, that the French court caused it soon after to be published through most courts of Europe; but as it contains nothing but grateful thanks to his most Christian majesty for his singular regard to the order, and a full vindication of his ambassador d'Aramont's conduct, we shall refer our readers for the contents of it to the author last quoted, and to the memoirs which Villegagnon published not long after concerning that whole transaction, wherein we shall not enter any farther into the merits of the cause between the French and Spaniards, but conclude this subject with observing, that, notwithstanding the many foul artifices laid to the grand master's charge, he still maintained his credit, so far as to get the other three knights pardoned and discharged, and the governor Valier to be continued in a cruel confinement, from which he was not freed till several years after, as we shall see in the sequel.

Strozzi denied entrance into Malta.

THE war still continuing between France and the emperor, Villegagnon, who had obtained leave to accompany Belloy into France, was taken with him, in their passage to Marseilles, by the imperial squadron, and thence conveyed to Genoa, where he wrote the memoirs above-mentioned in Latin, and sent them to the emperor; soon after which he caused them to be printed at Lyons, with a dedication to that monarch. Some other knights in the French service had been likewise taken by the imperialists, whose liberty the grand master obtained of the emperor, upon his representation of the danger Malta was in of a speedy visit from the Turks. Among these knights was the famous Pied de Fer, or Iron Foot, who brought with him a large company of Spaniards into the island.

MUCH about the same time the brave Strozzi, grand prior of Capua, of whom we have had occasion to speak, having been obliged to quit the French service, and to save himself in his galley, accompanied with that of his brother, by getting over the chain that locked the port, by dint of rowing, sailed directly for Malta, where he was not only forbid to land by

- a the grand master, but even threatened to be fired upon, if he did not sail away. This harsh treatment was highly resented by the majority of the order, especially at such a time, when the island wanted such brave commanders. One of the knights, however, found means to send him, unknown to d'Omedes, a fresh supply of biscuit, of which he was in great want; after which he sailed towards the Levant, in danger of being taken either by Doria's squadron, or by the Turkish corsairs, and destitute of a christian port where he might retire, or bring any prize into. However, his valour and conduct were so well known in Europe by this time, that the emperor spared no promises or stratagems to draw him into his service. Among other favours, he sent him a safe-conduct, by which he was permitted to come into any sea-port belonging to his dominions; but Strozzi, still unwilling to engage against France,
- b delayed his answer, under pretence that he could not come to any resolution till he had consulted the grand master <sup>k</sup>.

STROZZI, by this time, had been so successful in his cruising, that he sent to the image of <sup>Sends a noble</sup> our lady of Philermo at Malta, a magnificent present of a church-ornament, on which he <sup>present to the</sup> caused these words to be embroidered, He came to his own, and his own received him not, <sup>church of Phi-</sup> John i. 11. The officer, who carried it thither, was ordered at the same time to acquaint <sup>lermo-</sup> his friends there with his good fortune, and to inform himself how the rest stood affected towards him. As soon as the grand master was apprised of his design, he declared once more, that, if he offered to return, he should be sure to meet with the same reception he had found before; his main view in it being to oblige him the more readily to engage in the emperor's service, which he knew would be laying a great obligation on that monarch, by whose

c directions he regulated all his measures. Some of his friends, however, took care to inform <sup>Invited by his</sup> him, that, if he thought fit to come, he would find a party strong enough in the council <sup>friends, lands</sup> against the grand master: upon which he immediately sailed for the haven, and, landing <sup>at Malta.</sup> from his long-boat, marched directly to the palace, attended by a great number of the most considerable knights of the order. D'Omedes was not a little surprised at his unexpected appearance, and much more at his being accosted by him in words to this effect: "Sir, being

d "informed by very good hands, that the Turks threaten our island with a second invasion, "and are making vast preparations for it, I am now come, according to my duty, to offer "my services, and to join with the rest of my brethren." For, besides that it disconcerted all his views of obliging the emperor, he had great reason to fear lest the residence of a man of his credit and character among them, should contribute still more to the misunderstanding which his avarice and arbitrary proceedings had occasioned between the council and him. However, having recovered himself a little, he not only gave him an obliging reception, but begged of him, that, as soon as he had rested himself a while from his fatigue, he would take a turn round the island, and make his observations of every thing that was wanting to put it in a state of defence.

He quickly acquitted himself of his commission, and laid before the council a plan, which, <sup>Raises several</sup> if it could have been executed, would have rendered it almost impregnable; but as the <sup>forts in it,</sup> treasury of the order was found by far too much exhausted to supply so vast an expence, they

e contented themselves with adding some new fortifications in several parts, particularly a new castle on the extremity of the mount Scerberas, some bastions and out-works to the borough on that side which was opposite to the castle, where it lay most exposed, and a new fort on mount St. Julian, together with some other necessary outworks. Workmen and materials were sent for from Sicily with all expedition; and Strozzi, who presided over the building of the new castle, since called Fort St. Elmo, in memory of that of Rhodes, used such diligence in it, that it was finished in less than six months. That on mount St. Julian, since called Fort St. Michael, was completed in much the same time by the commander Lustic, since then grand master of the order; and the outworks of the borough by the grand bailiff of Germany. Such life did that noble knight give to every man, and every thing, which, in all probability, f would have been stagnated or overlooked without him, through the avarice and indolence of the grand master, that every one helped the work forward, not only with their assistance, but with their private purses, the knights selling even their plate and rich furniture, and those who had nothing else, parted even with their gold chains, the only ornament they have to distinguish themselves in time of war, to contribute what they could to the public safety. This warm zeal communicated itself even among the inhabitants of the island, who readily joined in these efforts with the majority of the order; so that Malta wanted now nothing more for its safety than to see Strozzi grand master of it <sup>1</sup>

ONE may easily imagine how mortifying these things were to D'Omedes, who left no means <sup>D'Omedes</sup> untried to persuade this new rival to engage himself in the emperor's service; but finding him <sup>grows jealous</sup> of him.

more and more averse and determined against it, he thought it high time to contrive some stratagem to remove him out of the island, with his own consent. He accordingly communicated to him a project, which he had long ago premeditated, of seizing the fortress of Zoara, on the coast of Barbary, and in the province of Tripoli; the commodiousness of which port drew such a concourse of merchant-men, that it was become exceedingly rich; and, being but poorly fortified, he told him, might be easily surpris'd, by the help of a forest of palm-trees, which extended themselves almost to the very walls. Strozzi readily came into the project, and offered himself to conduct the whole enterprize. A small squadron of gallies, and other vessels, was forthwith equipped, and about 1200 soldiers put on board; amongst whom were near 300 of the bravest knights of the order, all emulous to signalize themselves under such an expert commander.

THE fleet set sail on the 6th of August; but, through the mistake of the pilot, landed much higher than they designed, and were thereby obliged to march several leagues through sandy grounds and groves of palm-trees, during the dead of the night. They were divided into three bodies, each commanded by some of the most experienced officers of the order. In their way they observed some fires at a distance, which they supposed to be some hords of wandering Arabs, who were now taking their rest; but forbore attacking them, for fear of alarming the town they were going to surprize. Upon their arrival at Zoara they found all things in a profound quiet, and the gates open and without guard; and penetrated, as Strozzi ordered them, into the very center of the town, without the least opposition, and there collected themselves into one body, and set themselves in battle-array. Their drums and clattering noise soon awoke the inhabitants, whilst the greedy soldiers broke into their houses, seized on what plunder came first to hand, and brought away men, women, and children, bound, to the place of arms, to the number of about 1500; when the commander de la Kalletta, who had the charge of conducting them on shipboard, was accosted by a Moor, who had formerly served under him, "Do you know, Sir," said he softly to him, "that you are going to be surrounded, and cut in pieces, by those whom you took to be wandering Arabs? They are a body of four thousand Turks, all expert marksmen, whom Morat Aga, governor of Tripoli, was sending to the island of Gelva, but whom the night had obliged to encamp where you saw them; but being now informed by some of the fugitive Zoarans of your having surpris'd the city, are in full march against you?"

THE commander having rewarded the faithful Moor, went immediately to inform Strozzi with the news, who caused a retreat to be forthwith sounded, but which could not be heard through the reigning noise and confusion by the straggling soldiers. Morat, who rightly judged that this would be their case, hastened his army to the place, and fell upon them before they were half rallied, with incredible fury. The contest was most bloody and obstinate on both sides, but especially on that of the Maltese, who were indifferently dispersed in platoons in several parts of the town, where chance had thrown them; and fought without any order, for want of proper commanders. Many of the knights defended themselves to the last, and died with their swords in their hands; whilst others, being quite exhausted with fighting, fell down among the dead, and were made prisoners. Strozzi being informed that his young nephew was slain, returned, at the head of a numerous troop whom he was leading to the sea-side, and renewed the fight with greater fury, and forced the Turkish horse to retreat; but they, returning in good order, made a furious discharge of their small-arms among them, which killed a great number of his men, wounded him in the thigh, and would have quickly dispatched him, had not his knights surrounded him on all sides, and stood like a rampart about him, till a tall stout Majorcan had taken him in his arms, and carried him from the field into the center of his battalion, and from thence, through volleys of the enemy's fire, and through mud and water up to the girdle, from the sea-side into his ship.

THEIR next care was how to save their grand standard, in which they shewed no less valour and intrepidity. The knights formed themselves into a fresh rampart about its bearer, and kept still moving on in spite of the enemy's fire, till they reached a hard rock on the sea-shore, where was a defile, whence they could see the small vessels that waited for them, but, by reason of the low water, could come no nearer to them. Here they stood some time to breathe, and consult how to gain their ships with the least danger. They agreed to stand firm, and defend the pass, till all the soldiery, especially the wounded, were got into the long-boats. The Turkish aga, in a rage to see so many captives escape them, tried in vain to dislodge them from their post, one while by making his horse dismount, and with their scymitars attempt to cut down the pikes which the knights pointed towards them; at another time by making them remount, and annoy them with their small arms. At length the commander Cassiere, who had the care of the standard of the order, moved forwards into the sea, followed by the rest of the knights, wading through it with the water up to their middle, and, in spite of the fire of the Turkish musketry, gained the long-boats, and were safely received into a into their galleys, with joyful acclamations, whilst some of their brethren, who had stood firm to facilitate the standard-bearer's retreat, were destroyed by the enemy's continual fire.

Thus ended that unfortunate enterprize, in which the order lost a great number of their best commanders, and a much greater of their forces. On their arrival at Malta, their brave commander Strozzi was forced to be carried on a plank from his vessel to his palace, attended by the shattered remains of his knights, the greatest part of whom were in almost as bad a condition as he, though all their mouths were full of encomiums on his extraordinary bravery, conduct, and intrepidity. D'Omedes was perhaps the only one in the whole island who secretly rejoiced at his late disaster, and thought him worthy of much better success; and b it is not improbable that his strange behaviour towards him on this occasion, was one of the chief motives that induced him to put again to sea before his wounds were half healed, and to spend the remainder of the summer in cruising along the Mediterranean, as far as the mouth of the Nile; in which expedition he succeeded so well, that he not only became the terror of the Turkish and Barbary corsairs, but likewise of the merchantmen, whole fleets of which he took upon those seas, and brought them to Malta, with all their rich cargoes; with which, as well as the number of slaves he made out of both, he restored plenty and opulence to the whole island.

MUCH about the same time the news came of the succession of queen Mary to the English throne, accompanied with loud encomiums on her for her extraordinary zeal against the protestant religion, and her noble resolution to restore to the church all the lands which her father had taken from it; which filled the whole order with an universal, though short-lived joy. D'Omedes lived only to share in the first rejoicings that were made on that occasion, and died in the beginning of September following, in the 80th year of his age, and the 17th of his grand mastership. The great care he shewed during the whole time to enrich his own family, to the prejudice of the public treasury, together with the disposition he made of his own effects, so incensed the greatest part of the council, that some of them proposed turning over the expences of his funeral obsequies to his executors; which, however, was rejected, as a disgrace to the order, and he was accordingly interred, with the usual solemnity, at the public charge.

d WHEN the chapter was convened for the choice of a successor, Strozzi, who had so well deserved of the order, had the good wishes of the greatest part of the council, and afterwards of the electors; till Gagnon, the great conservator of the order, and one of the elective number, came to give his opinion; who told the rest, that "the interest of the order, at this present time, did not so much require a person of known bravery and conduct, such as the grand prior of Capua undoubtedly was, as one who was absolutely free from the spirit of party, which they all too well knew he was not. You are all sensible how far his zeal for the liberty of Florence carries him against the house of Medicis; should he once be chosen head of this order, and have our galleys and naval force at his disposal, what security can you have that he will not, on some pretence or other, turn his arms against that family, e and bring us under the resentment of the emperor, who is the protector and founder of that house? Will not Cosmo himself, who is at the head of it, try to raise all the enemies he can, both among the Christians, and even among the Turks? and if we should be besieged by the latter, what succours could we hope for from the emperor, or any of the powers of Italy?" This speech was thought so just and disinterested by the rest of the electors, that those, who had already declared for Strozzi, readily gave up the point; and the choice was quickly after declared in favour of Claudius de la Sengle, of the French tongue, then grand hospitaller of the order, and their ambassador at the court of Rome, where his election was, by the pope's express order to the governor of the castle of St. Angelo, published by the fire of its whole artillery. Upon his waiting upon the pontif to pay him the usual homage, he had the honour to dine with him, and was dismissed with all the marks of his esteem. The viceroy of Sicily, having sometime after invited him to Messina, where the Maltese galleys, under the command of the grand prior Strozzi, were to convey him to Malta, sent an express to the emperor, to know in what manner he should receive him; and was answered, that he should not fear shewing too much honour to the head of an order which was the bulwark of his Italian dominions".

f HE was accordingly received with all the marks of esteem by the viceroy, and by the emperor's envoy Acugna, who was sent thither by that politic monarch, under pretence, indeed, of congratulating him on his election, but in reality to treat with him on a more important subject; which plainly shewed, however, that the great respect which was paid to him was rather political than sincere. Accordingly, at the audience he had, he proposed to g

the grand master, in the emperor's name, the removal of the order to the city of Africa, a lately taken by his forces, which would recompense the loss of Tripoli. In consideration of which, added the envoy, and of the expence that such a removal must be attended with, his imperial majesty, who makes no difference between the interest of the order and his own, will engage to pay a perpetual pension of 72,000 livres per annum, out of his Sicilian revenues. The grand master easily saw through the drift of that proposal; nevertheless, after the usual formality of thanks, he excused himself from engaging further in it without the participation of the council; adding, that if he pleased to accompany him to Malta, he should be admitted to all the consultations held about it, and be able to judge of the sincere desire he had of obliging the emperor. The envoy readily accepted the invitation, and embarked with him in the Maltese Squadron, which arrived safe at the island the first day b of the new year.

1554. THE ceremonies of his instalment were no sooner over, than a general council was called; in which Acugna was seated next to the grand master, who, after the first compliments were over, desired him to open the contents of his commission; which he readily did. Upon which it was unanimously resolved, that eight of their antient commanders should be sent to take a full survey of the strength and situation of the place.

Eight deputies sent to survey Africa.

THESE, upon their return, made a favourable report of it, so far as related to the condition and fortifications of the city; but objected, that, "being built upon a peninsula, jutting out into the sea, it had no convenient haven to shelter the ships; and that the spacious champaign that surrounded it on the other three sides, being inhabited by Moors and Arabs, who would not brook to have the order fixed in their neighbourhood, it would cost immense sums yearly to maintain a sufficient force to oppose the continual inroads those infidels would make to its very gates." To all this they added, that, "in case it should at any time be besieged, its great distance from Europe would prevent its receiving any succours speedily enough from thence; and that, in such case, they must be obliged to abandon their sea-exploits, and the defence of Christian commerce, to the prejudice of Christendom, and carry their arms into remote parts of Terra Firma, in order to keep their neighbours within their boundaries, contrary to the spirit of their order, and the known practice of all their predecessors, even when they were much more powerful and opulent than they now were." d

termines to stay at Malta.

A REPORT like this, made by eight of the most experienced commanders, easily determined the council to stay in the old settlement. Upon which they sent two of their chief members on an embassy of thanks to the emperor, and to apprise him of the motives which obliged them to decline his kind proposal. At the same time, to appease the viceroy of Sicily's resentment, who threatened to withdraw his usual supply of corn from them, being informed that the Turkish corsairs swarmed upon his coasts, and had appeared before Palermo, they dispatched five of their gallies, under the command of Strozzi, against them. Strozzi made the greater speed to go in quest of them, not only as the sea was become, in some measure, his element, but because he perceived himself to be suspected to have had a hand in the death of the grand conservator Gagnon, and two other knights of distinction, who had been poisoned by his chief servants and confidants, soon after they had opposed his election. Upon his arrival at Palermo, he received a letter from his elder brother, Peter Strozzi, acquainting him, that the French king had given him the command of his land-forces in Italy, and invited him to take that of his gallies, and to act in constant concert with him. Whatever his resentment might be against the French monarch, his affairs at this time easily determined him to sacrifice it to his inveterate enmity against the house of Medicis. The difficulty was in the withdrawing himself and fleet out of Palermo, without giving some umbrage to the viceroy, who had been ordered by the emperor to keep a watchful eye over him, and, upon the least appearance of his holding a correspondence with his brother, to cause him to be arrested.

Strozzi amuses
the viceroy of Sicily.

To remove as much as possible all suspicion from the viceroy, he entertained him with a long detail of the ill returns he had received from the French court, and of some projects which he had formed to be revenged on that ungrateful and perfidious nation; and acted his part so well, that the viceroy, who wanted to engage him in the emperor's service, instead of suspecting, began to think himself sure of him. They were at dinner together, when a gentleman of Strozzi's retinue came and told him, that he had been just taking an airing at sea, and had observed three Turkish corsairs in a neighbouring creek, which might be easily surprised, with a little good dispatch. Strozzi immediately rose up, and, with a pleasing smile, told the viceroy, that "he would bring a good account of them to him before he was risen from table;" and, making all the speed he could, soon gained his gallies, which were all armed, and ready for sailing, according to the directions he had before given to the g

- a gentleman above-mentioned (for this was a concerted stratagem): so that he immediately sailed away unsuspected; and when he was gone far enough out of sight, he made directly for the island of Malta. At his arrival, he resigned his command of the gallies, in which he was succeeded by the commander De la Valetta; but insisted, that two vessels, being his own property, and a third his brother's, he would go a cruising on his own bottom; in which he was accompanied by a great number of young volunteers. We shall follow him no farther in his other expeditions, having no more relation to the Maltese order; but only observe to our curious readers, that being sailed for Tuscany, and going to reconnoitre the place which he designed to lay siege to, he was known by a peasant who lay hid amongst the reeds, and who immediately shot him in the side, whence he was carried to his galley, and died of the wound on the next day <sup>p</sup>. This was the sad catastrophe of that brave commander, who might have been an honour and pillar to the order, had not his inveteracy against the house of Medicis misled him into unjustifiable measures.

LA VALETTA, his successor in the command of the gallies, proved no less diligent and successful against the Turks, whom he quite drove from the coasts of Naples and Sicily, and whose example induced several of the wealthiest commanders to equip vessels at their own charge, by which they kept these seas almost clear of that destructive vermin. Their number and success quickly alarmed the states of Barbary, who, as we have formerly seen, lived chiefly by the piratical trade.

- THESE, and the merchants who traded towards Constantinople, and other parts of the Turkish empire, and often fell likewise into the hands of the Maltese, went and made such loud complaints at the Porte against them, that the sultan promised to drive them out of that island, as he had already done out of Rhodes; but tho' he was at this time so taken up elsewhere, that the order was in no present danger from this quarter, yet that did not hinder the new grand master's making all proper preparations against him, by adding new fortifications, and filling his magazines with corn and other provisions, and the arsenals with all warlike stores, against a siege; whilst his admiral, and other commanders, were still bringing in variety of prizes. We are even told, that the former ventured as far as the mouth of the river Nile, whence he brought three large vessels laden with corn for Constantinople.

- THUS far every thing went successfully on, when this tranquility was all at once disturbed by an unexpected calamity, no less dreadful and destructive than it was violent and short-lived. This was a sudden hurricane, which happened on the 23d of September, in the afternoon, which blew with such fury, that, in the space of one half-hour it lasted, it threw the sea into such convulsions, that it shattered most of the ships in pieces one against another, overturned four of their gallies, with all their crews, and left them with their keels upwards, by which most of the officers, sailors, and slaves, were drowned, or crushed to death. The houses near the haven were all blown down, and the castle of St. Angelo very much damaged by the violence of the different whirlwinds, which seemed engaged against one another; inso-much that the tree, on which the standard of the order was fixed, was lifted up and carried away near a mile from its place. The vast swelling of the sea, joined to the rains that poured down in constant streams, seemed to threaten the whole island with utter destruction, and would most certainly have been attended with great disasters, had it continued much longer.

- THE calm that succeeded within half an hour after was hardly less terrible to the sight, by the number of shipwrecks and fragments, and dead bodies, that covered the surface of the waves, and the number of houses that were laid in ruins in that short time, and much more so by the night which intervened, and prevented, in a great measure, that speedy succour which might otherwise have been given to those who were still exposed to the greatest danger, both on the water and on the land, and more particularly to those who were in the four overturned gallies above-mentioned; so that the grand master, and the other members of the convent, who were come to give the best orders they could to the assistants, were obliged to stay till the next daylight before they could set them afloat. As soon as that appeared, they made towards them, and caused some of the planks to be pulled up; upon which a monkey started out. They took up as many of the men as they could come at; among whom was the famous Romegas, a knight of the tongue of Provence, of whom we shall have frequent occasion to speak in the sequel, and some others, who had remained all night with the water up to their chins. The same assistance was given to the other gallies, some of which were, after great labour and difficulty, set on float, and others, particularly the carack, were quite shattered, and rendered unfit for further service. Some of the men were taken up half-dead, and many more really drowned or stifled for want of air. The loss of both men and vessels was very considerable. The grand master, to shew a good example, caused a new galley to be built at Messina, which the pope was so generous as to furnish with a proper number of his own slaves, which were fetched out of several of his gaols, to row it to Malta. The rest of his wealthiest commanders did the same at their own expences, as did also some European princes; so that this great loss was repaired in a very little time.

Dragut
driven out of the island with great loss.

BUT in the mean while Dragut, their implacable enemy, having been informed of this great disaster, had gathered up what corsairs he could, and took that opportunity of making a descent upon the island with seven gallies. He ravaged the whole country, and made a great number of the inhabitants prisoners; but before he could regain his ships, he was so fiercely attacked by the commander Lastic, grand marshal of the order, at the head of 300 knights, that he was obliged to retreat with the utmost speed, with the loss of a great number of his men, and of all his plunder. The grand prior of France sailed immediately in pursuit of him, and, not being able to overtake him, went and wreaked his resentment on the coasts of Barbary, and returned with several considerable prizes from thence; so that the order, in a little time, recovered its pristine superiority at sea, by the successes and valour of its commanders. On the other hand, Dragut, and the rest of the Barbary corsairs, were not wanting in their resentments; and tho' they shunned meeting the Maltese gallies at open sea, yet they would now-and-then come and burn some of them in the dead of night in their very harbours<sup>1</sup>.

Soon after they had recovered their loss by the hurricane lately mentioned, another disaster happened, which caused no small uneasiness and animosity in the convent, besides exposing the order to the resentment of the most powerful princes in Europe. We have already hinted, that Strozzi, after he had laid down his commission of admiral of the gallies, had obtained some of them as belonging to him and his brother; and that this last accordingly challenged and kept them as his own, after his brother's death, tho' one only belonged to him. These he was obliged to join with some French ones, then riding at Civita Vecchia; because, being commander of the French forces in Italy, he could not take the care of them. The ships were then under the command of Sforza, grand prior of Lombardy, brother to the cardinal of that name, grand Camerlingo to the holy see. Sforza, soon after quitting the service of France for that of Spain, in concert with his brother, carried off two of the French gallies, whilst a Piedmontese, named Moretto, did the same by two of Strozzi's, which he carried to the port of Villa Franca, belonging to the duke of Savoy. This treachery occasioned a furious contest between the pope, the emperor, the French king, and the duke of Savoy; which, being foreign to this part of our history, we shall refer our readers to the account which will be given of it in the succeeding part of this work. The grand master was not only blamed for the share he had in it, by each of the powers concerned in the affair, according to the several views and interests they had in it, but likewise by the members of the convent, in which each tongue took the part of its own nation with such warmth, as must have proved of dangerous consequence, had not the matter been timely compromised.

The grand master dies of grief.

BUT tho' the whole matter had been determined with the greatest prudence and equity, it by no means allayed the dissensions and heart-burnings between the different tongues. The bitter reflections which they continually threw out against each other, and, in many cases, glanced upon the grand master himself, if not chiefly aimed at him, sensibly affected him. The ill offices and exactions of the viceroy of Sicily on the corn which was brought from that island, contrary to the old treaty with the emperor, were interpreted as the effects of that monarch's resentment against him. These and other grating things which occurred, made so deep an impression on his mind, that he might be more properly said to have languished out, than lived, the short remainder of his days. He died on the 18th of August 1557, in the 4th year of his grand mastership, leaving behind him, besides the considerable sums he had spent in the fortifications of the island, above 60,000 crowns in his own coffers, to the public treasury of the order. In gratitude for which generosity, the chapter, which had given him leave to frequent it at his discretion, ordered 12,000 livres out of it to be presented to his niece, as an addition to her dowry, and another sum was ordered to be laid out in some splendid ornaments for the church, on which his name and coat of arms were richly embroidered<sup>2</sup>. Before his death, he caused a farther inquiry to be made into the process intended against the commander Valier, late governor of Tripoli, who had been till then detained in prison, and ordered him to be set at liberty; but whether his fear of disobliging the party of the late D'Omedes, who had prosecuted him with so much rancour, or any other private motive, intimidated him, he did not venture to extend his generosity farther than that; so that this brave officer, who would have been in all probability raised to the grand mastership, had he commanded any-where but in Tripoli, was still forced, after a cruel imprisonment of some years, to live a poor obscure life, suitable to his disgrace, and was not restored to his pristine dignities till the beginning of his successor's government.

- a HE was succeeded by the famed commander John de la Valetta, surnamed Parisot, of the <sup>48. John de</sup> tongue of Provence, a person of great valour and experience, who had regularly passed thro' <sup>la Valetta.</sup> all the other dignities of the order, and who, soon after his election, recovered a great number of responsions and other revenues, which had been detained or suppressed, both in Germany and Venice. The former had been alienated during the troubles which the Hussites had raised in most of the northern countries; and the latter, under pretence that most of theirs were employed in defence of Christianity against the Turks. His next care was, after a fresh examination of Valier's cause, to do justice to his innocence and merit, by declaring all his former accusations false and unjust, and bestowing upon him the rich bailiwick of Lango. By this time the new viceroy of Sicily, desirous of signalizing his government by some remarkable service,
- b had laid a project for wrenching the city of Tripoli out of Dragut's hands, who commanded in chief in it, and had caused the fortifications both of the city and castle to be augmented with fresh out-works, in order not only to make it his place of arms, from whence he sent his corsairs on their usual excursions against Malta, Naples, and Sicily, but also a safe receptacle for all the piratical crews of Algiers, Tunis, &c. The grand master was easily in- <sup>Joins in the</sup> duced to join in the enterprize, which no less concerned the island of Malta than it did the <sup>enterprize</sup> Spanish dominions in Italy; tho' he was at the same time apprised from several hands, par- <sup>against Tri-</sup> ticularly by the commander Romegas, of the vast preparations that were making at the Porte to make a fresh descent upon the island: but as he knew also that they would take some time longer before they could be ready to sail, he rightly enough judged, that, if the expedition
- c against Tripoli was carried on with due diligence, the place might be carried before the Turkish fleet could come to its assistance; after which the imperial forces might assist him in the defence of Malta, in case it should be attacked by the Turks. With this view he sent the commander Guariman into Sicily, to hasten the armament, which was ordered to rendezvous at Malta, under the command of John de Lacerta, duke of Medina-Celi, the then viceroy of that island, and the admiral Doria, in conjunction with him.
- THE misfortune was, that the two former proved so dilatory in their preparations, that the grand master began to think the season too far advanced for such an expedition, and advised them by his letters to put it off till the next spring: but the young viceroy, afraid lest Philip II. who was no great warrior, should alter his mind, and deprive him of the glory he promised
- d himself by it, would listen to no delay, and, in spite of the rigor of the season, sailed for Malta, and arrived there about the middle of December 1559. He was highly pleased at the honours with which the whole order received him, and much more so at the vast preparations of the grand master, and the numerous appearance of so many brave knights that were to accompany him, and who were all men of valour and intrepidity, and not a few of them old experienced commanders; but tho' expressly ordered by the king his master to be directed wholly by La Valetta, yet he could not be brought to consent to any farther delay than the coming of the remainder of the armament from Naples and Milan, which being at length arrived about the beginning of February, they immediately set about a plan for the operations
- e of the campaign. The grand master, who was perfectly well acquainted with all the fortifications which Dragut had caused to be made to the place, and the numerous garrison and plenty of ammunition he had put into it, thought himself obliged to lay an account of all before the council of war, who appeared not a little surprized at it, it being what till then they hardly dreamed of. The young Lacerta, a better courtier than warrior, appeared so disconcerted at it, that, to avoid exposing himself to so dangerous an enterprize, he immediately proposed making their first descent on the small island of Gerba, which had no other fortifications but an old castle, and was defended only by a few Arabs. This the grand master rejected, upon several accounts; and finding him still deaf to all his reasonings, whilst the rest of the council seemed inclined to his opinion, he plainly told him, that he might go and employ his forces where he pleased; but that since Tripoli was the place to which his master had sent him, he
- f would not suffer one of his Maltese gallies to accompany him on any other expedition but that. This he spoke in so steady a tone, that Lacerta found himself obliged to yield; and, after having given him the most solemn assurances that he would not go upon any other attempt but that, and having received from him an addition of 200 pioneers, to assist him at the siege, the fleet set sail directly towards Tripoli on the 10th of February. How the viceroy performed <sup>The ill success</sup> his promise, the ill success, loss, and disgrace, he met with in his attempt on the island of <sup>of that expe-</sup> Gerba, which put an end to this expedition, we have else-where seen, and need not be re- <sup>dition.</sup> peated here; only, with respect to the order, we must observe, that being obliged, by their post of honour, to be always foremost in every attack, and the last in giving way, their loss was the most considerable, through the cowardice of the Sicilian general, by whom they were
- g most shamefully abandoned more than once in the greatest danger.

A new military order founded in Tuscany.

It was much about the same time, that Cosmo, duke of Tuscany, instituted his new military order of knights of St. Stephen, after the model of that of Malta, excepting that he exempted his own from the vows of celibacy, poverty, &c. and obliged them in all other things to conform to those of Malta; and, whenever they met with any of their gallies at sea, to join themselves to them, and act in concert with them. Four gallies of this new order, commanded by Baccio Martelli, having met with seven Maltese ones near the Cape de Lupo, commanded by Gonzago, admiral of Malta, gave them the first salute, and put themselves under the admiral's command. These eleven gallies began to scour the sea with such success, that they took a vast number of Barbary and other Turkish corsairs, recovered several Christian vessels that had been taken by them, and, at the end of their cruize, before they parted, those of St. Stephen went and paid their respects to the grand master, from whom they met with a gracious reception. The joint success they had, within the space of about two months, soon induced Valetta to cause two larger gallies more to be built at his own charge; and his example was quickly followed by several wealthy commanders; by which means the order, in a little time, made up the great loss they had sustained at the isle of Gerba, and became more powerful at sea than it had ever been since its foundation, not only by the number of their ships, but much more by the valour and experience of their commanders, most of whom were fit to command a whole fleet.

The brave exploits of Romegas.

We have had occasion to mention the famed Romegas, a person of a stern and undaunted disposition, who spent the greatest part of his life at sea, and suffered neither officers nor soldiers to belong to him, but such who were of the same martial and intrepid courage with himself. This commander meeting on the coasts of Sicily a galley belonging to a Calabrian renegado, named Izuph Concini, who was known to be one of the bloodiest tyrants of the Christian slaves, attacked him with such fury, that though he met with a desperate defence, yet he boarded him with some of his bravest knights, sword in hand, two of whom were killed at his side by that renegado, who had then in his vessel 250 soldiers, besides 200 Christian slaves at the oar. But these last, seeing Romegas master of the ship, one of them gave him a stroke over the head, which threw him down. The rest immediately fell upon him with the fury of bull-dogs, and tore his flesh with their teeth, from one bench to another; so that he had hardly any left by that time he was got to the last. Romegas gave them their liberty, and clapped the Turkish prisoners to the oar, and brought the galliot in triumph to Malta. Many such noble exploits did this brave commander perform, which we have no room to insert, by which he became the terror of all the Turkish corsairs.

The grand master invited to the council of Trent.

Not long after this, the pope having summoned the council of Trent, the grand master was invited to be present at it; but he contented himself with sending two ambassadors thither; viz. the famed Villegagnon, formerly mentioned, and Royal de Portal Rouge. The former of these being prevented by sickness and old age from assisting at it, the latter only repaired to that assembly, but met with some difficulty about settling the place and rank he was to hold in it; some of the members objecting against an ambassador from the head of a lay-fraternity taking place of bishops amongst the ambassadors of crowned heads. The contest was, however, compromised, to the satisfaction of all parties; after which, he addressed himself to the assembly in words to this effect: "That if the grand master was not there present, or had not sent him sooner as his ambassador to them, it was owing to the vast number of corsairs which infested the Maltese chanel, and to an apprehension the order was in of being quickly visited by the Turkish fleet, which had been long equipping for conquering that island: That if the order was not now in a condition to make head against so powerful a force, or to perform such glorious exploits against the enemies of Christendom, as they had formerly done" (some of the most considerable of which he enumerated), "it was owing to their being deprived of many of their best priories and revenues, not only by those princes who had embraced the reformation, but likewise by others who still adhered to the church, who had, in this respect, openly invaded the rights and privileges of it." He concluded with praying the holy synod to consider the vast and constant services they had done to Christianity ever since their foundation, and to put them once more in a condition of still doing so, by decreeing a restitution of their antient rights and revenues, and by procuring a confirmation of their decree from every catholic crowned head."

His ambassador's speech there.

Answer to him.

THE president having, in the name of the assembly, given him a general promise, answerable to his request, he presented each of the members with a memorial, in which were mentioned the several privileges of the order with relation to the priories and commanderies belonging to it, and in it a further petition, that "their decree might exclude all persons of whatsoever quality from enjoying them, who had not taken upon them the three vows of the order." But this was too delicate a point for the pope's creatures to meddle with with-a out his participation ; and it is more than probable that some of them apprised him of it time enough for him to put a stop to it ; for he let them know soon after, that the matter of the ambassador's request belonged solely to him ; and that he would himself take proper care of the rights and privileges of that order. This prevented the council's farther proceedings about it ; and Pius IV. we are told <sup>e</sup>, soon forgot his promise, and the services which they had done to religion, particularly to Italy, Sicily, and other parts, in freeing them from the incursions and ravages of the Turkish and Barbary corsairs. This did not hinder other European powers from granting several considerable privileges to the order, particularly Charles IX. king of France, duke of Savoy <sup>f</sup>, &c.

b THE Spaniards, in the same year, having made a fruitless attempt on the sea-port of Gomer <sup>The Maltese</sup> de Velez, situated on the Barbary coast, and not above forty leagues distant from that of Spain, resolved to make a fresh one on the next, in which they invited the grand master, <sup>assist the Spaniards.</sup> among other Christian powers, to assist them, which was readily complied with by La Valetta, <sup>1564.</sup> who furnished them with some of his best gallies and commanders, as well as with a considerable number of knights, who greatly assisted Don Garcia, who commanded in that expedition, in the taking both that town and Pennon de Velez; the latter of which proved a place of great importance to the Spaniards for some considerable time, as we have elsewhere shewn. The loss of which place, which used to be a sure refuge to all the Barbary corsairs, who were here secure from pursuit by the cannon of the fortrefs, greatly alarmed the whole piratic crew. Dragut, their old and stedfast friend, soon ordered his agent to represent their case to the Porte, in such c pathetic terms, that Soliman gave him an absolute promise of such powerful assistance against the Spaniards and Maltese, that they would have no cause to be longer afraid of either. Malta was pitched upon to be the first scene of war, against which he caused a powerful fleet to be equipped, and all the other military preparations to be privately made against it ; but that which determined that monarch to declare his intentions more publicly, and to hasten his armament, was, a prize which seven Maltese gallies had made of two of his largest and richest galleons, which were laden with some of the richest merchandizes of the east.

FIVE of the Maltese gallies which belonged to the order were commanded by the admiral Giou, and the other two belonging to the grand master by Romegas, when they met with the <sup>A rich galleon taken.</sup> sultan's galleon between the isles of Zante and Cephalonia. This last carried 20 large cannon, d besides a great number of small ones, and was commanded by Beiran Ougly, a brave old captain, who had some of the best officers, and about 200 janissaries, all excellent marksmen, on board. Most of the favourite sultanas, and other great ladies in the seraglio, had a share in the lading of it : the vessel belonged to one of the chief eunuchs of it, who was the master of that monarch's pleasures. Giou fired a gun to bring her to ; but was answered by a loaden one from Ougly, who immediately hoisted up the flag of defiance. The two Maltese governors had wisely agreed to attack him by turns, so as to keep a constant fire against him ; but Giou, willing to carry off the greatest share of the glory, was rash enough to push his galley quite under the stern of the Turk, whence he saw himself immediately surrounded with wild-fire, and his men overwhelmed with volleys of large stones, which obliged him to draw off with e speed, and with the loss of a great number of his men. Romegas advanced next with his two gallies, and with his usual intrepidity, but received a shot which overthrew his wale, and killed 20 of his men. A second, which immediately followed it, threw another score of them into the sea, and obliged him likewise to withdraw, to avoid being sunk by the fire of a large cannon which he saw levelled against him betwixt wind and water. They then agreed to attack the Turk in flank, by two on each side, and made such a terrible fire upon it as killed and disabled a great number of the janissaries, yet without any other advantage ; so that they found themselves obliged to call in the rest of their gallies to their assistance.

f THE onset was then renewed with most obstinate fury on both sides, and had lasted near five hours ; and the Maltese might in all likelihood have been obliged to sail away with a considerable loss, had the Turks been able to play all their artillery against them ; but the greatest part of it was unfortunately hemmed in by the quantity of bales which the merchants had crowded about it, so that a great part became useless through their greediness. By this misfortune the fire of the Maltese being much superior, they quickly became masters of the rich vessel, not without vast loss on both sides. The Christians had above sixscore men killed, among whom were a good number of their bravest knights. The Turks lost above eighty of their janissaries, some of their best officers, and, in particular, a most expert engineer at pointing their artillery, besides a much greater number of wounded.

THE news of this capture failed not of making great noise both at Constantinople, and much <sup>Fresh complaints made to</sup> more in the seraglio ; and though Soliman, who looked upon it as the highest affront against <sup>Soliman.</sup> his household, wanted no spur to his resentment, yet was he surrounded not only by those who had a share in the loss, but by crowds of his own officers. Even the musti and his tribe came a and complained, that the Maltese galleys greatly obstructed the devotions of the faithful, and their pilgrimages to the prophet's tomb; and that their island swarmed with Turkish slaves, who groaned under a most cruel and shameful servitude. Even the head imam, or chief preacher, took the liberty to represent to him in his sermon, what a disgrace it was to so pious and valiant a prince as he to suffer so many myriads of his faithful subjects to groan under the chains of those sworn enemies of their prophet and his religion. This last scene was doubtless directed under-hand by the chief eunuch above-mentioned, who furnished the preacher with a particular list of all the prizes, which he gave him then a full, and perhaps a much exaggerated, account of, towards the close of his sermon, which he concluded with words to this effect: b

 "All these vessels, with their rich lading, their soldiers, and sailors, have been seized by "those merciless corsairs. Thy invincible sword alone can break the chains of these unhappy
 "wretches; the son demands his father, the wife her husband and children, of thee; and all "of them expect from thy justice and powerful arm a speedy vengeance on these most cruel
 "enemies." Soliman was not a little moved at the boldness of the preacher, and much more at the universal murmur which it raised among the audience, so contrary to the behaviour of the Turks in their mosques; and, to prevent its rising to a greater height, solemnly promised them, by his grand vizier, that they should all be revenged and satisfied in a little time; and retired, fully resolved, as soon as he was rid of his war in Hungary, to turn his whole force against the Maltese <sup>a</sup>.

He accordingly held a general council in a neighbouring plain, where all his great officers c assisted on horseback, and in which the reduction of that island was unanimously agreed on, contrary to the advice of Hali, one of Dragut's most experienced captains, who was sent thither for that purpose, and who gave that monarch the most solid arguments against that enterprize; but which were all over-ruled by the rest of the diwan, and perhaps by the sultan's own ambition and resentment against the whole order. One of his first cares, therefore, was, to send some spies, in the disguise of fishermen, to take a full view of the island, who found means to bring him back an exact plan of it, with all its fortifications, havens, strength, and the number of its inhabitants, &c. whilst he was hastening his armaments against it. By this time, as there was hardly any reason to doubt of its being designed against this island, the viceroy of Sicily, Don Garcia, was ordered by his master to take it in his way to d the castle of Goletta, in order to consult with the grand master about the properest means of providing against the threatening storm; so that, whether it should fall on Malta, or on the Pennon de Velez, on the coasts of Barbary, or on any of the Spanish dominions in Italy, they might be enabled to assist each other. The grand master acquainting him, that in case his island should be attacked, he should want both men and corn, Garcia engaged to supply him with both upon his return to Sicily; in pledge of which he left one of his sons with him, who was afterwards admitted into the order. He was no sooner departed, than the grand master summoned all the knights of the order, dispersed through several parts of Europe, to e repair to him. Those that were in Italy raised a body of 2000 foot, to which the viceroy of Sicily added two companies of Spanish forces. All the galleys of the order were employed in transporting these troops, together with all manner of provisions and ammunition, into the island; and the knights that were in it, in distributing, disciplining, and exercising, their new levies, as well as the Maltese militia, against the siege.

La Valetta summons the whole order to Malta.

THE grand master saw himself by this time strengthened by the arrival of the above 600 knights; all of whom brought with them retinues of good stout servants, fit to assist in the defence of the island; whilst those, who, by reason of age, sickness, or other impediments, could not repair to him, divested themselves of their most precious effects, to assist him with their purses. The pope, on his part, contented himself with sending a good round sum of 10,000 crowns; and the king of Spain ordered his viceroy Don Garcia to raise an army of 20,000 men, to be ready to sail thither as soon as called for. The grand master, like a most f experienced commander, employed the remainder of his time and care in visiting all the forts, magazines, arsenals, &c. and assigning to each tongue their several posts, and making all proper preparations for an obstinate defence, till the Othman fleet appeared in sight of the island, on the 18th day of May 1565.

It consisted of 159 large galleys and galleons, carrying on board 30,000 forces, janissaries and spahis, besides the slaves at the oar, accompanied by a considerable number of other vessels, laden with artillery, ammunition, and other necessaries for a siege. The whole armament was commanded by Mustapha basha, an old experienced officer, aged about 85 years, and an old favourite and confident of the sultan, of an haughty cruel temper, who made it a merit to violate his word, and to use all manner of cruelties against the Cristians, but more ef- g a pecially against the Maltese. The fleet cast anchor towards the evening in the bay of Mugiarro, alias Porto del Mugiaro; at the sight of which, the marshal Copel, at the head of 200 knights and 1000 foot, marched with speed to oppose their landing. The basha, by the help of a dark night, ordered 35 of his rear gallies, with 3000 men, to tack about, and land at the ladder-port, otherwise called the castle of St. Thomas; which they did without opposition. These, lying concealed among the rocks, had an opportunity of falling upon the patrolling detachments of the Maltese, as they actually did upon two of them, the one commanded by a Portuguese knight, who was killed on the spot by a shot from the enemy, and the other commanded by the brave chevalier La Riviere, who was taken prisoner as he flew to the other's assistance.

b RIVIERE was immediately brought to the haughty basha, who questioned him concerning the number of their forces, the strength of their island, and the disposition of the grand master and his knights. To which he bravely answered, that there was not one of them who would not fight to the last drop of his blood in defence of his religion, and of an island which they esteemed as their own country: that the island was furnished with every thing necessary to sustain a siege, and would soon be as gallantly defended from without by a powerful fleet from Europe, as from within by the intrepid valour of his order and the forces they had to engage under them. The basha, looking upon his answer as a mere bravado, ordered him to be put to the torture; which he endured for a while with a surprising constancy; but at length, as if he had been overcome by the violence of it, he told him, in a different tone, that he would find the island impregnable on every side but that of the borough and post of Castile, which he said was indeed the least fortified of all; upon which Mustapha, who doubted not of the truth of it, resolved to make his attack on that side. In the mean time, the wind having veered that very night, the fleet removed to the bay of Merfa Sirocco, where they were to have landed at first, had the wind permitted them to do it. Here Mustapha caused two towers to be erected, one at each end of the entrance, to secure the artillery and ammunition they had landed, as well as the fleet from being surprised either by the Maltese, or by the European ships which they were told were in full sail for that island. The basha, however, still diffident, and resolved to take a view of the place himself, caused Riviere to be conducted after him in chains to an eminence called Monte Calcara, whence he had a full view of the island and all its fortifications, and bid him shew him the Castilian post which he had represented to him as the weakest; and finding it fortified with stout walls, bastions, and other bulwarks, the basha, in a passion, gave him such a blow with his cane as laid him quite flat on the ground, and ordered his retinue to dispatch him. Riviere taken prisoner, and tortured.

c ALL this while the Turks who landed were spread over the island, and committed the most cruel ravages; whilst the Maltese, on their side, kept patrolling about, and had several bloody rencounters with them. These the grand master was obliged to suppress, because the loss of one man was greater to him than that of 100 to the enemy. At the same time, Mustapha having called a council of war, the admiral Phiali insisted upon waiting for the arrival of Dragut, before they undertook any thing, according to the sultan's express orders; but Mustapha, still fearing lest the European fleet, which Riviere had informed him of, should come and invest theirs in the Merfa Sirocco, resolved upon the immediate opening the trenches before the fort of St. Elmo, which he supposed might be carried in two days: a conquest that would facilitate the taking of that of Merfa Musetto, in whose more capacious and safe haven they might secure their whole fleet; after which they could pursue the siege of the other places with more safety. He had the greater reason to fear the surprise of his fleet in the Merfa Sirocco, as Don Garcia, viceroy of Sicily, had caused a rumour to be spread in the Turkish camp, that he would soon be there and attack them at the head of the king his master's fleet. Fort St. Elmo besieged.

d THE difficulty was, in opening the trenches before the fort, which was built partly on the solid rock, and partly on a ground almost as hard; but the basha, who neither wanted pioneers, nor was sparing of their lives, quickly overcame it in part, and, where that could not be done, covered his men with an artificial rampart made of wood, gabions, and the like; so that he was able to raise a battery of 10 cannon that carried 80 lb. besides two culverins of 60, and a basilisk of a monstrous size, which threw stones of 160 lb. weight, and began to fire against the place by the 24th day of the month. These made such terrible havock in the place, that the commander was obliged to send for some farther assistance, whose messenger, named Lacerta, magnified the danger the fort was in, in such dismal terms, that the grand master thought himself obliged to give him a very severe reprimand: You represent, said he to him, the castle to me, before all these commanders, as a body quite emaciated and exhausted for want of strong remedies; I myself will go and be its physician, and, if I cannot cure you of your fear, I will at least prevent the infidels taking the advantage of it. This might look indeed as too severe a rebuke, considering the desperate situation the besieged were in from the continual fire of such a battery; but there was a necessity of concealing it, in order to prevent the rest from being discouraged, The grand master's intrepidity.

discouraged, because the safety of the whole island depended upon the lengthening of the siege, a to give Don Garcia time to send the promised assistance. Having therefore drawn up a sufficient reinforcement, he put himself at their head, resolving, as he said, to defend the place, or be buried under the ruins of it; but he was quickly surrounded with such a number of knights, who offered themselves to go in his stead, that he had nothing left to do but to make choice of such as he thought most proper for that arduous commission.

THEY marched accordingly to the place with an undaunted bravery, and most of them lost their lives with the same intrepidity, and were still supplied with fresh ones, who came in droves from England, Germany, France, and other parts of Europe, with the most surprising diligence, to share in the same danger; many of whom, instead of waiting for the Sicilian fleet to convey them thither, ventured themselves in light barks, or what other vessels b they could get, whose entrance into the port Muzetto the grand master facilitated by the constant fire he made upon the enemy. One of his balls having accidentally fallen upon one of the stones that covered their trenches, a splinter gave the Turkish admiral Phiali so desperate a wound, that he was taken up for dead; the news of which spread an universal dread through the army, and especially through the fleet. The grand master took advantage of their confusion to dispatch his nephew, with another commander, into Sicily, in order to hasten that armament, and settle a proper signal for their reception. He received soon after an express, with a promise from the viceroy, that the stipulated succour would be with him at farthest by the middle of June; so that he was forced to throw fresh troops into the castle, in order to spin out the time.

A bloody fall made on the Turks.

In the mean while the commander Medran, who had conducted the last reinforcement, made a lucky fall on the Turks, when they were least aware of him, under the continual fire of the artillery from the fort, which threw them into such confusion, that he cut a good number of them in pieces before they could rally themselves. This occasioned a bloody and obstinate contest on both sides: unfortunately for the besieged, the wind blew so full against them, that they were quite suffocated with the smoke of the enemy's fire, which forced them to retreat. The Turks, taking the advantage of it, pursued them through it unperceived, and by that means, placing themselves on their counterscarp, made a safe lodgment upon it, with their gabions, woolfacks, and timber, and quickly reared a battery, and fixed their standard upon it. They had such an advantage from thence over the besieged, that scarce d any of them dared to raise his head above the ramparts, but he was immediately shot by the janissaries musquetry. Their situation was become at length so desperate, that the pusillanimous Lacerta, who had once before been so severely rebuked by the grand master, was now proposing the undermining and blowing up this new battery; which advice, however, was unanimously rejected with scorn, as proceeding rather from cowardice and despair than from any desire of saving the place.

Uluckiali and Dragut arrive.

WHILST this bloody contest was carrying on between the castle and the battery, the famous corsair Uluckiali arrived with six gallies and nine hundred men from Alexandria, and landed at the Turkish camp; and some days after the famed Dragut, with 13 galliots and 1600 more. This last was received with shouts, and the fire of the whole Turkish artillery. Upon his landing, he went to take a survey of the camp, and the principal fortresses of the island, and seemed surprised that Mustapha should have begun with the siege of that fort, instead of the castle of Gosa, and the Notable City, which would at once have cut off all supplies of provisions, and their receiving any reinforcements from abroad. Mustapha, who was ordered by the sultan to pay the greatest regard to his advice, having given him the reasons which determined him to do it, readily offered to raise the siege, and to attack the castle of Gosa and the Notable City; but Dragut, fearing lest such a step should inspirit the besieged and discourage the Turks, agreed to go on with it; and as he was an old experienced person in all such matters, ordered a new battery to be reared on the 1st of June, to keep a more constant fire against an outwork which covered the fort. He raised another over-against fort Muzetto, of four cannon, f to batter it on that side, and a third of two guns on the counterscarp, to destroy the casemates on the entrance of fort Muzetto, which hath been named ever since the cape of point Dragut, and where he caused four culverins to be planted to batter the ravelin.

The Turks twice repelled

THE Turkish engineers, by the assistance of the constant fire of their musquetry, having taken a survey of that outwork, without being perceived, and observing the Maltese soldiers all buried in profound sleep, immediately ordered a number of their men to scale the place with their ladders; who quickly gained the top, and cut in pieces most of the Christians. The tumult which ensued having alarmed the rest, a fresh supply of forces, headed by some of the knights, soon came and opposed their progress; upon which an obstinate fight began, and a battery of two cannon, playing briskly against the enemy, made them give way for some time; but, as they were continually reinforced by fresh recruits, they at last got the better of g the Maltese, and not only lodged themselves in the ravelin, but, with an incredible fury, pursued a pursued the knights in their retreat through the ditch, until they were stopped by the the artillery and wild-fire of the fort. Some authors tell us, that they rallied soon after, and came with fresh force and fury to scale the place; and would, in all likelihood, have carried it, had not their ladders proved too short, which obliged them to retire with great loss. The order, besides the loss of the ravelin, had no less than 20 knights and 100 soldiers killed, and a great many others wounded, and, among them, the baily of Negropont and the cavalier de Guardampa (M).

It was by those wounded men, who were carefully conveyed into the city to be taken care of, that the grand master was informed of the loss of the ravelin, which obliged him to continue sending supplies of fresh men to the fort, great numbers of whom were almost as soon
b cut off by the constant fire of the enemy. This forced him to send a second message to the viceroy of Sicily, in which, after some warm expostulations at his strange delay, he told him, that he would engage to oblige the enemy to raise the siege, if he could but obtain a speedy succour of 8000 men from him. But great was his surprize, when, instead of it, he received only two Maltese knights, who, with much difficulty and danger, had passed through the enemy, to come and acquaint him, that Don Garcia, instead of sending back the two Maltese ships which were to have conveyed him thither, demanded five more of him, before he could set out; by which he plainly understood, that he only sought for a pretence to evade the engaging of the Turkish fleet. In this distress Salvago, one of those knights, was sent back to him with fresh instances; whilst the other, named Lamiranda, begged to be sent to c take the command of the fort, which was readily granted: upon which he quickly found means to convey himself, at the head of a new reinforcement, together with a fresh supply of wine, and other provisions, into the place; which gave a new life to those that were in it. Lamiranda sent to command in the fort.

In the mean time Dragut proposed the stopping the communication between the fort and borough, from which it received all its supplies, by planting a new battery at the point of the grand port: but that being thought at too great a distance from the camp, and consequently liable to be seized by the besieged, unless it were defended by a greater number of troops than they could spare, Mustapha advised the suspending of it till the arrival of the bey of Algiers, who was daily expected, and would be highly pleased to be complimented with that office: the rest of the council acquiesced in the proposal. Then the basha ordered the d ravelin to be raised, by the help of fascines, woolpacks, and other materials, to a height above the parapet of the place, and a new battery to be planted upon it. By this means they not only gained a full view of the fort, but could prevent, by their fire, any of the Maltese soldiers from coming near the parapet. This obliged them to throw up a deep intrenchment within it, to secure their approach; but this also was quickly after destroyed by the help of a bridge, which Mustapha ordered to be thrown between the new battery and the parapet, large enough for six men to go over abreast; the planks of which he ordered to be covered with earth to a certain depth, to prevent their burning it. This new bridge opened a way for them quite to the parapet: but Lamiranda did not let them enjoy long the fruit of it; for, by the artifice of a feigned sally, he got it burned and demolished by some of his stoutest men on e that very night. The Turks, however, finished a new one by the next day, and at night got down into the ditch, where they reared up their ladders, as if they had designed to scale the ramparts, which quickly obliged the besieged to appear on the breach in crowds. This was what the Turkish general wanted, who immediately caused a most dreadful discharge of his artillery to be made upon them, which killed a much greater number of them than had been done since the beginning of the siege. The surviving knights, seeing the desperate condition the fort was reduced to, sent the commander Madran to acquaint the grand master with it, who immediately communicated it to the council. The majority agreed upon abandoning the place, which could be no longer kept but by the destruction of those remaining forces which were reserved, and would hardly prove sufficient to defend the other fortresses of the f island; so that the more forces they sent into it, the greater service they did the enemy, by rendering the rest of the island still more defenceless. One might have expected that a per-

(M) This last, we are told, having received a musket ball through his body, refused the assistance which was offered him by some of his men, who were going to carry him to some convenient place to have his wound dressed; telling them, that they must look upon him as a dead man, and go to the assistance of the living. This said, he crawled along quite to the chapel belonging to the fort, and expired at the foot of the altar. The baily of Negropont, the chevalier de Broglia, and some others, on their arrival at the Notable City, refused, with no less bravery, the offer which the grand master made them of retiring to the convent till their wounds were healed, though dangerous, and worn out with fatigues and old age; but begged leave to live and die in the post of honour which their order intitled them to.

Accordingly it was a sight worth admiration to behold men of the first rank, grey with old age and service, wounded and maimed, some with crutches, others with their arms slung in scarfs, assisting in the lowest offices of the siege, carrying stones, earth, planks, powder, balls, and other useful materials, and crawling even upon the ramparts and breaches, to shew the enemy an intrepidity they were utter strangers to.

son of the grand master's experience and sagacity would have readily yielded to such pressing motives; nevertheless, though he acknowledged them all to be just, and that he could not but bewail the fate of those who were obliged to maintain so dangerous and destructive a post, yet he still asserted, that, upon such an exigence as this, it was better to hazard the loss of some of the members, than that of the whole body, assured as he was, that if the castle of St. Elmo was once yielded to the Turks, they must give up all hopes of receiving any farther assistance from Sicily, the viceroy of which had solemnly declared, that he would never hazard his master's fleet and forces in defence of the rest of the island, if that fort was once yielded to the enemy; so that the safety of the former wholly depended upon prolonging the siege of the latter, cost what it would to the order. The council having readily approved the grand master's advice, Madran was ordered to go back and acquaint them with their resolution, and their motives for it, and to exhort them, according to the duty of their profession, to defend the place to the very last. This answer was relished only by a small number of the oldest knights, who, to encourage the rest, publicly vowed to do so, or bury themselves under the ruins of it; but the far greater part of them put a much harsher construction upon the grand master's resolution, which they said was only agreed to by those, who, having no share in the danger, were the less concerned how lavish they were of other men's lives.

WHAT still increased the general discontent was, a mine which the Turks were pushing forward under the first parapet: upon which they dispatched a letter to the grand master, signed by no less than three hundred and fifty of the order, in which they boldly declared, that if he did not send them that very night a sufficient number of barges to convey them out of the fort, in which they were sure to be all butchered, they would unanimously sally out by the next morning on the enemy, and sacrifice their lives with their swords in their hands, as the most easy as well as honourable death. The grand master, though greatly surprized at the desperation of such a resolution, yet still aiming at gaining time, ordered forthwith three commissaries to pass over into the castle, under pretence of examining the condition it was in, and how long it might hold out, but in reality to expostulate with, and reduce them to their duty. Two of these, being men of sagacity and temper, endeavoured to dispel their fears, by representing the place in a condition to hold out some days longer; but the third, named Castriot, and said to be descended from the famed Castriot, better known by the name of Scanderbeg, a man full of martial zeal, instead of soothing advice, began to rate them for their pusillanimity, alleging, that there were still several means to be used to shelter them some time longer from the enemy's artillery, and ridiculed their fears of a mine in a place that was built upon a hard rock. This language, which cast a most affronting reflection on their want of skill and courage, so exasperated them, that they proposed the retaining him against his will, to display his superior parts, and to put his own lessons in practice in defence of the place. Some of them went so far as to secure the castle gates, to prevent his going away; which raised such a tumult in the garrison as might have been of the worst consequence, had not the commander Lamiranda caused the drums to beat to arms, and dispersed them to their respective posts.

AT their return, the other two commissaries gave it as their opinion, that the place could not hold out another assault; but Castriot, persisting still in his own, offered to go himself with a few recruits, and defend it till the succours arrived from Sicily; which the grand master readily agreed to, and the bishop of Malta furnished him with a sufficient sum to raise these recruits upon the islanders; not perhaps that they depended altogether upon his superior valour or conduct, but as they saw no other way left but that of prolonging the siege. However that be, the recruits were raised instantly, and many volunteers came and offered themselves to be enlisted, not only from the country, but even some of the principal citizens expressed a more than ordinary desire to follow him. The grand master, having bestowed the highest encomiums on them, and especially on their valiant leader, sent them into the castle, and withal gave him a letter to the officers of the garrison, written in harsher terms, ordering them to resign their posts to the new-comers, and to repair out of hand to the convent, where they would be in less danger of their lives, and himself in less fear about the place. Nothing could have been thought of more mortifying than this language, nor more expressive of the greatest contempt, than the ordering them to resign the defence of such an important place to a handful of new-raised recruits. They quickly felt such pungent tokens of shame and remorse, as made them resolve to sacrifice their lives, rather than abandon their posts; and instantly went and intreated the governor to intercede with the grand master to recall his orders and his new troops, and to assure him, that they would maintain their posts to the last drop of their blood, and endeavour, by the most intrepid bravery, to blot out the disgrace of their former behaviour. The governor was easily persuaded to dispatch an account of this to the grand master by an able diver, for it was not possible for boats to pass from one to the other without the utmost danger. The grand master made a shew of rejecting their

a their petition once and again with more than common scorn; but was at length prevailed upon to recall his recruits, and to entrust once more the defence of the place to them. They are pardoned.

ALL this while the commander, who, as we hinted above, had been dispatched to hasten the succours from Sicily, finding the viceroy still tardy, had ordered the grand master's nephew, together with the commander St. Aubyn, who had been sent thither on the same errand, and had each a galley under their command, to gather up what troops they could, and to sail with all speed for Malta. They did so; but, upon their arrival, found the coasts so strongly guarded all round by Dragut's galleys, that they were forced to return to Sicily, after having tried all means in vain to get to land either at the island of Gosa, or in some obscure creek of Malta. They were scarcely arrived at Saragossa, before they received fresh letters from the grand master, full of the most stinging reproaches to his nephew for his neglect and disobedience; and an intimation, that a man was unworthy of the order, unless he dared more than a common commander. Silvago was no less pressed in other letters, by the desperate condition of fort St. Elmo, to hasten the Sicilian succours; but had obtained hitherto nothing from the viceroy but pompous promises, and, when he now thought he had prevailed upon him to dispatch at least two of his galleys, with a regiment of soldiers, along with the other two which were waiting for them at Saragossa, he was again mortified by him through some new and shameful delays: so that every thing seemed to conspire against the relief of the place. The viceroy amuses them with delays.

WHILST the grand master and the rest of the order were waiting with the utmost impatience for the so long promised succours, they employed their thoughts and time in supplying the garrison of St. Elmo with all necessaries for sustaining the general assault they were in daily expectation of, and in inventing new means and stratagems to annoy the enemy. It was upon this occasion that some of their engineers found out a new kind of missile weapon, till then unknown, called fire-hoops or circles (N), which made the most dreadful havock among them. On the other hand, the besiegers were not idle in their camp, but continued battering and cannonading the fort from the 17th of June to the 14th of July, almost without intermission; every day produced some fresh attempt for assaulting the place, whilst every thing was preparing for a general attack; to facilitate which, the 15th day was taken up in battering the wall quite down to the very rock on which it stood.

d THE 16th was no sooner come, than the Turkish galleys came and ranged themselves before the castle, and fell to battering it with their whole artillery; whilst the batteries on the land side did the same with theirs, which consisted of thirty-six large pieces of cannon. The Turkish forces entered the ditch at the sound of their martial instruments, and, upon the signal given, mounted the breach with undaunted fury, whilst 4000 of their infantry kept firing against the place, to keep the besieged off the breach. This did not prevent their appearing upon it with their arms, and, with an intrepidity more threatening than a bulwark, both sides came to a close engagement; in which the assailants, being annoyed by the lighted hoops described in the last note, and great numbers set on fire by them, sent out such dismal cries as drowned the noise of all the large and small fire-arms both of the besiegers and besieged. Whilst this dreadful onset lasted, the captains of the Turkish galleys, observing that the main force of the garrison was run to the defence of the breach, endeavoured to assault it on another side. This being perceived by the grand master, a couple of large pieces were instantly pointed against them, which, at the first fire, destroyed twenty of them, and put the rest to flight. The Turks who had mounted the assault had no better success, the boldest of their janisaries being forced to abandon their posts at the sight of the fiery hoops that were continually thrown among them; so that, after a most obstinate contest, which had lasted near six hours, the basha was obliged to sound a retreat, after having lost near 2000 of his best forces. The besieged, on their side, lost seventeen of their knights, among whom were some of the highest rank and merit, besides about three hundred of their soldiers either killed or wounded. The general assault given. The Turks repulsed with loss.

f By this time Mustapha plainly perceived that all his efforts would prove abortive, unless he could wholly cut off the communication between the castle and borough, and thereby pre-

(N) These hoops, which were of a sufficient circumference to inclose two or three men, were made of wood, dipped first in spirits of wine, then soaked in oil or melted tallow; around which was fastened a quantity of hemp, wool, tow, or other such light stuff, deeply impregnated with pitch, tar, brimstone, saltpetre, and other such combustible matter.

These, being thoroughly set on fire, were then cast amidst the thickest of the enemy, sometimes inclosing two or three men at once, and set their cloaths on fire; so that they must be inevitably burned to death, unless they could instantly run into some water, and continue in it till the flame was totally quenched (8). This new invention stood the garrison in great stead when the general assault was given to it, as we shall see in the sequel.

(8) De his, vid. Baudouin, lib. xvii. c. 2, & seq. Vertot, lib. xii. tom. iv. p. 507, & seq. & al. mult.

vent the former from receiving any succour from the latter. We observed before, that this task had been reserved for the bey of Algiers and his troops; but, as they heard nothing about his coming, he was obliged to think of some other way. Whilst he was deliberating about it behind the trench, with his chief engineer and the famed Dragut, the latter marched out with his usual intrepidity to reconnoitre the ground. They had not followed him far before the engineer had his head shot off by a cannon-ball from the castle of St. Angelo, which, hitting afterwards against a stone, threw a piece of it against Dragut's right ear with such violence, that it threw him down flat and senseless on the ground, and set his nose, eyes, and ears, a streaming with blood. The basha, apprehensive lest his troops should be disheartened by the loss of this old and experienced commander, ordered a covering to be thrown over him, and had him conveyed into his tent; after which he came out unconcerned, as if nothing had happened, and stood on the very spot where Dragut had fallen, till he had descried a proper place where to fix a battery fit for his purpose.

THE fort being thus invested on all sides, and no possibility left to supply it with fresh troops, the grand master, who easily foresaw it could not hold out much longer, unless the Sicilian succours came time enough to force the enemy to raise the siege, had recourse again to the commander Longano, his resident in Sicily, who pressed the viceroy so close, not only by laying before him the desperate state St. Elmo was reduced to, and by reminding him of his frequently repeated assurances, but, what was still more cogent, informing him of the express orders he had received from the king his master to send all proper assistance to that island, he at length obtained the two long promised galleys, which had been detained till then upon several frivolous pretences, but which he now gave leave to sail with the other two, commanded by St. Aubyn and the grand master's nephew, directly for Malta. But the politic Garcia had taken care beforehand to give the command of them to one of his creatures, named Cardona, with express orders, that if St. Elmo was taken by the Turks, he should instantly sail homeward, without landing any forces on the island; so that this last succour proved of no use to the order, through the obsequiousness of its commander, who, under some pretence or other, only shewed himself at a distance, waiting till the loss of the fort should authorize his return to Sicily. In the mean while the grand master attempted more than once or twice to throw some fresh reinforcement into the place, there being still a great number of knights who expressed the most fervent desire to signalize themselves in its defence, or lose their lives in so glorious an attempt; but the avenues on all sides were so strongly guarded by the enemy, that all his efforts proved abortive; whilst the garrison in it, seeing nothing but death and destruction now before their eyes, unanimously agreed to sell their lives as dear as possible, and to maintain their ground to their very last breath.

THIS resolution they kept with the most surprising bravery. The basha, taking the advantage of their distress, ordered the general attack to be renewed, which continued, after the greatest obstinacy and resistance, till night put an end to it, the Turkish general being no less prodigal of his men's lives than the knights now were of their own; and a dreadful slaughter was made on both sides, without losing or gaining any ground. The besieged, who expected that it would be renewed the next morning, employed that short respite in dressing those that were wounded, and enabling all that could make their appearance either with sword, musket, or pike, to come the next morning on the breach, those that could not walk being carried to the place, and all resolutely bent to lose their lives upon it. We omit mentioning their other preparations of a religious nature, such as confession, receiving the sacrament, embracing, forgiving and praying for one another; all which were performed with that seriousness and solemnity suitable to their condition.

ON the next morning accordingly, being the 23d of July, the assault was renewed with fresh vigour, and a certainty of victory. The Turks found the sorrowful remains of the garrison ready to receive them with their usual obstinacy: the fire and attack lasted four hours, by which time the assailants, having gained the top of the cavalier, and other eminences that commanded the breach, could take their aim at pleasure, and chuse whom they had a mind to kill; by which means the garrison, now dwindled to about threescore, and part of them disabled, was soon reduced to nothing by their continual fire: so that the contest may justly be said to have ended with the death of the last surviving knight. The basha then entered the fort in a kind of triumph; but when he had viewed it, and came to consider the loss which so small a place had cost him, he could not forbear crying out, What must the father cost us, seeing this little son of his has destroyed us so many thousands of lives? And well might he, when, according to most writers, above 8000 of his best janisaries and spahis had perished before it; the thought of which raised his brutish fury to such a height, that he caused the breasts of several Christians that were expiring with their wounds to be ripped open, their hearts to be plucked out, and to be shot into the borough, whence the grand master could behold

- a behold all this horrid scene of inhumanity; he likewise caused their bodies to be split crosswise, on their backs and bellies, in derision to Christianity: some of these he caused to be hung up by their necks, hands, and feet, on the ramparts; others to be tied to planks covered with their under-garment, on which the cross of the order was fixed, and to be flung into the sea, in hopes that the tide would throw them against the foot of the castle of St. Angelo. In revenge of which barbarity, the grand master caused all the Turkish captives to be butchered, and their heads to be shot reeking hot from his artillery into the fort<sup>a</sup>. All this time the Turkish fleet was sailing into the Merza Muzetto in triumph, at the sound of their cannon, trumpets, and other martial instruments. Some of the officers went into Dragut's tent, to inform him of the taking of the fort, but found him quite speechless; yet not so far gone, but he gave some tokens of satisfaction, and expired immediately after. The order lost in this siege, which lasted just a month, about 1200 men, among which were 130 knights, and some of them of the highest rank and character. Among these were the noble commander Lamiranda, who offered himself a volunteer when the fort was reduced to great straits; the brave high baily of Negropont, who, old, lame, and decrepit as he was, caught an old halberd in his hand, and, mixing himself among the thickest of the janisaries, killed several of them, and fought till his head was struck off by one of their officer's sabres, who instantly caused it to be stuck on the head of a lance, and planted in full sight of the borough, where the grand master and the chief of the order stood on an eminence, and, with the utmost grief and consternation, beheld the horrid havock which the enemy made among them.
- b As soon as they were retired, the grand master called a council; in which having displayed some part of his eloquence in the eulogy he made upon those noble champions, his next task was to spend the remainder in exhorting the survivors to imitate their courage and intrepidity in their respective posts. He next ordered them not to make any more prisoners; but, after they had got what intelligence they could of the enemy's measures and designs, to massacre them instantly, to let the enemy as well as their own troops see that they must neither expect nor give quarter. Pursuant to this order, he refused to admit an officer of the bascha, who came with the white flag displayed to treat about a capitulation, though he suffered an old Christian slave, who came with him as his interpreter, to be brought into his presence; and
- c having caused him to pass through whole files of soldiers, and to be shewn the fortifications of the place, brought him to the ditch of the counterscarp, and dismissed him with these words: Go, and tell the bascha, that this is the only spot we design to yield to him, and which we purposely reserve for a burying-place for him and his janisaries. This message soon determined Mustapha to alter his measures, and, instead of negotiation, to open the trenches before the castle of St. Angelo, the borough, and the peninsula of Michael, since called Cita de la Sangle, where the hard rock would not permit them to raise a wall or intrenchment of dry stone. Whilst this was doing, his slaves were employed in dragging seventy pieces of his largest artillery, which he caused to be planted upon nine batteries, which were reared in so many different places. All this while Cardona, who commanded the four galleys from Sicily, had been sauntering out at sea, waiting only, as we lately hinted, for the taking of the fort, in order to return with them homewards. Happily for the besieged, the two gentlemen, who had been sent to enquire about it, officiously concealed the loss of it from him; but told him withal, that it would be quickly surrendered, if some speedy succour was not sent to prevent it. Cardona still hesitating, and willing to delay, the knights and secular gentlemen that were in his galley threatened him so hard, that he was obliged to land them at the bay of the Black Stone; which done, he instantly sailed back for Sicily. The grand master, apprised of their landing, sent them some guides, who conducted them privately to the Cala de la Scala, whence, by the help of a thick fog, they safely arrived at the borough, and were joyfully received by the grand master. This timely reinforcement consisted of about six hundred men, forty-
- d seven of whom were knights of the order, nineteen were Spanish officers of experienced valour and conduct, twelve were Italians, three Germans, and two Englishmen, who were all dispersed, at their own desire, into the most dangerous posts, together with the troops they had brought with them.

THE bascha had, by this time, taken such care to hem them in, that they had now no communication left but by the mouth of the grand port, which could not be stopped by any means but by his making himself master of the cape or point of land of the peninsula. This was at first deemed impracticable by the council, till the admiral proposed an expedient, which was immediately approved of, but was such an one as none of the besieged were aware of, or could have dreamed of, and would have been infallibly executed, had it not been providentially discovered to the grand master by one of the Turkish council, who, from a motive of religion, as well as a singular esteem for the order, hazarded his life to come and communicate it to him. This gentleman was named Lascaris, and had been taken prisoner by the Turks at the siege of Patras, and educated in the Turkish religion; and though born a Christian, had suffered his ambition to efface all the traces of his education till that very time. He had by degrees raised himself so high by his merit as to be one of the head officers of the spahis, and a member of the council of war; but the conduct and intrepid valour with which the Maltese knights had defended the fort of St. Elmo, having inspired him with an uncommon regard for that order, he could not hear such a destructive project agreed upon without feeling the most pungent sentiments of pity and concern for it.

ACCORDINGLY, as soon as the council was broke up, he made the best of his way towards the sea, over-against St. Michael's point, whence he made signs with his turban for a boat to bring him over. He was, however, discovered by some rambling Turks, who, guessing at his intentions, made all the haste they could to seize upon him. This obliged him, though a novice at it, to save his life by swimming; which being perceived by the Christians on the other side, they dispatched immediately four or five of their best swimmers to fetch him over, who came just time enough to save him from sinking. As soon as he was recovered, he desired to be conducted to the grand master, where he made a full discovery of the basha's and admiral's design, in order to deprive them of all further succours from abroad. We need not tell our readers how thankfully such an important advice was received by the grand master and council. He had a considerable pension immediately settled upon him, which, with all the other favours and marks of esteem and confidence, he was no less zealous to deserve, by the continual services he did to the order *.

THE grand master was not a little surprized at this signal generosity; for which he made him ample returns: but was much more so at the deep-laid project of the admiral, which, if not speedily prevented, would infallibly occasion the loss of the island. But his diligence was equal to the danger; and he made such speed to have not only that point of land, but several others of the like importance, defended by proper wood-works, towers, &c. that the basha was in the utmost surprize to see, as he expressed it, so many stacadoes sprung suddenly out of the earth, and which totally defeated the admiral's project. He tried at first to have them cut down by his Turks, whom he dispatched thither with axes in their girdles; but they had scarce begun their work before they were surrounded with a shoal of Maltese, who swam over to them naked with their swords in their mouths, and killed a good number of them, and put the rest to flight. They resumed the work on the next day, with the same ill success and loss: so that the basha, finding it impracticable, ordered his artillery to begin their fire against the place, from all his batteries, on the 25th of July.

Castle of St. Michael sadly battered.

THE castle of St. Angelo, in particular, was annoyed by the batteries which they had raised on the fort of St. Elmo; the borough and fort St. Michael were battered by those of mounts Coradin, Scerberas, Calcara, and other eminences; and the fire was so fierce on both sides, that the island appeared like a dreadful volcano. The besiegers had already demolished several of their outworks, and carried their trenches as far as the ditch of the castle and borough of St. Michael, which having no communication either with the great borough or castle of St. Angelo but by an unwieldy ferry-boat, could not, without the greatest difficulty and danger, receive succours from either, and, being the weakest part, was the most fiercely attacked. This obliged the besieged, by the advice of the young chevalier Bosio, brother to the historian often quoted in this chapter, to build a wooden bridge, supported by barrels and tuns duly poised between them, which proved of singular use in the sequel. The basha had likewise made two considerable breaches in the great borough; but was willing to put off the assault till the arrival of Hassan from Algiers, whom he expected with a large reinforcement of his choicest troops. He arrived accordingly a few days after, at the head of 2,500 stout veterans; and though but a young soldier in comparison of Mustapha, was vain enough to tell him, that if he had been there sooner, the small fort of St. Elmo had never held out half so long; and begged of him to have the honour of attacking that of St. Michael, which the old basha readily agreed to; and, giving him 6,000 of his men, promised to assist him by land.

Hassan undertakes the siege of St. Michael.

HASSAN being resolved to attack the peninsula La Sangle both by sea and land, dispatched an old Greek renegado, named Candelissa, who had served his piratic apprenticeship under Barbarossa, with a good number of his galleys, and half of his Algerine forces and slaves, to * BAUDOIN, lib. xvii. c. 8. VERTOT, lib. xiii. tom. v. p. 13, & seq.

- a break their way through the Scerberas and Port Muxetto into the grand port, in order to make himself master of the stacado, which the Turks had attempted in vain, and to break the chain and palisado of the port, in order to convey his men by land to that peninsula. The brave Guimerano, often mentioned, who commanded that point of land, and had raised a battery of six guns upon it, let their vessels approach till they were within shot, and made so good a fire with his cannon and musquetry, that he sunk several of them, and killed about 400 of his Turks with that single discharge. Candelissa, not at all dismayed, landed at the head of his men, and had gained the shore, when a second shot of two guns, loaded with cartridge, and kept in reserve for him, were discharged, destroyed a good number of them, and put the rest to flight; whilst he, to prevent their getting to sea again, made a signal to his barks
- b to remove farther off: so that now they were obliged to fight or die. The Algerine troops returned to the attack, which proved an obstinate one of five hours; at the end of which they gained the post, and planted seven of their standards upon it. They did not keep it long before the few Maltese that were left came back, with admiral Monti at their head, and renewed the fight with fresh fury, and, being presently after reinforced by a fresh detachment sent by the grand master, drove them away with great loss, Candelissa being one of the foremost and swiftest in the flight. The Algerines, however, notwithstanding their leader's cowardice, maintained their ground, and retired fighting till they got to their vessels, though many were slain in the retreat. They fared still worse at sea, where their vessels were overwhelmed, and a great number of them sunk, by the fire of the adjacent batteries; whilst those that strove
- c to swim to the shore begged for quarter in the most suppliant posture, and were instantly cut in pieces, without any other answer than that it was St. Elmo's pay. The port was soon after seen covered with dead bodies, some whole, others mangled, heads, arms, legs, &c. swimming amongst them: so that of 4000 men which sailed out on that expedition, scarcely 500 got off safe. The Christians likewise lost, besides a great number of their men, above 100 knights, gentlemen volunteers, and other persons of distinction, and amongst them the young chevalier de Toledo, son to the viceroy of Sicily. What was still worse, those that were wounded were obliged to stay and be dressed in their posts, there being no possibility to get them conveyed to the infirmary, without running a greater danger from the enemy.
- d HASSAN, on the other hand, had battered the castle and borough of St. Michael with such success, whilst his Algerines advanced their trenches almost close to the fosse, that some of his standards soon appeared upon several parts of the parapet. These, however, met with such a hot reception from the batteries of the besieged, loaded with cartridge, and fired through the thickest of them, as cut vast numbers of them in pieces, and obliged the rest to file off by the parapet to another breach which they thought less defended. Here they met at first with better success, through some accident that happened within the retrenchment, which caused the loss of some brave knights who defended it: but these being immediately succeeded by a fresh supply, the contest was renewed with great vigour, till Hassan, unable to stand it out longer, was obliged to sound a retreat. They were no sooner retired, than Mustapha, who
- e despaired of succeeding by any other means than by tiring out the besieged, immediately supplied their place with some of his best forces; so that the knights, fatigued as they were already both with fighting and the heat of the dog-days, were forced to return to their arms before they had had leisure to refresh themselves; notwithstanding which, they had no sooner exchanged fire with the janisaries, than they attacked them sword in hand. The fury and slaughter was equal on both sides for a long while, till the soldiers, seeing some of their best commanders fall, gathered up multitudes of the inhabitants, men, women, and children, to their assistance, who plied them with such volleys of stones and fiery hoops, as obliged them to retreat, in spite of all the bascha could do to prevent it. The Maltese, however, lost above 200 of their soldiers, and 40 of their knights and best commanders. That of the Turks
- f was still vastly more considerable, as those were some of their best troops, and such as were reserved for the most arduous and dangerous enterprizes.
- THIS disaster obliged him to cause such another wooden bridge to be reared as he had done at fort St. Elmo, which the grand master, who knew the consequence of it, was not less solicitous to have destroyed; and, as he found it impracticable in the night, by reason of the strong guard set over it, he resolved to do it by day-light, and appointed his own nephew to conduct that dangerous enterprize. He accordingly went at head of a strong detachment, and tried in vain, by the help of cable and other ropes, to have pulled away the supporters from under it; but found himself at once overwhelmed with volleys of small-shot from the enemy, which killed a great part of his men, and put the rest to flight, leaving him and another knight, named Polastron, exposed to their fire, which quickly dispatched them both. The Turks immediately advanced to carry their heads to the bascha, who had fixed a reward upon every knight's head that was brought to him; but their men, ashamed to have thus basely abandoned them, came back with double fury, and, after a fierce and bloody struggle, <sup>a</sup> carried off their bodies unmaimed. The grand master bore the death of his young nephew with a peculiar unconcern, telling those who condoled him upon it, that every knight was as dear to him as he was; and adding, that, unless some speedy succour arrived from Sicily, they had no other refuge left than that of burying themselves, every one like him, under the ruins of the place. Being still resolved to demolish the bridge by any means, he caused a hole to be dug through the wall, on the same level with it; and having planted a large cannon in it, the first shot was lucky enough to shake the whole fabric, and a few more brought it nearer to the ground, when they set it on fire the following night, and reduced it to ashes.

THE basha, impatient and fearful of the sultan's anger at his ill success, called a council of <sup>b</sup> war, in which it was resolved, that he and the Algerine bey should pursue the siege as usual, whilst the admiral Pbiali, with his marines, began that of the great borough and of the castle of St. Angelo, and Candelissa scoured the sea with eighty stout gallies. Both the basha and admiral plied all their batteries with such fury, that the borough and castle of St. Michael were almost destroyed, and the great one had received some considerable breaches, especially at the quarters of Castile and Auvergne. They continued demolishing the fortifications with their constant fire, and harrassing the besieged with their daily assaults and skirmishes. Numbers of them were killed every day by those unintermitted hostilities, and the garrisons became daily weaker and thinner.

forced to sound

THE basha, encouraged by their visible decay, ventured to make a fresh and furious assault <sup>c</sup> on the fort and town of St. Michael, on the 2d of August, in which the Turks and Algerines, animated with the hopes of a rich plunder, mounted the breaches like desperadoes, and stood the fire and missile weapons of the Christians with such unshaken obstinacy, as gave the Maltese knights an opportunity of making a dreadful havock of them during the space of six hours, till Mustapha thought fit to sound a retreat, to save the rest. He did not renew it till five days after, when he ordered it to be made in several places, in order to oblige the Christians to divide their forces, whilst himself attacked the fort of St. Michael afresh, and, if possible, with redoubled fury, and a greater number of his best troops. The janisaries, who marched at the head of them, were almost all cut off by the besieged before they reached the ditch; so that the rest were obliged to trample over their bodies to gain the breach, where they met <sup>d</sup> with such fierce opposition, that the place became one continued scene of blood and slaughter during the space of four hours more, the Turks obstinately striving to maintain their posts, and the knights as furiously employed in dislodging them.

and children
annoy the as-

IN this obstinate contest the Maltese had the advantage to see themselves assisted by their <sup>e</sup> very women and children, who came with an intrepid bravery to supply them, some with arms and ammunition, others with wine, fruits, and other refreshments; whilst others, more robust, kept pelting the enemy with stones, fire-works, melted pitch, and other destructive missiles. The Turks made no difference between them and the soldiers, but massacred as many of those viragoes as they could come at. The dismal outcries of the wounded of both sides and sexes, of the pursuers and fugitives, and especially their reciprocal fire, made the place appear a scene of most dreadful horror; whilst the basha stood at the foot of the breach with his sword drawn, ready to cleave into two all that gave way. The grand master and his officers beheld all this from an eminence, and expected every moment to hear the enemy's shouts of victory, when, to their great surprise, they heard their drums beat a retreat, by the order of the basha.

THIS sudden turn was, it seems, owing to a detachment of horse, which was sent from the Notable City by the commander Mosquita, the governor of it, to St. Michael's fort. They were commanded by two brave chevaliers of the order, and each trooper carried a foot-soldier behind him. They met on their way a Turkish lodgment, where the basha had sent all his wounded, which were in great number, but whose guard was scattered about. He ordered <sup>f</sup> their men to dismount, and cut in pieces all the sick and wounded; whose grievous outcries soon reached the Turkish camp, where the fugitives brought the alarming news, that the Sicilian forces were landed, with a full resolution to engage the besiegers, and oblige them to raise the siege. The panic spread itself quite to the scene of action, and caused such a confusion among the combatants, that the basha was once more obliged to sound a retreat. He was soon after apprised of the occasion of this false report; at which he was so ashamed, that he would have renewed the attack with greater fury, had not his officers put him in mind of the approaching night, which, we may well imagine, proved a very uneasy one to him.

The place undermined.

AMONG other destructive ways that were used in a siege, Mustapha had not forgot that <sup>g</sup> which makes the most dreadful havock. His mines had been carried on with such success, in spite of all the grand master's vigilance to discover them, that the besieged looked upon themselves a themselves as situated between two fires, and had not one spot of ground where they could think themselves safe. The grand master, under all these difficulties, had once more recourse to the viceroy of Sicily, and gave his minister such a lively representation of the distress and danger they were reduced to, that he obliged him at length to send him a powerful succour, as we shall see in its proper place.

In the mean time Mustapha and Pbiali, ashamed of so many repulses from so small a force, A fresh attack. unanimously resolved either to make themselves masters of the place, or to bury themselves in the trenches; and renewed the attack on the 18th of August, beginning it just in the heat of the day, when the besieged were, as they supposed, taking some refreshment. Accordingly, about twelve of the clock, the former began with such a furious discharge on his side, b as almost ruined the remainder of the fortifications of St. Michael, and, with his best troops, newly animated with threats and promises, mounted the assault. The slaughter was terrible on both sides; a good number of knights lost their lives, but were quickly succeeded by fresh ones: so that, after an obstinate conflict of six hours, the enemy was at length so powerfully repulsed, that the basha was again constrained to sound a retreat, and leave a vast number of his men, either dead or wounded, on the field of battle.

THE admiral Pbiali, on the other hand, did not appear on his attack till that on St. Michael was at the height, in hopes that the grand master would send a good part of his forces to its relief; after which he began his part with springing a mine where the besieged least expected it, and which occasioned such havock and confusion, that he must of course have carried the c place, had the knights been less watchful and intrepid than they were. But as the grand master had taken care to leave no place unguarded, there appeared, immediately after blowing of the mine, a sufficient number to oppose themselves to the assailants, who, on their part, used such surprising diligence, that they had already planted several of their ensigns on the parapet. The grand master, apprised of the bloody contest that ensued, instead of sending them a fresh supply, as they had desired from him, staid only to clap an old helmet on his head, and, taking a pike in his hand, ran at the head of his fresh detachment, and exposed himself foremost in the fight. He was immediately surrounded by a number of his knights, who begged him, in the most moving terms, not to hazard with his life the loss of the island, and of all its inhabitants. But he, with his usual sternness, refused to listen to their intreaties. d How can I, said he, stand idle here, and see so many of those Turkish standards displayed upon the ramparts? Or where can I, at the age of above seventy, die more honourably than upon this spot, and among my brethren? These words had such an effect upon them, that they all ran eagerly towards the enemy, and left not off fighting till they had got every standard down, and repulsed the enemy to their trenches. The Turks driven back to their trenches.

THIS did not hinder the assault being renewed the very next morning; in which the Turkish basha did not a little depend upon a new destructive machine, invented by one of his engineers. It was a barrel, of more than common size and length, strongly braced with iron hoops, and filled with gunpowder, shot, chains, nails, and other iron fragments, which was to be thrown with a lighted match amongst the thickest of the knights who defended a e ravelin, and which they threw amongst them; but those intrepid warriors ran to it at all adventures time enough to tumble it back upon them before it had taken fire. It sprang up accordingly, with a surprising explosion, among those that were mounting the breach in thick crowds. Immediately after which a vast number of heads, arms, legs, whole and half bodies, were blown up into the air; which so terrified the rest, that they betook themselves to flight in the utmost hurry and confusion: of which the Maltese taking the advantage, they pursued them to their very trenches, and made a terrible slaughter among those fugitives.

THE admiral Pbiali, on his part, attacked the bulwark of Castile with equal fury, and with no less stout resistance. The grand master was there, assisting and encouraging his f forces, till he received a wound in his leg, by the bursting of a hand-grenado, which he took care to conceal whilst the heat of the onset lasted, that is, till his men, who, animated by his presence, fought with the utmost bravery, had regained the parapet, and drove the Turks away with great loss. We should become quite tedious to our readers, were we to go on with a journal of the siege, during which every day would only entertain them with new assaults and new losses on both sides. At length the Christians were terribly weakened, and the fortifications of the town and castle of St. Michael so utterly destroyed, that the commanding officers thought fit to propose the blowing them up, after they had removed all their sick and wounded, together with the arms, ammunition, &c. into the great borough and the castle of St. Angelo; but this the grand master rejected with the utmost scorn, alleging, that the abandoning of the one could not be otherwise followed but by the loss of the other. His intrepidity was such that he would not so much as listen to a fresh proposal they made to him, viz. to remove at least all the plate and sacred utensils belonging to the church, g as well as his own person, into the castle of St. Angelo, lest that should encourage the enemy, <sup>a</sup> and dispirit his own men. This, said he in a resolute tone, this is the spot, my dear brethren, where we must either all die, or bravely repel the enemy. And to shew how much he was in earnest, he only left as many of the garrison in that castle as were necessary to attend the artillery, and dispersed the rest into other posts that wanted to be reinforced. There was still one thing which gave him some uneasiness, viz. the cavalier which Phiali had reared against the wall of the borough, on which that admiral had left a small garrison; but, on that very night, a hole was made, with as little noise as possible, through the wall, at which some Spanish knights sallying out, easily gained the height of the work, whence, with their noise and weapons, they easily drove the guard; upon which they immediately raised a parapet, and mounted some cannon upon it, and plied it against the enemy. <sup>b</sup>

MUSTAPHA, by this time, rightly concluded, that nothing less than famine could ever reduce those intrepid warriors; but whilst he was deliberating about the means of doing it, he had the mortification to find that he was in much greater danger of it than they; his own provisions being nearly exhausted, and a vessel which was bringing him a fresh supply of corn having been taken by some Sicilian galleys. This obliged him to alter his measures, and to try his fortune against the Notable City, which, being situated nearer to the center of the island, he was told was neither well fortified nor strongly garrisoned: so that if he could but once make himself master of it, he flattered himself he should find in it not only plenty of provisions, but an immense plunder, and make such a vast number of slaves as should at least help to conceal the disgrace of his ill success, and the loss of so considerable a part of <sup>c</sup> his army. Flushed with this expectation, he began his march thitherward on the first day of September, at the head of 4000 of his best janisaries and spahis. By this time the governor Mesquita was so well prepared, that, upon the arrival of the Turkish engineers, who were sent to reconnoitre the place, they found the ramparts, bastions, and other works around it, covered with cannon, musquets, pikes, standards, and a numerous garrison in arms; not only the citizens and countrymen, but even the women themselves, appearing armed cap-à-piè in soldiers cloaths. This gallant show was accompanied with a fierce discharge of the artillery; which so terrified the engineers, that they went and represented the attacking of the place as impracticable by any other method than by a regular siege. The basha, who hoped to have carried it by scalade, without dreaming of a siege, for which he had not a sufficient <sup>d</sup> force left, and was in continual dread of being surprised by the forces that were expected from Sicily, was glad to return to his camp, though without knowing which way to turn himself in this dangerous situation. His last refuge was in a wooden tower, which his engineers contrived, of sufficient height to overlook the whole place. This being wheeled close to the wall, by a well-contrived mechanism within, could, after every discharge, sink itself below the parapet of the wall, and be covered by it from the fire of the besieged. The machine had already done some dreadful execution, and was likely to have done a great deal more, when an expert engineer of the island bethought himself of making an embrasure through the wall; by the help of which he took advantage, when it was raised to its height, to fire a cannon into the heart of it, which broke it all in pieces, and crushed the soldiers <sup>e</sup> that were in it under its ruins. This last resource having failed him, he had once more recourse to his old way of mining; but met with no better success, from the indefatigable industry of the Maltese, who did not suffer one of them to take effect; the disappointment of which reduced him to the utmost despair.

By this time the grand master received the agreeable news, that the Sicilian fleet had set sail on the first of September, commanded by the viceroy, in which were a great number of the knights of the order, and other volunteers, who had waited impatiently at Messina a considerable time for this opportunity of embarking for the defence of the island. He had besides about 8000 brave veteran troops with him, with which he gave out that he designed to attack the Turkish fleet. They set sail accordingly from Syracuse, with the discharge of the <sup>f</sup> whole artillery, and the shouts of the fleet; but being parted by a storm, were not rejoined till the fourth day, on which they weighed anchor again from the island of Linosfa. Here Don Garcia received a fresh letter from the grand master, acquainting him, that if he made towards the coast of Mugiaro, on the flats of Melecca, he would find a sure and safe landing; instead of which he sailed directly for the island of Gofa, though without entering into the chanel; which made every one suspect that his design was not to land, but to shew himself at a distance to the enemy, till he could find some pretence of returning back into Sicily, as he accordingly did, upon his vanguard being parted soon after by a storm.

THE indignation and resentment of the fleet is hardly to be expressed; it was attended with such bitter reflections, and even with such curses, that he was obliged to call a fresh council <sup>g</sup> of war, to advise whether they should attempt the succouring of Malta. One may easily imagine what answer the knights and brave volunteers gave to the question; but they were a were agreeably surpris'd with the loud murmurs of the army and soldiery against him. What was still worse, his shameful return had caused such a desertion by that time, that the army was reduced from 8000 to 6000 men ; all which obliged him to sail again : so that, the wind favouring, they arriv'd about evening in the chanel of Gofa, where they cast anchor for that night, the viceroy not permitting them to land till the next morning, when himself came on shore, and took a review of them. They immediately took the road towards the Notable City, whilst he reimbarked for Sicily, though not without a previous promise of bringing 4000 men more, which he expected from Italy.

b THIS reinforcement, which, as we hinted above, consisted, besides the 6000 veterans and above 100 knights of the order, of a very great number of volunteers, of the greatest families in France, Italy, Spain, and other parts of Europe, all burning with impatience of signalizing themselves in defence of an order, which had been, for above three centuries, the greatest bulwark of Christendom, met with less obstruction in their march towards the besieged, as Mustapha had all along expected that the viceroy designed to engage him at sea, in order to convey the more easily his succours to them, and had bent all his thoughts in securing the entrance of the great port by a strong chain and stout barricade, and had kept, for several days, his whole fleet at anchor at the mouth of the port ; so that the news of The siege raised their landing at an opposite part of the island so disconcerted him, that, without staying to inform himself about their number or strength, he forthwith raised the siege, withdrew his garrison out of fort St. Elmo, and embarked with such precipitation as came little short of a downright flight. He left the greatest part of his large artillery behind, that they might c the sooner get to their vessels ; where he was scarcely arriv'd, when a deserter came and informed him, that this new succour, which had put an army of 20,000 men into such a consternation, consisted of no more than 6000 men, half naked, harrassed with the sea, and without a commander. This advice, however, came too late for them to go back and recover their trenches and posts, which the grand master had taken care to have destroyed as soon as they had left the island.

d MUSTAPHA, covered with shame, and in the greatest dread of the sultan's resentment, Return to the island called a council of war, in which it was resolv'd to return into Maltha, and attack this new succour before they had time to refresh, and dispose themselves in a posture of defence ; whilst the bey of Algiers, with his gallies, and 1600 of his men, secured their retreat in the Ula or bay of St. Paul. The greatest difficulty was to prevail upon the soldiers to land, who loudly complain'd of his cruelty, that, after the fatigues and dangers they had undergone, they should now again be led like so many sheep to the slaughter. On the other hand, there was no less a struggle among the commanders of the newly-arriv'd succours how to act against them. Ascanio, their field-marshal, who had caused them to intrench themselves on an eminence, propos'd waiting for the enemy on that spot : but the commander Alvarez de Sando, a person of great experience and sway, boldly declared, that they were not come thither to be inactive, and hazard nothing, but to go and resolutely meet the enemy, and by that means prevent the disgrace of seeing them masters of some of the places they had e abandoned by a fresh and desperate attack. His advice was approv'd of, if not as the safest, yet as the bravest and most glorious ; and the far greater part declared, that, rather than stay in their intrenchments, they would, at all hazards, break their way even through the enemy's army, and throw themselves into any place they should chance to besiege.

f ACCORDING to this resolution they march'd down the hill, with de Sando at their head, attacked the enemy in front, whilst Vitelli did the same in flank ; but the Turks, who were brought back by main force, whether out of resentment, or on account of the excessive heat, could hardly be prevail'd upon to stand in their own defence, and, after the first firing, betook themselves to flight. Mustapha, now in the greatest danger of being taken by the Maltese, made such haste after those fugitives, that his horse stumbled under him more than once or twice, and he must needs have fallen into the hands of his pursuers, had not some of his bravest officers sav'd him, at the hazard of their own lives. The Christians all this while were so eager in their pursuit after them, that they even threw away their armour, and expos'd themselves to the most imminent danger of being cut off by the fire of the Algerine bey, who lay conceal'd behind a high rock, to secure the Turks retreat ; inasmuch that some of them lost their lives, and among them several of their chief commanders. The slaughter might have prov'd still greater, had not the brave de Sando come to their assistance with some fresh battalions, repuls'd the Algerines, and recover'd the prisoners they had made : and now it was that a new and strange fight began. The Turkish fugitives, g without offering to make any defence against their pursuers, thought of nothing but gaining their ships, under the fire Phiali and Hassan kept up against the Christians. This did not hinder their pursuing them with sword and musket in the water, above their girdles, to their very very boats, and killing vast numbers of them before they could gain their ships. The number of men which the basha lost, from the beginning of the siege to this last embarkation, is said to have amounted to 30,000; the rest, with the greatest difficulty and danger, got into their vessels; after which the fleet sailed away for the Levant. We are told, that the viceroy of Sicily saw them in full sail from the top of the castle of Syracuse, by which he concluded, without any farther intelligence, that the siege was raised. We shall follow them no farther, nor enter into a detail of the reception they met with at the Porte. What concerns our Maltese history is, that the sultan, having trampled under his feet the letter which brought him the first news of his ill success, cried out in a fury, that nothing proved successful to him, unless where he was present; and that he was resolved the next year to command his armament in person, and to destroy and exterminate the whole order of Malta out of that island <sup>a</sup>.

Thus happily ended this so celebrated though bloody siege, of which we have ventured no farther than to give our readers some of the most material and interesting transactions; though it might have required as many pages as we have given it lines to have gone through all the remarkable occurrences that accompanied it from the beginning to the end: it would take up a whole volume barely to do justice to the merit of the grand master, and those brave commanders who signalized themselves in it, either by the wisdom of their councils, their extraordinary conduct, or intrepid bravery, upon the most desperate enterprises, and in the face of death, armed with all its martial terrors; we hope the account we have given of their gallant and resolute behaviour at the castle of St. Elmo will suffice. <sup>c</sup>

As soon as the enemy was sailed out of sight, one of the principal cares of the grand master was, to pay his respects and sincere congratulations and acknowledgements to those noble commanders and captains who had so generously interested and hazarded themselves in the defence of the island, and to distribute some largesses among the inferior officers and soldiers. Several days were spent in feasting them, and in other kind of rejoicings suitable to the occasion; which were, however, very much damped at the sight of the dreadful dilapidations that every-where presented themselves before their eyes; together with the rueful and dismal aspect, and neglected dress, not only of the inhabitants and soldiers, but even of the highest officers of the order, through such a long series of dangers and uninterrupted alarms and fatigues, but still more so upon the retrospect of the many lives that had been lost during that time. The order had no less than 260 of their knights slain at different assaults, and they reckoned above 8000 more among the inhabitants and soldiers who had undergone the same fate; insomuch that there were scarcely 600 left alive in the great borough and castle of St. Angelo when the Turks sailed away, and a good part of them wounded, maimed, or worn out with hard service, who all became the objects of the grand master's tenderness and care. But his generosity displayed itself most in the valuable presents which he made to those brave officers, and gratuities to their soldiers, upon their return into Sicily, notwithstanding the public treasury's being so greatly exhausted. <sup>d</sup>

to the grand
master.

THE encomiums and congratulations he received from most princes of Europe, on his excellent conduct and intrepid valour in defence of the island, were no small addition to his glory. Among the rest, Philip II. king of Spain sent him a sword, with a handle of massive gold, enriched with various diamonds, and accompanied with a compliment, that he looked upon him as the greatest captain of the age, and desired him to make use of that weapon in defence of Christianity. Pope Pius IV. did no less signalize himself in the extraordinary honours he paid to him upon this occasion, not only in ordering the news of Malta's deliverance to be published in his capital, by the discharge of its artillery, but, what was still more extraordinary, by presenting him with a cardinal's hat, which however, whether out of modesty, or a right notion that his dignity, as sovereign, could receive no addition from that, he civilly declined. <sup>e</sup>

BUT neither these extraordinary honours and commendations, nor the vast rejoicings which were made in most Christian courts, could assuage his regret for the irreparable loss of so many brave and generous lives, and the miserable state the island and order were reduced to, the greatest part of its fortifications destroyed, and the houses not only in the city and towns, but also the villages, mostly levelled to the ground; the inhabitants dwindled to a small number, and those reduced to extreme poverty and misery; a great part of the artillery either burst or spoiled, and unfit for use; the provisions almost consumed, and the treasury nearly exhausted; to say nothing of his just apprehensions of the enemy's returning with a larger force, before half of these disasters could be repaired. He was actually informed by his spies, that Soliman II. kept a prodigious number of hands continually at work in his <sup>f</sup>

a arsenal, in order to fit out a fleet; to put himself at the head of, against that island. It was this gave him the greatest uneasiness, from which he found no relief, till he got it set on fire, and burnt to the ground, in consequence of which that monarch saw himself obliged to put off his enterprize for another year; so that having now nothing to fear from that prince for a while, he set himself about repairing the devastations which the siege had occasioned, and, by the assistance of the European princes, not only restored the island to its pristine strength and splendor, but raised it to a much greater degree of them than ever.

ONE of his first cares, after the works were repaired, was, to enlarge the fort of St. Elmo, which was as it were the chief key of the great and little ports; and to add some new works to it. But his greatest design was that of building a city on the inside of the same peninsula, and to fortify it on all sides with all the works that the military art could suggest; and afterwards to remove the convent, or grand residence of the order, thither, as being a spot much safer than the great borough, which is commanded by rocks and eminences almost on every side. This was a noble design, and worthy of so great a personage; but, in the condition the order was in, it required the assistance of all the Christian princes, which his great merit and address easily obtained; and, as soon as he had secured that main point, he immediately set about procuring the best engineers, workmen; and all proper materials, from Italy; all which was done with such diligence, that he was enabled to lay the first stone of this new city on the 28th day of the month of March of the year following.

THIS ceremony, which was performed with great solemnity, was no sooner over; than all hands were cheerfully employed in the work, according to their stations and capacities; knights, commanders, officers, soldiers, citizens, and country-people, all assisted in their turns, according to their respective provinces; whilst their galleys were employed, some in fetching all necessary materials and provisions, and others in cruising and getting rich prizes, which proved a kind of constant fund towards defraying the expences of the work. The grand master himself, attended with his engineers, scarcely missed a day of visiting and directing the works and workmen; and, when the great number of them had so far exhausted the common purse, that he found it difficult to pay them with the usual regularity, he caused a new copper coin, of different weight and value, to be stamped, with this legend, Non æs, sed fides, Not the intrinsic value of the metal, but the honour of the sovereign; which money passed current through the island, and was recalled as often as the remittances came from abroad, by which means the workmen never went unpaid, nor the work intermitted.

WHILST he was thus agreeably employed, a double disaster happened in the island, and even under his nose, which gave him a sensible displeasure. The one was caused by some young Spanish libertines, knights of the order, who, in the midst of their jollity and carousings, indulged themselves with singing such songs as highly reflected not only upon some of the principal persons of the order, but upon some of the best ladies of the island. These songs or libels became in a little time so public, that a complaint was made to him of it, who immediately caused the offenders to be seized, and tried before the council, in which he himself presided. But whilst the high chancellor was writing down the sentence pronounced against them, these hot-headed youths broke into the assembly, snatched the pen out of his hand, threw the standish out of the window, and, by the assistance of their friends and accomplices, made their escape in some light vessels, and landed in Sicily. The grand master, justly incensed at such unprecedented insolence, tried all means in his power to have them apprehended, in vain; however, he condemned them to be degraded from the order, and imprisoned for life, whenever they should be caught; but they took care to keep themselves out of his reach as long as he lived, in hopes that his successor would prove less severe and tenacious of the ancient discipline.

THE other was equally shocking and disrespectful to him; it was no less than the murder of a god-daughter of his, a young Rhodian gentlewoman, who, after the loss of that island, had attached herself to the family of the late Villegagnon. She had been since married to a Florentine, named Bonacorsi, then settled at Malta, who, in a fit of rage and jealousy, plunged his dagger into her heart, and, by the assistance of his countrymen, some of whom were knights of the order, made his escape into Italy, where he was out of danger of being prosecuted for his crime. These two indignities offered to his authority, so derogatory to the honour of the order, and opposite to its ancient discipline, failed not to affect him in the most sensible manner, and to make him apprehend, that they would quickly terminate, after his death, in a total neglect and contempt of it. This made him look out betimes for a fit successor, whose courage and zeal might put an effectual stop to the licentiousness which had gradually crept into the order since the defeat of the Turks, and whom he might recommend to the electors before his death, which he was sensible could not be very far off.

BUT what most deeply affected him, and contributed most to the shortening of his small scantling of life, was, the mortifying usage which he and his ambassador Cambiani received the death of

master.

about this time from pope Pius V. who had lately succeeded Pius IV. That new pontif a having, after the example of his predecessor, and other European princes, sent him a congratulatory brief on his success against the infidels, and in it expressed a desire to gratify his extraordinary merit by some signal favours, La Valetta, after his usual thanks, only begged of his holiness that he would restore to the order their antient privilege of nomination to the grand priory of Rome, which some of his predecessors had assumed to themselves, in open violation of their right : a demand so just in itself, and so disinterested with regard to his own part, he flattered himself would hardly be denied him, especially at this juncture. The pope accordingly sent him a new brief, in which he assured him, that, after the demise of the present incumbent, that privilege should be fully restored to the order ; notwithstanding which solemn promise, the incumbent was no sooner dead, than he bestowed the priory upon his b nephew, cardinal Alexandrino, and even without subjecting him, as the other priors had been before, to pay the proper responsions and arrears into the treasury of the order.

THE grand master was soon apprised of this double injustice by his ambassador, by whom he sent a letter to the pontif, full of the warmest expostulations and complaints ; and in which he plainly told his holiness, that if the cardinals of every nation should once seize upon the most considerable preferments that belonged to the order, there would soon be an end of their funds, and consequently of all their future efforts to defend the Italian coasts, and carry on the war against the infidels. The pope, who could not but feel the strength of his arguments, appeared, however, no less displeased at some pretended disrespectful expressions in the stile. Cambiani, on the other hand, not being able to obtain any redress, took the liberty c to disperse some copies of the grand master's letter ; which so affronted the pontif, that he sent to forbid him to come any more into his presence ; upon which, being apprehensive of the displeasure of the grand master, he returned no more to Malta, but retired to his own patri-mony in Piedmont.

Falls into a deep melancholy.

FROM this time La Valetta fell into a deep melancholy ; to divert which, he was advised to be often on horseback, and to divert himself with shooting. He rode accordingly on July 19, to a plain near the Cala of St. Paul, to shoot some partridges, attended with his usual retinue, when he found himself on a sudden so affected with the heat of the sun, that he was brought back in a violent fever, which obliged him to take to his bed. During his sickness he received d an express, sent on purpose from the viceroy of Sicily, to advise him to be upon his guard against a fresh attempt from the Turks ; the surprize of which seized so much upon his spirits, that, being no longer able to attend upon public affairs, he was obliged to commit the care of them to the lords of the council. After this, he minded little else except preparing himself for another life, saving that he earnestly recommended the grand prior of Castile, Andrew de Toledo, to the council of electors, as a most fit person to succeed him : he likewise begged leave to dispose of 50 slaves, which were his own property, and of 12,000 livres out of his private purse ; part of which sum he bestowed upon the endowing of a chapel which he had caused to be built in his new city of La Valetta, in which he designed to be interred, and the rest he distributed among his domestics. He died on the 21st of August, and e was deposited in the church of Our Lady of Philermo, till the chapel above-mentioned, which is that of Our Lady de Vittoria, in the new city, could be ready to receive his remains, whither they were soon after conveyed with great pomp and ceremony.

ON the next day the electors met to make choice of a successor. Among the several candidates that laid claim to the dignity, it was supposed that the earnest recommendation of the late grand master would have secured it to the grand prior of Castile, lately mentioned ; but his high descent from the house of Alba, which it was thought would give a sanction to his known rigid adherence to the strict discipline of the order, proved at this juncture a powerful obstacle to his election, which fell upon Peter de Monte, grand prior of Capua, by the cabals and interest of the two knights of Maldonat and La Motte. His surname was Guidatoti, but, f being grand nephew by the female side of pope Julius III. who was of the family of de Monte, he took it upon him as the most honourable of the two, after having given it a new lustre by his gallant behaviour in defence of the castle of St. Michael, at the late siege of Malta.

48. Peter de Monte.

The funeral pomp of the late grand
master.

HIS first care, after his election, was, to order the funeral obsequies of his predecessor to be performed, with a solemnity and magnificence answerable to his great character and merit ; which having something singular in them, beyond what was usually practised on such occasions before, we shall close this section with an account of what was most remarkable in that mournful ceremony. We have already observed, that his remains were deposited in the great church of Philermo, till the chapel which he had caused to be built at his own charge, viz. that of Our Lady of Victory, was finished ; at which time his coffin, with all its proper insignia, was g embarked in the great caracca, in order to be conveyed thither. The ship was without masts or rigging, and covered over with black cloth, which came down on all sides to the water, and

a and was adorned with coats of arms and trophies, and with the standard which had been taken from the Turks. Instead of sails or rowers, it was towed by two other galleys adorned in the same manner, and was followed by two others which had belonged to him, and covered likewise with the same funeral ornaments. In these two last assisted the new grand master, the lords of the council, and the chief knights and commanders of the order, all in the deepest mourning, and followed by a number of other smaller vessels.

In this mournful and solemn pomp they proceeded from the grand port to that of Muzette, where all the deceased's household, his officers and domestics, in the same grand mourning, landed first, some bearing the standards and trophies above-mentioned, and others lighted wax tapers in their hands, and singing the funeral office before the corpse, which last was borne under a stately canopy, with its proper bearers and funeral embellishments. The grand master and the rest of their order followed the corpse, and the procession was closed with a long train of officers both civil and military, and crowds of other people, who wore their mourning in their looks and hearts, and in their sighs and tears expressed their sincere grief for the loss of so tender a father and protector. The mass, and other rites of his interment, were performed in the same solemn manner, till his body was deposited in the above-mentioned chapel; the rest of the funeral pomp was concluded with all the usual honours to persons of his rank and merit <sup>b</sup>.

S E C T. V.

c IN this laſt ſection of the Maltheſe hiſtory, we ſhall be obliged to alter our method, and to be much more ſuccinct than we have been, for want of proper materials upon which to form a regular ſeries of hiſtorical events. It hath indeed been juſtly wondered at, that all the authors who have hitherto undertaken to give the world the hiſtory of that order, whether in Latin, Spaniſh, French, Italian, or Dutch, have agreed to cloſe it with the memorable tranſaction with which we have concluded our laſt ſection; viz. the raiſing of the ſiege of Malta, the building of the new city, and the death of its illuſtrious founder the late grand maſter De la Valetta, as if there had been nothing paſſed in that iſland worthy to be recorded. And indeed, when the reader looks back to the reigns of Soliman II. and his ſon Selim, in the Turkiſh hiſtory, he will find, that their forces were ſo far exhausted by this time, partly by the great loſs ſuſtained at the ſiege laſt-mentioned, and partly by their other wars, that they were in no condition to make any farther attempt againſt that iſland, though they wanted neither will nor powerful motives to have cruſhed an order that was ſo great a thorn in their ſides, and diſgrace to their boated power and greatneſs.

THE grand maſter, therefore, having little to fear from that ſide, at leaſt for ſome time, having paid the laſt obſequies to his worthy predecessor, in the grand and ſolemn manner above-mentioned, made it his firſt care to complete the fortifications, and the reſt of the new city, which he had left unfiniſhed, and repair and enlarge his navy, in order to ſuppreſs the Algerines, and other corſairs of Barbary, which were now the only enemies he had to encounter; in all which he uſed ſuch diligence, that he quickly regained the command of thoſe ſeas, and increaſed the plenty and wealth of the iſland, by the continual prizes which his galleys made on that piratical tribe, of which we have given ſeveral ſignal inſtances in the hiſtories of Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli. Theſe frequent and almoſt conſtant excuſions, joined to the aſſiſtance which they were always ready to give to the Chriſtian powers againſt the Turks, and other enemies of Chriſtianity, are the two main points in which the ſequel of the hiſtory of the order conſiſts, and will be the ſubject of this laſt ſection: But as theſe tranſactions, which particularly relate to the Maltheſe hiſtory, under both heads, and have been referred to this chapter, are at too great a diſtance from each other, in point of time, to be continued in the method of a regular hiſtory, we ſhall content ourſelves, as ſome other late authors have done, with giving them in an annaliſtical order, as they have been taken from the records of that iſland <sup>a</sup>.

Reasons for its different method.

PETER DU MONT, alias DE MONTE, grand prior of Capua, is choſen grand maſter inſtead of the late John de la Valetta, on the 23d of Auguſt 1569, by the general chapter of the order.

THE lady Hieronima de Olibo, grand prioceſs of the royal monastery of Siocena, of the order of St. John of Jeruſalem, ſituate in the kingdom of Arragon, is, by the conſent of the whole community, restored to the order, and put under the discipline thereof, after having a been some considerable time alienated from it, under pretence that it was dependent on the popes. Selim II. undertakes the conquest of the island of Cyprus, which gives the grand master time to finish the repairs of the old, and to go on with the new, fortifications of Malta, and to complete the building of the new city, with the convent and palaces of the order.

make rich prizes on the Turks

In 1570 three Maltese commanders; viz. St. Aubyn, Ferrand de Coiro, and Roequelaure; cruise on the coasts of Egypt, as far as the mouth of the Nile, where they take several considerable Turkish prizes, and, amongst them, one large rich one, in which was the treasurer general of Egypt, with his family, who was going to make up his accounts at the Porte, and in which were various kinds of presents for the grand signor and the seraglio. On the other hand, a famed Turkish corsair, named Luckiali, at the head of a powerful squadron, surprised three Maltese gallies, commanded by the chevalier St. Clement, among which was the great capitana, which, after a stout resistance, ran itself aground against the foot of the tower of Monte Chiaro in Sicily. The commander de St. Clement, conscious of his ill conduct and guilt on this occasion, disguised himself in the habit of a Franciscan monk, went to Rome, to beg of the Spanish ambassador to intercede with the pope, that the pontif might use his influence with the grand master in his behalf. These having given him some assurances that no notice should be taken of his misconduct, he was imprudent enough to embark for Malta, where he was scarcely arrived before the whole irritated populace came in shoals, and would have sunk him into the sea with volleys of stones, if he had not drawn back from them. He tried then in vain to have sailed back, but could not for the wind, which still blew him back, whilst the people continued their peltings and outcries against him. At length the grand marshal's order was sent at the heard of a good number of knights, and the secular posse, who rescued him out of their hands, and conducted him by water to the foot of the castle of St. Angelo, whence he was drawn up by pulleys into it tied fast to a chair, and taken up through a window or embrasure, and closely confined. He was quickly after tried, and condemned to death, and delivered over to the secular power, which caused him to be strangled, and his body to be thrown into the sea in a sack loaded with large stones. This execution appeased the populace, but did not allay the grief and mourning which so general a loss had caused thro' the island, much less the indignation which the whole order had conceived at the cowardice and disgrace of their commander, and the loss of their gallies, especially the noble capitana, though, contrary to the Turkish custom, that corsair treated the knights with great humanity, and shewed himself harsh and cruel to those who had behaved themselves cowardly. Upon the whole, this loss and disgrace to the order was esteemed too great to be in any case compensated by the rich prizes of St. Aubyn and his two confederates above-mentioned, which turned only to the advantage of the captors, and of some few other private members of the order.

In the year 1571, the Maltese knights signalized themselves at the famed battle of Le-panto, in which the Turks lost 30,000 men, their general was slain, and two of his sons, together with 5000 officers and soldiers, who were made prisoners, and 20,000 Christian captives recovered their liberty.

In the same year, the grand master having completed the building of the new city called La Valetta, begun by his predecessor of that name, the order removes into the great convent erected in it for their public residence; he made his public entry into it on the 18th of March, at the head of all the order, with great pomp; soon after which, being discontented at the little regard that was paid to him on account of his old age and uneven temper, he begged leave of the pope Pius V. to resign and retire; but died before he had obtained it, on the 27th of January following, in the fourth year of his grand mastership, and the 76th of his age.

47. John L'- Eveque de la
Cassiere.

On the very next day, in 1572, the grand chapter met, and chose John L' Eveque de la Cassiere, in his room. He was of the tongue of Auvergne, and at that time grand marshal of the order, and on the same day was installed sovereign of Malta and Gosa. Among other promotions that were made in the order after his election, which it were superfluous to mention, Hieronymo de Guetta, grand conservator of it, was appointed his ambassador to the pope, Gregory III. who had succeeded Pius V. to take the usual oaths of obedience and submission to the holy see in his name. He caused the great church of St. John the Baptist to be built in the new city of La Valetta, together with a stately chapel, to serve for a burying-place for all the grand masters of the order, and endowed the church with a revenue of 1000 crowns. In the mean time the great armament which was hastening by Selim II. in Turky, being apprehended to be designed against Malta, la Cassiere made all proper preparations for a vigorous defence, which proved however needless, that emperor's design being against the Goletta, or citadel of a Tunis, of which he made himself master. On the next year, 1573, according to the gene-<sup>The inqui-</sup>rality of authors, was the tribunal of the inquisition established at Malta, which hath continued <sup>sition intro-</sup>there ever since; and on the year following Amurat III. having succeeded his father, revives <sup>duced into</sup> the apprehensions of the order; about which time happened the great rupture between them and the Venetians, on account of a prize which the former had made of a vessel richly laden with merchandize belonging to the Jews of their republic. This was soon after followed by intestine broils between the tongues, about some rich commanderies and priories, in which the grand master had the misfortune to behave in such a manner, as quite alienated the affections of the convent from him, and occasioned various complaints against him in the grand council, particularly on account of his not making the necessary preparations against the Turks, who

b threatened that island with a fresh invasion.

ANOTHER cause of discontent was, that the senate of Venice had so far interested itself in behalf of their Jewish sufferers, as to cause all the lands and revenues belonging to the order to be sequestered, and had ordered reprisals to be made on their gallies at sea. La Cassiere was obliged to send an ambassy to the pope, to justify that action; and to represent to that pontif, that, the Jews not being subjects to that republic, the law of nations allowed the effects of an enemy to be seized as contraband, though found in a vessel which belonged to a friend; notwithstanding which, the Venetians refused to take off the sequestration, till the Maltese had made full restitution of the Jewish effects.

A NEW disaster happened on the next year, in the city La Valetta, where one Cortezza, a c Portuguese knight of the order, was assassinated by six others of his own nation, who broke into his house in disguise. They were quickly after discovered, apprehended, and tried; and condemned by the secular power to be tied up alive in a sack, and flung into the sea. In the same year the order lost one of their gallies, called the St. Paul, which was taken by an Algerine corsair. They were obliged, however, to submit to some more mortifying terms in this very year, through the arbitrary demands of some European princes, to which the pope shewed <sup>The order op-</sup>the first example. That pontif sent a young cavalier, named Mendosa, then but a novice, to <sup>pressed by the</sup> the order, with a brief, dated in the foregoing year, enjoining the grand master to admit him, <sup>European</sup> after his arrival, to the highest rank of knights, called of the great cross, with the dignity of Turcopolerius, which had formerly belonged to knights of the English tongue, but had been,
d since the reformation, in a great measure, suspended. This brief occasioned a general discontent through the whole order, who thereupon sent an ambassy, to desire his holiness to recall it, and not to insist upon their admitting so young and unexperienced a gentleman into the number of the eight pillars of the order.

THE king of Spain, following the same path, obtained this year much the same kind of brief from that pontif in favour of the young archduke Venceslaus, of the house of Austria, and newly admitted into the order, in which the grand master was desired to grant him the reversion of the grand priories of Castile and Leon, together with the bailiwick of Lora, and the dignity of the great cross, after the death of the present incumbents. These, tho' some of the greatest preferments belonging to the Castilian tongue, they were obliged to consent to, out of e complaisance to the Spanish monarch; and gave the young Austrian a grant of them accordingly, as soon as he had taken upon him the usual vows belonging to the order. This was followed soon after by a worse infringement from France, where the council of Henry III. passed an arret, by which they authorised that monarch to name some of his subjects to the grand priories within his dominions; in consequence of which, he sent a letter to the grand master, desiring him to confirm those of St. Giles, France, and Champagne, in favour of Francis of Lorraine, the queen's brother, which were the three most considerable priories in that kingdom.

THEY were upon the point of receiving a still more mortifying blow from several members of Germany, where the diet, then assembled, proposed, that the German knights should join themselves to those of the Teutonic order, that they might thereby render it more powerful, and f put it in a condition to carry on the war in Hungary with more success against the Turks: but this motion was strenuously opposed by their ambassador at the diet, and so artfully warded off by his address, that they thought fit to drop it.

THE last remarkable thing that happened in this year, with respect to the Maltese order, was, the noble answer which cavalier Bongranni Giantigliazzi gave to soltan Selim II. at Constantinople. This knight had been, with the grand master's consent, sent thither by the duke of Tuscany, as his ambassador. The soltan one day having shewn him a plan of the city of Valetta, and its outworks, asked him whether it was exact, and whether the place was actually so strong as it was there represented? and was answered by him in words to this effect: It hath really all the strength that your majesty sees there; but there is one main part of it which your
g engineer hath not taken notice of, and which consists in the intrepid valour of above 1000 of its knights, who are all ready to fight in its defence to the last drop of their blood.

Complaints made against the grand
master.

The pope puts a stop to them.

THE year 1578 was likely to have proved still more unquiet, through the heavy complaints a which eight Castilian knights preferred to the council against the grand master, on account of the several grand priories with which he had complimented the pope and the kings of Spain and France, in behalf of their favourites, and in prejudice to their own rights, in virtue of their seniority and merit. These discontents, which were privately countenanced by some of the principal knights of the order, out of dislike to the grand master, arose to such a height, that he was obliged to appeal to the pope, who, being the first leader of the dance, could not well fail of supporting him in it. The pontif accordingly summoned the malecontents to appear before him, which they at first excused themselves from, under pretence that, being destitute of any patrimony, as well as of preferment in the order, they were in no condition of bearing the charges of such a voyage. The grand master easily obtained from the pontif a dispensation from it, but it was upon condition that they should come and present themselves before him in full council, with each a lighted wax taper in his hand, and in the humblest guise ask his and the council's pardon for their past misbehaviour which they were forced to comply with; and, after having received a very severe reprimand from the grand master, were admitted again to their pristine dignities. b

In the same year happened the death of the grand prior of Bohemia, which gave the order fresh apprehensions that the emperor would, as usual, take upon him the nomination of one of his favourite creatures to that considerable post, to the prejudice of the ancient rights of the order; to prevent which, the grand master dispatched the baily Shomborn his ambassador to the imperial court, with express orders to take Prague in his way, and to secure the interest of the chevalier de Verdemberg, a person in the highest favour with the emperor. Shomborn accordingly applied himself to him, and earnestly pressed him to ascertain the privileges of the order, and at the same time presented him with a patent from the grand master, which nominated him to that dignity. The stratagem succeeded to their wish, and the emperor confirmed his favourite in that priory without any difficulty. c

master.

AT the end of the same year arrived the Portuguese ambassador, to notify to the order the death of the late king Don Sebastian, who had been slain on the 22d of September 1578, at the battle of Alcazar, in which several Maltese commanders likewise lost their lives; and the accession of Don Henry to that crown. Presently after this, Gargalla, then bishop of Malta, and Cressini, prior of the same, two turbulent spirits, laid the foundation for that dreadful storm which was not long afterwards raised against the grand master, their friend and benefactor. Justinian, grand prior of Messina, is sent ambassador by him to condole the kings of Castile and Portugal on the death of Venceslaus, archduke of Austria, lately presented with the grand priories of Castile and Leon, and of Don John of Austria, natural son to the emperor Charles V. He was likewise to make some pressing instances to those monarchs for some speedy succours, in order to put the island of Malta in a good state of defence against the Turks, who threatened it with a fresh armament. The bishop of Malta having taken upon him the juridical visitation of the grand hospital of the new city, which belonged solely to the grand master and council, not only excommunicated the stewards and other officers who opposed him, but, supported by his mutinous clergy, raised a strong party against them, who went about armed, and insulted those that sided with the grand master, who was thereupon obliged to order a guard of fifty men, in the great borough, to suppress their insolence. He sent next an embassy to Rome, to beg of the pope to interpose his authority. The pontif appointed the archbishop of Palermo to go to Malta, and make a strict inquiry into their contest; but, upon his arrival, he found it risen to such a height, and the generality of the order so incensed against the grand master, that he thought it the most expedient way to summon the contending parties to appear before the pope, and immediately after returned to Rome, followed by the Maltese bishop. d

master.

In the mean while three officers of the inquisition were accused of a design of poisoning the grand master, and, when examined, informed against several knights of the order, some of them of the first rank, as accomplices with them, together with signor Petrucci, grand inquisitor of the island. Some of them, without the least regard to decency or duty, broke into the council-chamber, and insolently asked him what proofs he had that any of them had conspired against his life? and insisted that three knights of the order, whom they named, should be sent ambassadors to the pope, to demand justice against him; but two of them declining the commission, that motion was set aside for a while, in order to be soon after resumed with greater warmth. Accordingly by the next year the council, supported by the principal commanders of the order, declared themselves against him, and insisted either upon his abdicating or being deposed. e

ROMEGAS, one of the heads of the sedition, and remarkable only for his brutish valour, g objected, amongst other things, against him, that he was grown superannuated, stupid, and indolent;

a indolent ; was always observed to be nodding or asleep at the council, and at the most important debates ; and that he was more attentive to the behaviour of the women than to the preparations which the infidels were carrying on against the order. Not content to vilify his character by the most scandalous reflections and insinuations, Romegas, with three other chiefs of the faction, at the head of a numerous troop of mutineers, broke into his palace, and seized on his person, in virtue of the decree of the council, and, having clapped him into an open chair, conducted him as a criminal to the castle of St. Angelo, amidst the curses, execrations, and insults of an infligated multitude, and there confined him close prisoner. Their next resolution was to send an ambassy, to justify their proceedings to his holiness Gregory XIII. ; at the head of which Romegas caused one of his tools to be nominated. This was followed closely b by another from the grand master, who, confined as he was, found means to send four knights of character and merit to defend his cause before that pontif.

Two days after their departure arrived the commander Chabrilan, admiral of the order, with his gallies, and a good number of knights. They, immediately upon their landing, insisted upon going to the grand master, which the revolted were obliged to comply with. That brave knight immediately offered to take him out of his confinement, and to conduct him to his palace at the head of 2000 men, which he had under him ; but the grand master as generously refused it ; telling him, that he would owe his restoration solely to the holy see, and not to any hostilities that might be committed by his children in his behalf. Soon after this, the king of France, being informed of the ill treatment which he had received from the c order, sent him word by an express to assure him, that he would assist him with all his power to quell the sedition, and punish the fomentors of it ; but that offer was likewise civilly declined by him.

In the mean time, the pope, having heard the ambassadors of both sides, sent his auditor de Rota, in the quality of nuncio, to summon the grand master and Romegas to appear before him. La Cassiere accordingly set sail, and arrived at Rome, attended by near 800 knights of the order, and met with a most gracious reception from the pontif ; whilst Romegas, who was no less pressing for an audience from him, was answered, that his holiness was fully determined not to admit him into his presence, till he had divested himself of the administration which he had taken upon him during the grand master's imprisonment. This news affected
d him to such a degree, that, we are told, he swooned away at the first hearing of it. He was quickly after seized with a violent fever, which carried him off in a few days. His ambassadors, and their adherents, were thereupon ordered to appear before the grand master, and to beg his pardon. Sacquenville, the chief of the ambassy, appeared at the head of them, and contented himself with asking his hand to kiss : but was thunderstruck, when he heard the cardinal de Montalto address him with these words, Down on your knees, you rebel, and know that it is owing to the singular goodness of your worthy grand master that you have not had your head cut off at the public place of execution. After this, all the factious party were glad to submit both at Rome and Malta, and the grand master was restored to his dignity with the greatest marks of honour and esteem. The pope designed to have done the same to him at Malta by e his nuncio, and was even pressing to have him return thither, and resume his former dignity and government ; but death soon after prevented it, and only his remains were carried thither The grand master dies. to be interred in the sepulchral chapel which he had caused to be erected for his predecessor, whilst his heart was deposited in the great church of St. Lewis at Rome. The pope caused the following inscription to be engraved on his monument, as it was composed by the famous M. Andrea Maretto : Fratri Joanni episcopo, magno militiæ Hierosolimitanæ magistro, viro fortissimo, religiosissimo, splendidissimo, cujus, ut igne aurum, sic calumniis spectata ac probata integritas etiam enituit. Sacra sodalitas militum Hierosolitanorum patriæ principi optimo mærens posuit. Vixit annos 78, obiit Romæ 12 kalend. Januarii, 1581 †. He died at Rome about three months after his arrival there, worn out with age, fatigues, and vexations, on the 21st f of January, 1581, in the 78th year of his age, and 9th of his grand mastership. An author, who was then at Rome, adds, that he outlived but a few days his competitor Romegas ; and that the judges, delegates, notaries, witnesses, and writings, relating to that contest, were all sunk, with the ship that carried them, into the bottom of the sea, by a storm which overtook them in their return to Malta, the Divine Providence not permitting that any records or traces of that accusation should remain <sup>m</sup>.

WHEN the council of Malta received the news of the grand master's death, they began to be apprehensive lest pope Gregory should take upon him the nomination of his successor ; to prevent which, they immediately dispatched a new embassy to Rome, to beg of him that he would permit them to enjoy their ancient privilege of election. The pope, having caused the records of his predecessors to be examined, dismissed them with a general answer, that he would shortly send them a brief by his nuncio signor Visconti, whom they should find to be perfectly well acquainted with his intentions on that head.

THE brief arrived accordingly on the 12th of January following, by which that pontif enjoined them to make choice of one of the three persons named in it; viz. Hughes de Loubenz de Verdalle, of the tongue of Provence, and grand commander of the order, Panisse, grand prior of St. Giles, and Chabrilan, grand baily of Manosque, all three natives of France, and persons of valour and merit. The chapter, however, knowing the first of them to be in greatest favour with the pontif, having resided at his court as their ambassador, made choice of him without any opposition; soon after which his election was confirmed by his holiness, by a brief, in which he united the dignity of Turcopalerio, which had formerly belonged to the knights of the English tongue, with that of grand master; to which it hath been joined ever since. Several other privileges and exemptions were confirmed in the same year in favour of the order, both by that pontif and several other Christian princes; particularly in France, the parliament of Dijon declared the knights to be capable of succeeding and inheriting the estates of their parents, &c. which had been often contested before.

In the next year he summoned a general council, in which several abuses were reformed, not only with regard to some disorders which had crept in, more particularly during the late sedition, but with respect to the revenues and responsions, &c. of the order; after which a general tax was raised out of all the estates belonging to it, in order to provide for the security of the island against the Turks, and particularly to add some new fortifications to those of the island of Gosa.

ABOUT the same time a contest between the tongues of Italy and Arragon being brought before the council about precedence, it was given in favour of the former.

In the succeeding year the Maltese admiral, Avograde, being accused before the said council of sundry misdemeanors, was deprived of his offices, condemned to a year's imprisonment, and the revenue of his baliwick for three years confiscated to the public treasury. Some gallies were ordered to scour the seas, in conjunction with those of the duke of Tuscany; whilst those of the Venetians continued to make reprisals on those of Malta, and these on theirs. Andrew Doria, the famous Genoese admiral, arrived at Malta about the same time, where he was received with suitable magnificence. He had divers conferences with the grand master and council during his stay; and several proper measures were taken for opposing the Turkish power, and assisting the island in case of an invasion from that quarter. In the same year was brought a bull from pope Gregory, excluding the knights of the order from being chosen bishops of Malta, and priors of that cathedral; soon after which that pontif died, and was succeeded by Sixtus V.

THE next year was mostly spent in disquisitions and contests between the grand master and the council, about the right of nominating the admiral of the gallies, and the person who was to command in the grand capitana, which laid the foundation of an irreconcilable misunderstanding between them. The ferment and feuds arose to such a height, that an order was passed on the next year, expressly forbidding the carrying about pocket-pistols, daggers, stilettos, and other such weapons as were only used by banditti and assassins. This prohibition, though it prevented many disorders that frequently happened at this time, yet rather irritated than allayed the reigning spirit of sedition; insomuch that the grand master, unable to support his authority any longer under it, thought proper to leave the island, and sailed directly to Rome, whence the pope, in order to procure him greater regard from the malecontents of the convent, sent him back with the dignity of cardinal; which, however, only served to aggravate the resentments of the mutinous, whose chief objection against him was his too great compliance with the see of Rome, and his little regard to the rights and interests of the order. Upon his arrival at Malta, he appointed James Bosio to continue the history of the order, which had been begun by the commander John Anthony Frossan. All this while the gallies ranged the seas, and brought in considerable prizes; and the new pope Gregory XIV. was pleased, about this time, to publish a brief, by which all the effects of the Jews taken at sea, on what bottoms soever, were deemed lawful prizes.

In this year the island was afflicted with a terrible pestilence, which swept away vast numbers both in the city and other parts of the island. The Jesuits being about this time invited thither by Gargalla, bishop of Malta, came and settled there; and the grand master erected a convent for the Capuchin friars, who came and settled there also.

• Some contests between the
and council.

a On the next and following years, fresh attempts were made by the pope and European 1593.
princes on the rights of the order, who bestowed several rich priories on their favourites; The capuchins particularly Henry IV. of France disposed of that of Aquitain in favour of the commander introduced at Chalte; and that of Auvergne was given by him to baron de Bellegarde, though a layman. Malta.
The castle of Bosqueto, built by the grand master, was called by his name mount Verdalle.
All this while, neither his public works, nor other popular acts, being able to suppress the continual cabals of the malecontents, nor allay his uneasiness on that account, he takes his leave once more of the island, and returns to Rome, where he died with grief soon after his arrival. The grand Others say that he died at Malta<sup>c</sup>, full of discontent at the unjust invectives and complaints master dies.
raised against him for having embezzled the public treasure; though he is said to have remitted b no less than 200,000 crowns, which the treasury was indebted to him. However that be, his death happened on the 4th of May 1595, after having governed the order thirteen years and almost four months<sup>d</sup>.

He was succeeded by Martin Garzez, of the tongue of Arragon, and at that time grand 1597.
castellan of the imposts; a person who proved more acceptable to the order than his predecessor. 51. Martin
He began his government with abolishing sundry duties, taxes, and imposts; and made an Garzez.
order, that no private knight, commander, or even grand master, should thenceforth be allowed to keep vessels of their own to go a cruising against the Turks, for the sake of plunder and their own private emolument. On the other hand, as the Turks were ravaging the kingdom of c Hungary, almost without any opposition, he and the council passed a decree, that any knight of the order, who served in that country against the infidels, should be allowed their respective revenues, in the same manner as if they had been employed in the galleys of the order, or had been residing in the island; upon which great numbers of them transported themselves thither, and signalized themselves against those invaders. This act so far obliged the emperor Rodol- phus II. that, on the next year, he terminated the long contest about the grand priory of Bohe- mia, to the satisfaction of the order; the diploma of which was dispatched soon after to the grand master. The inquisitors, who had, during the grand mastership of the late La Cassiere, caused some disturbances in the island, began afresh to make them feel the effects of their encroachments and arbitrary proceedings, and made the order wish, when it was too late, that they had never given any admittance to that office. This year the grand master and chapter d passed a decree in favour of the Swiss, by which they were allowed to be admitted into the priory of Germany, provided the candidates proved their descent from their progenitors by lawful marriage both on their father and mothers side, during three generations, and all to have been of the catholic religion, and that none of them had ever exercised any mechanic trades, but been employed in military offices, as captains, commanders, &c. in which case their martial calling should intitle them to admission, instead of nobility of blood. This century concludes with making some new fortifications in the islands of Malta and Gosa; and the next begins
e with some new contests between the tongues of Italy and Germany, about the priory of Hun- gary, which are followed by much more dangerous ones between the grand master and the officers of the inquisition, who, to gain the pope's favour, assumed, by that time, such an exorbitant degree of authority, as rendered them odious and insupportable to the whole order, and helped to shorten the grand master's life, who died on the 7th of February of the following year, after having governed the order five years and nine months.

He was succeeded by Alof de Vignacourt, grand hospitaller of the order, and of the tongue 1601. of France, on the 10th of the same month. This gentleman, who was descended from an The grand illustrious house in Picardy, signalized his government, above all his predecessors, not only by master dies.
the unusual length of it, but much more by the variety of memorable events which happened 52. Alof de during the course of it. His first care, after having notified his election to the several Christian Vignacourt.
powers of Europe by splendid ambassies, was to oppose the encroachments of the inquisitor Veralli, who had assumed a right of intermeddling with the affairs of government, and was f therein openly supported by pope Clement VIII. Their insolence was indeed grown to such a monstrous height during the two former governments, that there was a necessity for this new grand master to let them know betimes that he was fully determined to confine them to their own proper province. In the same year the galleys of the order, according to a well-concerted plan, made themselves masters of Hammamet, vulgarly called Mahometta, belonging to the district of Susa, on the coast of Barbary, a fortress built formerly by the Tunisians.

On the next year they were sent on an expedition against Lepanto; and on the following, in which was held a general chapter of the order, they were employed in ravaging the island of Lango, Lango, once belonging to the order, when they were masters of Rhodes, but out of which vaged.

they were driven by the Turks, as we have already seen. Nothing remarkable happened upon the two following years, except the death of pope Clement VIII. and the election of Paul V. who, in prejudice of the right of the order, disposed of three commanderies belonging to the tongue of Italy, in favour of his nephews, and not long after, of that of Benevento in favour of cardinal Buffaio. These were not the only mortifications which that great man was obliged to submit to, from the usurping tyranny of the holy see, as we shall soon see in the sequel.

1607. THESE frequent violations, so detrimental to the order, inspired a Dalmatian knight, of the German tongue, with a project, which, if it had been put in execution, would have made some amends for their frequent losses. It was to obtain from the Polanders the restitution of the rich and extensive commandery of Posnania, which had long since fallen into secular hands, upon condition that a new body of knights should be established in that kingdom, whose office it should be to fight on horseback, and defend its frontiers against the Turks. The proposal was highly approved of by the grand master and council; but the execution of it proved impracticable, through the obstacles which a prince of the house of Radziwil put in its way, whose ancestors, it is probable, had by some means got possession of it.

1608. A sedition at Malta. ON the next year a sedition happened in the new city, occasioned by an attempt made by some of the order to get the count de Brie, natural son of Henry duke of Lorraine, admitted into the order; at which those of the German tongue were so exasperated, that they took down the arms of the grand master, and of the order, that stood over the great gate of their inn, and left only those of the emperor in their room. The affair was like to have been attended with some fatal consequences, the Germans being the most jealous and nice in point of blood and descent; but how it was compromised at last, our author has not thought fit to tell us.

ON the next year three commanders of the order, Fresenet, Mauros, and Gaucourt, surprized the fortress of Lajazzo, in the bay of that name, on the confines of Natolia. They burst open the gate by the help of a petard, entered and plundered the town, where they loaded themselves with rich plunder, rased the fortifications, and brought away above three hundred captives.

ON the next year the order lost a most noble friend and patron in the person of Henry IV. of France, who was treacherously stabbed by Ravillac.

ON this year the city of Corinth was taken and plundered by the gallies of the order.

1611. ON the next the duke of Vendosme, who had taken the habit of the order, was declared general of all the gallies belonging to it.

THE corsairs of Barbary having entered into a combination to surprize the island of Gosa, the grand master ordered some new fortifications to be added to it, and sent a fresh supply of troops and ammunition into it, which rendered the attempt abortive.

1615. The pope makes fresh infringements. THE order was alarmed at a fresh infringement of their privileges, by a grant made by the pope of the reversion of the grand commandery of Reggio, in favour of a younger son of the duke of Modena; a grant which might have been attended with dangerous consequences, had it not been compromised by the address and credit of the grand master.

SIXTY Turkish gallies land at Malta, and ravage the island, but could meet with no rich plunder, nor make any captives, through the timely precaution of the inhabitants, who had retired with their most considerable effects into the city and other fortresses of the island.

1616. THE grand master causes a noble aqueduct to be made from the city of Malta, since called the Notable City, to the new one of La Valetta, by which the latter is furnished with a sufficient quantity of water to supply a sumptuous fountain, which he caused to be erected in the great square that faces the palace, with a constant stream; a work, says our author, worthy of the magnificence of the antient Romans.

WE formerly took notice of the order of St. Sepulchre having, for the better defence of Christendom, been joined to the order of St. John of Jerusalem; but, about this time, the duke of Nevers having formed a project for disuniting them again, the grand master was obliged to send an ambassy into France to traverse that design. Don Lewis Mendez de Vasconcellos, baily of Acra, a knight of great penetration and conduct, was the person who was sent ambassador extraordinary to the French court, and who, by his credit and singular address, prevailed upon the French monarch to oppose it; by which means it was set aside.

ABOUT the same time the famous Taccardin, prince of the Drusii, arrived at Malta, to procure the protection and assistance of the order against the tyranny and persecution of the grand signior, and met with a favourable reception.

1618. THE order caused a new galleon to be built at Amsterdam, at the public charge; the construction and equipment of which amounted to 60,000 ducats.

a At the same time the grand master caused some new fortifications to be added to the castles of St. Paul, Marza, Sicaco, and Marza Scala, and to those in the small island of Comin, situated between Maltha and Gofa.

In the same year the bishop of Maltha, who had for some time made sundry encroachments on the authority of the grand master and council, being complained against to the pope, was obliged to go to Rome, to justify his conduct. He left the care of the diocese to his vicar, who being a person of a turbulent spirit, exasperated the order against him to such a degree, that the young knights of every tongue agreed to fetch him out of his house, and throw him into the sea. The grand master, being informed of it, caused him to be rescued out of their hands, and sent him after the bishop, to answer for his mutiny and audaciousness before the holy see.

b The pope, pretending to resent the indignity done to the vicar, as done to the whole church, and to himself as head of it, sent orders to the grand inquisitor of the island to make a strict and severe inquiry into the cause of the contest, and to threaten the order with excommunication. Whereupon the grand master finding that the pontif was no friend to the order, was glad to make a feigned submission to him, to avoid the effects of his resentment.

On the same year the order lost a considerable number of knights, and others of their forces, in their fruitless attempt on the town of Susa, on the coast of Barbary, in conjunction with the rest of the Christian fleet. Many of them returned to Maltha, covered with wounds, of which several of them died soon after.

c This year arrived at Maltha Francis Ottoman, a Dominican friar, who pretended to be the son of sultan Achmet, and on the recommendation of cardinal Verally, president of the congregation of catechumens at Rome, met with a suitable reception from the grand master and order; soon after which the Maltese gallies made an attempt upon Castell Tornese in the Morea, under the conduct of the commander Alfonso Castel St. Pedro, their admiral. They had already opened their way into the place, which was the public magazine of that peninsula, by the means of three petards; when the grand master was informed by a Greek, that, if they did not retire with speed, they would be all cut in pieces by 4000 Turks, who were then at a small distance, which obliged that general to sound a retreat, which he did time enough to get all his men on board, with their plunder and prisoners.

d GREGORY XV. succeeds Paul V. at Rome; and, by a new bull, confirms all the privileges of the order granted by his predecessors, but quickly after invades those which belonged to the Italian tongue, by disposing even of the reversion of some of their commanderies; by which they saw themselves deprived of their right of succession to them, according to the title of eldership and merit.

e ABOUT the same time the commander of Chatte-Gassan was sent by Lewis XIII. of France to desire the grand master to permit the gallies of the order to join with his own against the Huguenots, who were in arms in the southern parts of his dominions; upon which the commander Castellani de Montemedano was ordered to sail with them, and the galleon newly built at Amsterdam, directly for Marseilles. Soon after, the grand master being out a hunting in the height of the hot weather, in the month of August, and in too eager pursuit of a hare, was seized with an apoplectic fit, and was immediately conveyed to the new city, where, being taken proper care of, he lived till the 14th of September following, after having appointed Nicholas la Marra, admiral, his lieutenant, and died in the 75th year of his age, and 21st of his grand mastership.

He was succeeded by Lewis Mendez Vasconcellos, of the tongue of Portugal, and grand baily of Acra, who was proclaimed on the 17th of the same month, but had hardly enjoyed his new dignity six whole months before death deprived the order of him, whilst he was taken up in making many new regulations for restoring the antient discipline. He died on the 6th of March following, in the 80th year of his age, and was succeeded by f ANTHONY DE PAULO, grand prior of St. Giles, and then 71 years of age, who had the mortification to find that Urban VIII. who succeeded Gregory XV. made as little scruple of invading the rights of the order as his predecessors. In the first year of his government, a Portuguese novice of the order, named John Fonseca, having been convicted of murder and theft, was publicly beheaded; and, on the next year, the prior of Capua was condemned to perpetual imprisonment for defrauding the public revenue of several considerable sums, and died in his confinement. On the other hand, there were many of the order, who publicly accused the grand master of several crimes at the court of Rome, such as lewdness and simony; upon which he was obliged to send the commander Hilliar de Polastron, a person of a most exemplary life, ambassador to Rome, to refute these unjust calumnies, and to justify his character.

53. Lewis Mendez Vasconcellos.

1624. 54. Antony de Paulo.

g HE had scarcely extricated himself out of that difficulty, before he was involved in a greater; as he had to deal with pope Urban VIII. who was both judge and party, and had taken upon him the disposal of all the Italian commanderies in favour of his relations and favourites; in-much

much that they reckoned no less than seventeen of the best of them, which had been thus arbitrarily given away by him and his two predecessors, in prejudice of the Italian tongue. This injustice increased the discontent to such a degree among the knights of that nation, that they refused to perform their caravans, and other duties of their order, and many of them abandoning the island retired to their own respective patrimonies, or among their relations and friends. The grand master, unable to put a stop to such complicated disasters by any other means, found himself obliged to send ambassadors not only to the court of Rome, but also to the courts of Germany, France, and Spain, who being all staunch members of the order, and men of the highest rank and character, failed not to represent to those Christian princes the injustice of that pontif's proceedings in the most lively terms. These ambassadors were moreover ordered to complain of frequent dispensations granted at Rome to the knights of the order, by which they were impowered to dispose of their effects to the prejudice of the common treasury, and consequently the whole community. All these commissions were executed with the utmost exactness and zeal by those ambassadors. Some of those princes were pleased to represent those injuries done to the order, as extremely displeasing to them, by their ambassadors at the court of Rome, but without any effect; the pontif proved deaf to all their remonstrances, and complaints of the grand master, and, instead of receding from his pretensions, did only give them a more extravagant scope.

THIS year the gallies of the order made an unsuccessful attempt on the island of St. Mauro, belonging to the Turks, in which they had twelve of their knights slain, besides a much greater number wounded, with the loss of their other forces, and some of their vessels. This was followed soon after by the loss of two of their prime gallies, the St. John and St. Francis, in an engagement at sea against the Turkish corsairs. In this likewise several of their commanders and knights were slain, others wounded, and some taken prisoners, and carried into slavery.

NOTWITHSTANDING all these losses, and others of a different nature, which had reduced the order to very great straits, the pope, still inexorable to all their complaints, continued his old way of disposing of the Italian commanderies amongst his own relations and favourites.

The grand master orders a new gally to be built, and added to the other five, which the order usually kept at sea, in order to suppress the insolence of the Barbary corsairs. Urban VIII's enmity to the order still increasing, by the continual complaints they made against his violent proceedings, he published this year an ordinance, motu proprio, by which he altered the order which had hitherto been observed in the election of their grand masters.

The pope alters the order of electing the
grand master.

ANTHONY BOSIO, the natural son of Ottavio de Bosio, and since adopted by his brother James, famous for his great learning, particularly his knowledge in ecclesiastical history, as well as for his other learned works, and, among them, his Roma Subterranea, succeeded his adoptive father in the office of agent of the order at Rome, and, being the last of that name, inherited the great estates of that illustrious family. The pope, still more eager in pursuit of his own private views, attempted to change the antient customs, that, till then, were used in the general chapters of the order; but was soon after obliged to recede from some of his new regulations.

The pope makes some new changes.

ON the next year the Christian slaves belonging to the Turkish ship commanded by Manni Beigh of Famagusta, in the island of Cyprus, revolt and kill him and all the rest of his soldiers, and sail with the galley to Malta. A general chapter of the order being to be convened on the 11th of May of the same year, the pope consented that they should proceed according to the ancient custom of chusing sixteen commissaries, two for each tongue; but insisted upon his inquisitor's presiding over them, and upon his appointing, during his absence, whom he should think fit, to perform that function in his stead; and that he should moreover be authorized to prorogue or suspend the chapter, if he saw it proper. To which the grand master answered the pontif, that he, for his own part, was ready and willing to comply with his holiness's orders; yet the rest of the community so highly resented his introducing a stranger into the government of the order, under the title of president, that, to prevent the ill consequences that might ensue, he thought himself obliged to intreat him to desist from such an unusual and dangerous proceeding. The pope paying no regard to their remonstrances, and the grand master and council seeing themselves forced to obey, a general revolt was likely to have ensued in the convent, especially among the younger members. To avoid which, they thought it expedient to send them out a cruising, during the whole sitting of the chapter.

ON Sunday the 11th of May, accordingly, the grand chapter assembled, at which the grand master presided as usual, and a great number of the chief commanders, grand priors, and other officers of each tongue, assisted. The inquisitor immediately, after the usual formalities, presented them with the pope's brief, which appointed him president over the sixteen commissaries, but without any authority to vote or intermeddle, to propose or advise, in any matter on the tapis. The grand master and chapter thought it the most prudent way to accept of it on those restrictions; and it was accordingly received, and submitted to. The chapter a chapter proceeded soon after to the election of sixteen commissaries, who, with the inquisitor at their head, retired to the hall or room appointed for their session, and proceeded to the business which was committed to their management, without any molestation or demur on the part of the pope's inquisitor. This being the last general chapter that was held at Maltha, the regulations and decisions of it have served ever since as a rule and law, by which all disputes and debates that have happened since then have been determined, and are like to continue so as long as the order subsists.

THE following year was rendered remarkable by the general census which was taken of all the inhabitants of the two islands of Maltha and Gosa, which were found to amount to 51,750, Number of inhabitants in Maltha and Gosa.

b men, women, and children, exclusive of the knights of the order, the ecclesiastics and familiars belonging to the inquisition.

ABOUT the same time one of the gallies belonging to the order, called the St. John, being driven by stress of weather on the coasts of Calabria, was dashed in pieces; but the crew got safe to land, and the artillery, with a considerable part of the cargo, was likewise saved.

ON the following year, Imbrol, prior of the church, and one of the commissaries chosen by the late chapter, offers himself to write a general history of the order, and obtains leave to search all the records and registers of chancery, &c. in order thereunto; not long after which another knight of the order, named Cæsar Mugalotti, a person of great learning, is recommended by cardinal Barberini, as a proper person to compile the same history. They were c both approved of by the council, and both set about the work; but neither of them have completed it. And it is not unlikely, as we observed at the beginning of the last section, that they found the subject exhausted by Bosio, so far as his own had been continued; and that what had happened since that time was too inconsiderable to countenance the compiling of two new ones. And may not that be the reason why no other author, who hath writ the history of the order, hath thought fit to carry it on further than we have done?

BE that as it will, in the next year general Valdi, admiral of the Maltese gallies, attacked d four Moorish vessels, about the latter end of April, near the coasts of Lepanto, laden with 650 negroes, and other commodities from Barbary for Constantinople, and, after an obstinate fight, made himself master of them. He fell soon after upon some corsairs belonging to Tripoli, and carried off 338 slaves, and delivered about 60 Christian captives. The Maltese take several corsairs.

THE Venetians sent heavy complaints to the grand master, on account of his gallies making such prizes on the seas belonging to the republic; to which he ordered his ambassador there to declare, that he would willingly surrender all the subjects of the grand signor that were taken on the Adriatic gulph; but, as to the Barbary corsairs, he should make no scruple to sell them for slaves, as profligate wretches, that were sworn enemies to all nations and religions. Much such another misunderstanding happened about the same time between the order and the republic of Lucca, and was likely to have been attended with some dangerous consequences, which the pope, however, prevented, by interposing his authority.

ABOUT this time appeared the prince Guchia, who gave himself out to be a son of Mohammed III. by one of the Christian princesses of the house of Comneni, emperors of Trebizond<sup>n</sup>, and pretended that his mother had caused him to be educated in a Christian country, and in the Christian faith. Few princes in Europe gave any credit to this story, though interest prevailed upon several of them, and amongst them the grand master and order, to engage in his quarrel, whether right or wrong.

IN the year following the pope applied himself to them, to endeavour to recover mount Calvary, the church of St. Sepulchre, the city of Bethlehem, and other places of the Holy Land, which had till lately been in the custody of the Franciscan friers of Jerusalem, but had been wrested out of their hands, by dint of money, by the Greek schismatics. The grand master and council readily approved of their design; but gave it as their opinion, that there was no f other way of succeeding in it but by open force of arms, and in conjunction with other Christian princes, who, in that case, ought to shew no more mercy to any Greek schismatics that should fall into their hands.

THE next year was attended with the death of the grand master, who was attacked by a severe sickness, which held him near three months, whilst he was taken up in fortifying the new city with a new wall.

HE died on the 19th day of July, in the 85th year of his age, and the 14th of his government.

HE was succeeded by Paul Lascaris Castelard, great baily of Manosco, who was descended from the famed counts of Vintimillia in Piedmont, who were themselves descended from the imperial family of the emperors of Nice<sup>n</sup>. His singular merit had got him admitted into the order so early as the 24th of April 1583; and he was now seventy years of age upon his being chosen to the grand mastership. The island, at this time, laboured under a great scarcity of corn, which made him apply himself to the president of Sicily for a fresh supply, as usual; but that being refused, the commander Nati, admiral of the Maltese gallies, had recourse to the viceroy of Naples, who readily furnished him with a large quantity of it, without duty or impost; which was the more welcome at this time, as the new grand master had kept a great number of workmen constantly employed in carrying on the fortifications which his predecessor had begun. The person who presided over them was the famed engineer Floriano, whom he had honoured with the habit and the cross of the order, on account of the great skill and diligence with which he acquitted himself of that trust.

The inhabitants formed into regiments, &c.

THAT nothing might retard the work, as the island was threatened with a new armament from Turkey, he ordered some money to be coined, as formerly, for the more regular payment of the workmen; and, for the better security of the inhabitants, he caused them to be regularly divided into regiments and companies, commanded by knights of the order, and to be duly armed and exercised, so as to be always ready to oppose the descents of the Turkish and Barbary corsairs.

The viceroy of Sicily refuses the usual supply of corn.

ABOUT the same time Don Pedro de Vintimillia, another knight of that family, settled an income of 2000 crowns per annum for ever, for the maintenance of an extraordinary galley, which was to be called the St. Peter. His example was followed by the grand prior of Venice, who founded another under the name of St. Nicholas; and the commander Conrard Scheifurt, of the German tongue, founded the new commandery of Breslaw, for the service of the order. These fair beginnings of his new government were, however, quickly overclouded, by the inveterate rancour which the viceroy and president of Sicily bore to the order, who not only refused to supply it with the usual quantities of corn specified in the grant of the emperor Charles V. but ordered an embargo to be laid upon any Maltese ships that should sail into any of their harbours.

THE occasion or pretence for this misunderstanding was, that, the crowns of France and Spain being then at war, some French knights of the order had been suffered by the grand master to make some considerable prizes in French gallies at the very entrance into the harbour of Malta; in revenge of which the regency of Sicily had ordered two Maltese gallies, then in the port of Syracuse, to be disarmed; which the Maltese commander being timely apprised of, forthwith set sail and got away. The governor tried to bring him back by firing upon him, and at length discharged his whole artillery upon him, in spite of which the ships got off, and arrived safe at Malta. This strange conduct of the Spanish governor caused an universal surprize, but more especially in Italy, whose dominions had been so long protected by the bravery of the Maltese gallies from the ravages of the Turkish and Barbary corsairs. This was the first time that this Christian bulwark had ever been cannonaded by any but infidels; but that they should be so now by the Spaniards, who had reaped the greatest advantages from their valour and protection, was justly deemed a piece of the foulest ingratitude; and the duke of Montalto, the then viceroy of that island, was so ashamed of it, that he openly disapproved and condemned the deed, and laid all the blame on the governor of Syracuse, and, by way of satisfaction to the order, promised, or at least gave out, that he would suffer corn to be exported by their gallies; though we see by what passed afterwards that he never designed it.

The grand master's partiality to France.

HOWEVER, the viceroy, as well as his master, had just reason to complain against the order, for suffering the French ships to cruise even to the very chanel of Malta, and make prizes of their ships; and the grand master was loudly complained against for winking at it, insomuch that he was shrewdly suspected of being privately a favourer of the French court. To wipe off which aspersion, one of those French vessels having brought an Algerine prize into his port, the grand master charged the captain, and all the knights of the order, not to make any prizes or take up arms against Christian princes, as contrary to the design of their institution. He afterwards complained of it to the French king, and in the strongest terms, represented to him the discredit it was to his order, as well as the injury it did to commerce, to suffer the knights that fought under his banners to attack and carry off the Sicilian vessels as lawful prizes; and how much such a proceeding must exasperate the court of Spain against his whole order, and especially against himself, as acting in concert with its enemies. These representations, though they made a great noise, yet proved of little effect, either towards suppressing these abuses, or the clearing of him from the suspicion of being too partial to the French interest.

IN the same year Charolt, admiral of the Maltese gallies, made several considerable prizes on the Barbary corsairs, particularly on three large vessels belonging to Tripoli, which were sent to escorte a much greater number of other rich vessels, and whom he boarded at once, without the usual salute of a broadside. The engagement was fierce and bloody, the Turks having in their little fleet above 450 soldiers, commanded by a Marfilian renegado, named La Becasse, who had served a long while as pilot in the gallies of the order, and whose wife a wife and children were still in Malta; but who having been taken by the corsairs of Tripoli, was turned Mohammedan, and by his valour was now raised to the dignity of admiral.

IMMEDIATELY upon their boarding the Turkish gallies, Marcel de Chateaufneuf, brother to the commander of the St. Peter, attacked the renegado, mounted his ship sword in hand at the head of a number of other knights, and, having seized on the traitor, caused him to be conveyed into his brother's ship, where he had served as pilot, and where he was quickly clapped in irons, whilst he and the rest of his knights fell furiously on the Turks, and, after a long and sharp contest, made themselves masters of the ship. The other commanders were no less successful against those they attacked, insomuch that not one vessel, great or small, belonging to the Turkish fleet, escaped them, but were all brought safe to Malta by the victorious admiral, to the number of twenty, all richly laden. Besides the richness of the loading, they took 312 prisoners, and a number of Christian captives; but the prize cost the lives of several of their bravest commanders, besides a greater number of wounded; it being usual among those of the order to fight upon such encounters with much more heat than discretion.

WHILST this was transacting abroad, the bishop of Malta, desirous to increase the number of his clergy, made no scruple to ordain a great many young men, who seemed to take the habit merely to exempt themselves from the military duties and exercises to which the grand master had subjected the inhabitants. Complaints of it being sent to the courts Rome and Spain, the conduct of the bishop was highly blamed, and those new ecclesiastics condemned to perform the duties of their function, without being exempt from the military ones which were imposed on the seculars. This wise precaution put an end to that shameful practice, which there was then the greater necessity to suppress, as the island was in no small apprehension of a speedy visit from the Turks. However, though the pope indulged the order so far in that one instance, yet, in the main, he never departed from his unfriendly conduct towards them; and, in this very year, issued out a brief, by which the knights were impowered to make wills, and bequeath their effects to their relations, which was an expeditious way of ruining the public treasury, and was no less inconsistent with the institution and constant practice of the order, in virtue of the vow of poverty which they took at their first admission into it.

d By this time the jesuits, who, as we have lately observed, had been permitted to settle in the island, were become so obnoxious to the generality of the order, by the great influence they had gained over the grand master and principal commanders, that some of the younger knights took the advantage of the carnival season to go about masked in the habit of the society. These immediately brought their complaints of it to the grand master, who ordered them to be arrested, and closely confined; but their comrades came soon after, and, breaking the prison open, brought them out in triumph. Not content with this, they marched directly to the college, drove the jesuits out, and flung their books and other moveables out of the windows, and at length obliged the grand master to banish them out of the island. Eleven of them were accordingly forced to embark for Europe; and only four of them, who had concealed themselves in the new city, staid behind. This riot, however, was so far from being attended with any ill consequences, that the council, and the far greater part of the order, seemed to be well pleased that it had proved such an effectual means of ridding the island of a set of members, who, to their great dislike, had so long usurped a kind of sovereignty over their grand masters.

f THE prince of Hesse Darmstadt, commander of the Malthese gallies, sails to the very port of the Coletta, and brings away from thence six Barbary corsairs, into the port of Malta; a timely help this, considering that the order had scarcely received any part of its revenue during the space of 20 years, whilst the greater part of the French and Italian commanderies were in a great measure ruined through the wars that reigned; insomuch that the exchange was become extravagantly dear; which obliged the grand master, who still continued carrying on the fortifications of the island, to borrow the sum of 200,000 crowns from the bank of Genoa at the common interest, in order to complete them. On the year following, 1641, the Venetians sequestered afresh all the revenues of the order in their dominions; and Uladislav IV. king of Poland, insisted, by his letters to the grand master, that the grand commanderies in Bohemia should be in common between the Polish and Bohemian knights, as both belonged to the same tongue. These two difficulties contributed still more to embarrass the affairs of the order, which were yet more entangled in the following year, when Urban VIII. to prevent the league which was then forming in Italy, to invade the dominions of the duchy of Parma, sent to desire the grand master to assist him with some of his gallies; which he had no sooner completed, than he saw all the priories and revenues in the allied princes dominions seized by way of reprisal. It is easy to imagine what difficulties so many cross accidents must throw the Malthese council into, besides their continual apprehensions of a Turkish war.

However,

However, the grand master lost no time to disculpate this last step of his, which was taken a merely in obedience to the pontif, who was sovereign of the order ; and by assuring those princes, that he had given exprefs orders to his commanders to keep themselves on the defensive, according to the constant practice of it, which had always paid a due regard to the flag of all the Christian princes ; by which means he got those revenues restored quickly after.

In the year following the gallies of the order, being on the cruise, perceived a large Turkish ship in full sail, at about four leagues distance from them. The capitana, which was the foremost, and nearest to it, began to give it chace, and was soon after joined by the St. John and St. Joseph. The Turks soon put themselves in a posture of defence, and kept making a continual fire upon them, both from their artillery and small arms ; which did not however prevent its being stopped by the grappling irons of the pursuers, and as quickly boarded and b taken. Three other gallies, viz. the St. Laurence, St. Mary, and the Victory, met soon after with a large galleon of the same nation, which, to allure them, had concealed its strength and artillery, and seemed to wait patiently for them ; whereupon the St. Mary, which was the best manned, quickly got the start of her, and, without regarding the disparity between them, grappled and attacked her sword in hand, but met with a most obstinate resistance. The other two coming up to his assistance, a fresh combat began with great fury on both sides, which lasted almost seven hours, in which the Turkish commander and several of his officers were killed, before the rest would surrender. The number of the slain on both sides was very great ; the Maltese lost nine of their bravest knights, besides a greater number of wounded ; the Turks lost 600 men, the greater part of whom were made prisoners, and, among them, a c lady of the seraglio and her young son, who were making a religious voyage to Mecca. This son, whom she was said to have had by sultan Ibraim, was afterwards converted, and became a monk of the Dominican order. As for the cargo of the galleon, it proved to be of immense value, and of singular service towards reimbursing the public treasury for the vast expence it is obliged to be at in keeping up such considerable armaments. However, the joy which this valuable prize occasioned at Maltha was in a great measure damped by the news they heard soon after, that sultan Ibraim, to whom the galleon belonged, had vowed a terrible revenge against the whole order ; in consequence of which he sent the year following a herald to Maltha, to declare war against the grand master and the whole island.

*Ibraim resents
the loss of it, and declares

THIS alarm, though it proved a false one for the present, the storm having fallen elsewhere, d as we shall soon see, failed not to awaken the whole order, and put them upon making all the proper provisions to oppose so formidable a force as they were threatened with. The fortifications were carried on with the utmost vigour, the gallies employed in fetching all sorts of arms, ammunition, and provisions ; and the absent knights were every-where summoned to repair to the island, and to bring with them what volunteers and other forces they could get, to assist them in its defence. Among all those brave personages who signalized themselves upon this occasion, we cannot in justice omit mentioning the viscount Arpajon, a nobleman of one of the greatest families in France, who not only summoned all his vassals, but raised an army of 2000 men, armed and equipped them cap-à-pié, hired and loaded a great number of vessels with all necessaries for a war, embarked at the head of them, accompanied with a large train e of noble volunteers, and presented the order with such a considerable succour, as they could have hardly hoped for from any one crowned head. The grand master was so sensible of this important service, that, to gratify the viscount in the most honourable way he could, he nominated him generalissimo of all his forces, with full power of chusing two such lieutenant-generals as he thought fit, to command under him.

THIS dreaded storm, however, as we observed a little higher, instead of Maltha, fell upon the island of Candia, the success of which we have already seen in the Turkish history ; so that the grand master had nothing to do but to send his squadron of gallies to its assistance. As for the noble Arpajon, he took his leave of him with the most engaging politeness, and, with the consent of the council, presented him with an exprefs diploma of the order, by which he f and his eldest son were authorized to wear the golden cross ; one of his youngest sons was intitled, even in his minority, to be admitted into the order ; and, when of age, to wear the large cross ; and the heads of his family were from that time to wear it on their escutcheons, and in their coat of arms.

ON the year following the pope, at the request of the court of Spain, desired the grand master to admit Don Philip, the son of the king of Tunis, who had embraced the Christian religion, among the knights of the great cross. This request was however strongly opposed by the Maltese council, who thought it repugnant to the dignity of their order, that a Moor, whose conversion was still liable to suspicion, should have a rank among the pillars and principal members of it. In the course of the next, prince Maurice of Savoy g solicited the grand master and council in favour of Jacaya, who gave himself out to be a prince of the Othman family ; but they prudently declined engaging in his behalf, on account

- a account of the small likelihood there was of placing him on the Turkish throne, unless the greatest princes of Europe should declare themselves for him. In the same year, pope Innocent X. conferred the grand priory of Parma upon a young nephew of his sister-in-law, named Malda-Cbino. This fresh invasion of the rights of the order obliged the grand master to send ambassadors not only to the court of Rome, but likewise to some of the chief princes in Europe, to represent to them the impossibility of the order's subsisting much longer, or of their being able to protect the Christian religion and commerce, whilst their rights, privileges, and revenues, which were the sinews of their power, were thus suffered to be infringed. This year the order lost two considerable members, viz. the commander de Guise, who was killed by the bursting of a new cannon; and the admiral Jay, who was killed by a musket-shot from an
- b Algerine corsair, whom he had attacked in the chanel of Malta, as he was going to make reprisals on the Venetians for sequestering the revenues of the order. Another great loss they sustained by the treaties of Munster and Osnaburgh, which disposed of several of their grand commanderies in Germany in favour of Protestant princes.

- In this year the island of Malta, labouring under a grievous famine, was providentially relieved by a fresh supply of corn. The master of a Flemish vessel was met, in his return from Apulia, where he had bought 2000 loads, by the commander Cinqmar, who offered to buy it of him, which he absolutely refused; not long after which a violent storm obliged him to put into the harbour of Malta, where he was glad to dispose of it, to the great joy of the inhabitants. At the same time four other galleys of the order, having been on the cruise
- c in the Levant, returned to the port of Messina, where the government, being apprehensive lest they should seize on some of the vessels riding in the harbour, laden with corn for other countries, laid an embargo on one of their ships, called the St. Joseph, commanded by Don John de Bichi, of the Italian tongue, and let the other three sail away for Malta, with a letter to the grand master, importing, that they had secured the St. Joseph merely to prevent an insurrection among the people, who laboured under as great a scarcity of grain as he did; upon which, without expressing any resentment against the Messinian magistrates, he ordered the same ship to sail for port Augusta, whence they quickly returned laden with it; yet was this new supply so far from sufficient, that even their infirmary was in want of wheaten, and the convent reduced to barley bread, and the rest of the inhabitants to the greatest distress for
- d want of it. The grand master was obliged again to send out his galleys in quest of it; but forbade the commanders to come near the ports of Messina or Palermo. The fate of sultan Ibrahim, who was strangled this year, and his son Mohammed IV. raised to the throne, did not prevent the war in Candia from being carried on with as much vigour as ever; nor was the grand master negligent in sending his galleys thither, with such other succours as he had formerly furnished. In the following year was fought the famous battle of Foggia, at the mouth of the *Dardanel*s, in which the Venetians gave the Turks a signal overthrow.

The war in Candia continued.
1649.

- SEVERAL of the Maltese commanders signalized themselves at the siege of its capital, particularly their admiral Balbiano, a man of such experience and bravery, that the governor Mocenigo scarcely ever undertook any thing of moment without consulting him. The debate
- e being one day about recovering a half moon which the Turks had made themselves masters of, Balbiano immediately undertook the task, and, by the assistance of about 30 of his knights, and about 100 of his best soldiers, which he took out of the capitana, scaled the important work in the dead of the night, and, after a furious onset, forced the Turks to abandon the place, with the utmost confusion and precipitation; an enterprize which was admired even by the very enemy. The besiegers, emulous to retrieve their honour, endeavoured with a much greater number of men to recover it from them; to facilitate which, the basha caused a mine to be sprung, which blew up several Maltese knights, particularly one named Fales, a gentleman of a great family in Switzerland, who was buried up above the middle, but was immediately dug up, and helped the rest to repulse the enemy, and drive them off with
- f great loss.

ALL this while the scarcity continued raging at Malta; and corn became so excessive dear, and difficult to be procured, that the treasury was almost exhausted, to prevent the inhabitants from perishing through want; notwithstanding which, the grand master found means to raise a stout fort, called the castle of St. Agatha, on the coast of Melecha, which lay most exposed to the descents of the Algerine and other corsairs; put a good garrison into it, and caused it to be well provided with necessary stores, both for war and for the mouth.

- In the next year, when he sent to Sicily for the usual supplies, he was not a little surprised to find the viceroy as stiff in refusing them as ever, under pretence that he could not suffer
- g either corn or biscuit to be exported without manifest detriment to his Spanish majesty's subjects. This obliged him to have recourse to Don John of Austria, to whom he sent an extraordinary embassy for that purpose. Don John soon removed those obstacles by his authority; but that did not prevent the viceroy's making very loud complaints against the grand master, who, it a seems, still suffered the French gallies, under command of knights of the same nation, to make frequent prizes of those of Spain and Sicily; and insisting on that as a sufficient reason for his forbidding any provisions from being carried out of his government into Maltha. These complaints were carried on by both sides with much vehemence, and made a great noise in other European courts for a considerable while; notwithstanding which, we do not find that the grand master took any proper measure to prevent his French knights from infringing his former prohibitions, as well as the statutes of their order. This year a resolution having passed thro' the council, of erecting a library in the new city of Valetta, a regulation was made by it, that all the books, which should be found among the effects of a deceased knight, should not be sold with them, but sent to Maltha, to be deposited in the said library. b

A large prize taken.

In the year following, the Maltese gallies took a considerable prize off cape Bona, a large English vessel, freighted for the Turks of Barbary, in which they took about thirty-two prisoners, and, among them, prince Mehemed Ben Tbesi, the son of the emperor of Morocco and Fez, then about 21 years of age; soon after which they sailed away to join those of the pope and Venetians. At the same time the Spanish and Sicilian courts, being more and more exasperated at the continual prizes which the French made of their ships, issued an express order, that all the lands and revenues within that kingdom, belonging to the order, should be sequestered, and that no Maltese ship should be admitted into their port, or be furnished with any kind of provisions. This obliged the grand master to have recourse to his former palliatives, and to renew his express prohibitions against those unlawful practices, under the severest penalties; and, to shew himself now in earnest, he strictly enjoined the commanders in all the ports of Maltha and Gosa to keep off all those privateers far enough from this coast; and to fire on them if they offered to come into any of the harbours of either island; which order was so punctually executed, that Don John of Austria, the Spanish generalissimo, was satisfied with it, and ordered the embargo and sequestration to be taken off. On the other hand, the pope, being informed that the number of slaves belonging to the Maltese gallies was considerably lessened, through their constant courses to and from Candia, made the grand master a present of 250 of his own, to supply their place. c

The isles of St. Christopher, &c. bought by the order. 1652.

In the next year the grand master ordered a new galley to be built, and to be added to the other six; and much about the same time the order made a new purchase of the island of St. Christopher, by a contract made with the king of France, and ratified at Maltha by the grand master, and principal officers of the order. The conditions on which this cession was made from the former to the latter were contained in the two following articles; viz. d

FIRST, That the order should engage to pay all the debts due from the company of proprietors to the inhabitants of the islands. 2dly, That they should pay the sum of 125,000 livres (French) for the purchase of the said island of St. Christopher, and those of St. Martin, St. Bartholomew, St. Cross, and some other small ones, together with all lands, houses, negroes, merchandize, provisions, ammunition, &c. which purchase was afterwards ratified and confirmed on both sides accordingly; soon after which the grand master appointed his nephew, the chevalier de Sales, to go and take possession of them in the name of the order, and to assist Mons. de Poincy to regulate the government, &c. of those islands, that commander being very old, and in a declining state. As for the pretended effects of that old knight, who died quickly after, they were found to be so far from answering the account he had given of them, that nothing appeared but debts which he had contracted, in order to keep himself in his government; but the purchase made amends for the want of effects to pay them. e

In the next year happened an engagement between the Maltese squadron, whose crew of rowing slaves was considerably weakened by a contagious distemper which was got among them, and three vessels belonging to Tripoli, which they met in the chanel of Maltha. After some mutual cannonading, the Maltese admiral, not finding himself strong enough to oppose them, dispatched a light vessel to the island, to obtain a reinforcement. This action caused f a general murmuring and dislike among the order, that being, it seems, the first time that any Maltese gallies had cannonaded an enemy a whole day, without attempting to board him; upon which the grand master sent him a fresh number of gallies well manned, with ten knights in each of them, to his assistance. But a favourable wind, which arose in the middle of the night, gave the infidels an opportunity to sail away unperceived; so that by the next morning they were got quite out of sight, and the squadron was obliged to return without success, to the great mortification of the grand master, who was in great expectations to see his grand nephew, who commanded it, enter the port victorious, and laden with plunder. In the same year happened a notable contest at the court of Spain, between the ambassador of the order and that of the duke of Tuscany, about precedence, which was at length decided in favour g of the former, who was, by the peculiar privileges granted by several popes to the former grand masters, allowed to take place of those of all other princes who did not bear the royal title.

- a In the year following the order was in no small danger of having all their lands and revenues in France confiscated by the incensed French monarch. We have seen lately, that the grand master had been obliged, through the frequent complaints and threats of the Spanish court, to forbid all French ships to land in the island. A violent storm having thrown the French fleet upon the coasts, it was forced to retire by the fire which the grand master ordered to be made upon it from his artillery. This affront was highly resented by the French monarch; and his courtiers represented it as a crime amounting to no less than high treason against his person, and easily persuaded him to sequester all the lands and priories of the order to his own use. The grand master used all proper means to justify what he had done, affirming that it was pursuant to the engagements laid upon the order by the emperor Charles V. a copy of whose grant he sent to the French court by the baily de Souvre, his ambassador. The matter was at length compromised, by the address and mediation of the then secretary of state, whom the grand master had lately obliged, by admitting a young son of his, a minor, into the order, and bestowing a rich commandery upon him; and had no farther consequence.

The French
gallies fired upon at Maltha.

- In this year the Genoese ordered five gallies to be seized in their port, for having entered it without saluting their fleet; and contented themselves with paying that honour to the city and the Spanish capitana, whilst the magistrates sent them word, that, if they continued in their refusal, they would cause their artillery to fire upon them, and tear them in pieces; upon which the Maltese admiral was obliged to comply, to save his squadron, and sailed out soon after, with full resolution to be revenged upon them. He fired accordingly on the first ship he met with, which bore the colours of that republic; but, upon his being informed that it was only a merchantman, he contented himself with tearing its flag in pieces, in hopes of finding some more worthy object upon which he might wreak his resentment. The grand master and council, on their part, passed a decree not long after, that no Genoese should be admitted into their order, till that republic had made them ample satisfaction for the affront offered their squadron.

gallies affront-
1655.

- In the same year the gallies of the order having joined the Venetian fleet consisting of 24 gallies, seven galleasses, and 28 other high vessels, under the command of the famed Lau-rence Marcello, at the mouth of the *Dardanel*s, gained a complete victory over the Turks, which was followed by the reduction of the island of Tenedos. In the same year died the duke of Ossuna, viceroy of Sicily, and was succeeded by the commander Martin de Redino, of the tongue of Arragon, who sailed soon after to that island, to take possession of his new government. About the same time a young Turkish gentleman, who passed for the son of Soltan Ibrahim, together with Mehemed Ben Thesi, the son of the king of Fez and Morocco, were publicly baptized at Malta.

The Turkish fleet twice defeated.

- In the year following, the Maltese squadron joined again the Venetian fleet, commanded by Don Lazaro de Mecenigo, in the chanel of Jaro, in order to prevent that of the Turks, commanded by the grand vizier Mohammed, recovering the island of Tenedos. They were joined by the pope's gallies, commanded by the grand prior Bicchi; soon after which, a fresh and fierce engagement ensued, in which the Turks were again defeated with great loss. This new victory was unanimously ascribed to the bravery and dexterity of the Maltese admiral; and the Venetian admiral sent to compliment him upon it; but having soon after closely pursued some of the Turkish vessels which had sheltered themselves under the cannon of the neighbouring fortresses, he had the misfortune to receive a cannon-ball into his ship, the St. Barbara, which setting it on fire, quickly blew it up, together with the Venetian admiral, and about 700 men that were in it. The Christian fleet retired soon after, each to their respective homes, which gave the Turks an opportunity of recovering the island of Tenedos.

- The next year was attended by the death of the grand master Lascharis, in the 97th year of his age, and the 21st of his government, over whose remains Lascharis, his grand nephew, caused a stately mausoleum to be erected, with a suitable inscription, in the chapel belonging to the tongue of Provence, in the great church of St. John. Two factions immediately started up, the one for Martin Redin de Navarre, then in his government of Sicily; and the other, which called itself the flying squadron, consisted of ancient knights of the great cross, headed by the grand inquisitor Odi, who was an enemy to Redin, and who, to oppose his election, produced a brief from the court of Rome, which declared any knight, who had been guilty of bribery or corruption, incapable to succeed to that grand dignity, as being a simoniac, which crime he intended to fix upon him. Redin was nevertheless chosen by a great majority, in spite of all the cabals of the inquisitor and his party. These protested against the election; but Redin took care to be beforehand with them, and sent the whole process of it to Rome; to which he added a solemn declaration, that if his election was not acceptable to his holiness, he would cheerfully renounce it: but the pope, in no way inclined to follow the passionate steps of his inquisitor, and vexed that he should have opposed the election of so worthy a knight, and minister of the king of Spain, quickly dispatched a brief to him, a by which he confirmed the election, and ordered him to carry it himself to the grand council; so that he, who had so strenuously oppo'd it, had the mortification to be the person appointed to declare his holiness's approbation of it. With this brief arrived Bicchi, the pope's nephew, and admiral of his galleys, who complimented the new grand master in his uncle's name; in gratitude for which honour he was by him presented with the grand commandery of Polizi, in Sicily, and, at his departure, with a large cross of the order enriched with diamonds.

1659. ONE of the first public acts of the grand master was, to secure the island from the descent of the infidels, by night especially; to which end he ordered strong towers to be built at proper distances along the coasts, into which the peasants of the island retired, and kept watch by turns; and settled a fund out of his own coffers for the maintenance of those that were employed to mount the guard, and to watch their respective coasts by night. He had the pleasure soon after to see his antagonist Odi recalled, and succeeded by Casanetta, a person more acceptable to him; but though the pope was thus complaisant to him in this respect, he was no less injurious to him and the order, by bestowing the richest commanderies in Italy upon his nephews. This did not hinder their joining their squadron with his, and making jointly several considerable prizes on the Turkish corsairs in the following year, and taking a sufficient number of prisoners to reinforce the crew of the Maltese squadron, which a contagious disease lately mentioned had greatly weakened. In their course they received a letter at one of the Dardanel islands, from the Venetian admiral, importing, that the Turkish fleet was retired to Rhodes, whence it was to sail soon after for Constantinople, and inviting them to come and join his fleet, and share with him the glory of defeating that of the Turks. Unluckily they met, in their way to him, three Turkish gallies, which they immediately prepared to engage; one of them, however, escaped by dint of its oars, the other ran aground, and one of them was taken; of which the grand prior Bicchi, the pope's admiral, had no sooner made himself master, than he resolved to sail with it to Civita Vecchia, in spite of all that Mandolx, the Maltese commander, could urge against it. After many warm expostulations, he found him inflexibly bent upon returning home; and, not daring to hazard the pope's squadron to sail without him, lest it should be attacked by the Turkish corsairs, he took the same rout, till they were got out of danger; after which the two squadrons parted each for its own port.

THE next year, 1660, was remarkable for the peace which was concluded between France and Spain, which freed the grand master from the difficulties he had laboured under, as well as his predecessor, during the war; and gave him an opportunity of maintaining that neutrality between Christian princes, which the institution of the order laid him indispensably under. But he did not long enjoy his happiness, before he was taken off, on the 6th of February, in the third year of his grand mastership, by a violent fit of the stone, which, when extracted, weighed four ounces: his character, signal services, and the various dignities which he had enjoyed, are expressed in the epitaph which was afterwards engraven on his monument.

57. Annet de Clermont. HE was succeeded with the unanimous consent of the electors by Annet de Clermont de Chattes Gessan, grand baily of Lyons, a person of a most illustrious family in High Dauphiny, and whose ancestors had been sovereigns of a territory between that and Piedmont, with the title of viscounts of Clermont. His piety, wisdom, and valour, gave the whole order great hopes of his future government; when the Divine Providence was pleased to dash them at once by his unexpected death, which happened four months after his election, occasioned, as was thought, by the wounds which he received at the taking of Mabametta, formerly mentioned, and which now opened afresh, and, to the inexpressible sorrow of the order, deprived them of him on the second of June, in the 73d year of his age.

58. Raphael Cotoner. HE was, after much caballing, succeeded by Raphael Cotoner; grand baily of Majorca; who was accordingly proclaimed and installed on the fourth of June, with the usual solemnities. By this time the war between the Venetians and the Turks was at the height, and the former were forced to apply themselves to most of the European princes for assistance. Lewis of France had already sent them 3600 troops ever since the latter end of April, and pope Alexander VII. in conjunction with the new grand master, sent a number of their galleys to join their fleet. The design of the confederates was to recover the city of Canea, in the island of Candia, from the Turks; but as they had not a sufficient number of land-forces to form the regular siege of it, nor any likelihood of surprising it, they began with attempting several strong forts in the neighbourhood of it. We shall refer our readers for the sequel of this campaign to what hath been already said in the Turkish history; and only add, that the Maltese signalized themselves in it according to their wonted bravery, though the success of it did not answer their valour and conduct.

a THEY proved more fortunate in the following year, 1661, in their sea-excursions, when, at the very beginning of it, their admiral took a rich prize belonging to Tunis, near Cape Pafaro in Sicily, in which, besides the cargo, they took 130 prisoners, among whom were the Cadi of Tunis, and his son, and a Turkish Chiaux, who had been carrying the grand signor's orders to all the regencies on the coast of Barbary.

ABOUT the same time, another of their gallies, commanded by one Gavie, a servant at arms, took such another vessel near Tripoli, which had on board 150 janissaries, who were sent to reinforce the garrison of Gigobarta, a stout fortress on the coast of Barbary. About the middle of April came into the port of Malta another servant at arms, named Paul, with three gallies belonging to the French king, and met with a most gracious reception from the grand master.

b ALL this while the Maltese gallies assigned to the assistance of Candia, sailed regularly thither every year, and about this time had joined those of the pope, commanded by Bichi, near Augusta; from whence they moved towards the Venetian fleet, which they met near the isle of Andros, and all three of them went in search of that of the Turks, but without success; so that after a long cruise, without being able to get any tidings of it, they thought proper to separate, and return to their respective homes. The Maltese squadron, unwilling to come empty-handed, attacked in their way two Turkish galliots, of which, after a fierce and bloody struggle, they made themselves masters, and brought them home with them. In this year, according to most authors, the senate of Venice, to express their gratitude for the signal services which they had received from the Maltese, passed an act, that the knights of the order should be allowed to appear in their proper arms both in their capital, and in all the other parts of their dominions; a privilege which is denied to the subjects of that republic, though of small service towards the reimbursing their treasury for the expence they were yearly at in sending so many ships to their assistance; yet such was the grand master's œconomy, that he found means not only to maintain that squadron for their service, but likewise to enlarge the infirmary, and to present the grand priory of St. John with stately pictures, and other ornaments of great value, to embellish the church of it, and which are still there to be seen, as so many monuments both of his piety and munificence.

c ALL this while the distressed Venetians were soliciting the pope and him, more and more pressingly, for their early supply; but whilst the Maltese squadron was waiting for that of the pope, news came that he had ordered it to stay at Civita Vecchia, to screen them from the French king's resentment, whose ambassador and his lady that pontif's garde de corps had insulted in a singular manner; upon which they were ordered to set sail from Malta on the 15th of January of the following year, under the conduct of the commander Breslaw, who took some small prizes in his way, which he sent to Malta, whilst he proceeded with his squadron to join the Venetian fleet. Upon their arrival near the isle of Andros, on the 22d of May, they were informed by the Venetian admiral Morofini, that the Turkish fleet had not sailed out that year; so that they had nothing to do but scour along their coasts, and make what prizes they could upon them.

d WHILST they were thus employed at sea, the grand master was carried off by a malignant fever, which had raged some time in the island, and more particularly in the city of Valetta, in the month of October, in the 3d year of his grand mastership. His remains were deposited with the usual solemnity in the chapel belonging to the Arragonian tongue, of which he was; on whose tomb the knights of that tongue caused a noble inscription to be engraved.

e HE was succeeded, with the unanimous consent of the electors, by his worthy brother Nicolas Cotoner, then grand prior of Majorca; a thing which never happened since the foundation of the order. But his merit was so universally known, that all the voters and electors declared themselves for him as soon as his elder brother expired; so that they proceeded to the ceremony of election only for form's sake; and when Don Emanuel Arrias proclaimed him to the rest of the order, the news of it was received with the sincerest applause.

f ONE of his first cares, was to suppress the insolence of the Barbary corsairs, who were grown so numerous and bold during the Candian war, that they extended their excursions and ravages as far as the coasts of Provence and Languedoc. Hitherto the Maltese gallies had been mostly employed in assisting the Venetians in Candia; but now, at the desire of the French king, Lewis XIV. they were sent to assist his forces in his expedition into Africa, the ill success of which, through the want of a sufficient number of French forces to support it, we have already given an account of.

g IN the following year the islands of St. Christopher, Bartholomew, &c. were sold again by the order to a company of French merchants, who put themselves under the protection of their native prince. At the same time, whilst the Maltese squadron was scouring the Archipelago, without meeting any Turkish vessels, or making any considerable prizes, two young knights of the order signalized themselves on the coasts of Barbary and the Levant; the one named Crainville, commanded a galley of forty guns, called the Dutch Garden, which he had taken the year before from an Algerine corsair, though with only a frigate of 22 guns, which the other knight, named Temericourt, was then commander of. These two met in the chanel of the isle of Samos a caravan going from Alexandria to Constantinople, consisting of 10 large vessels and 12 saics. The first thing they did, was to get into the midst of them, and to make a continual brisk fire upon them, by which they sunk some, took four of the richest, and put the rest to flight.

The noble defence and escape of the commander Hoquincourt.

IN the same year another Maltbese knight, named Hoquincourt, signalized himself in a most surprising manner in the port of the Dolphine Island, where he was at once surrounded by the whole Turkish fleet, consisting of 33 gallies, which were transporting fresh troops into that of Candia. The Turkish admiral had ordered a continual fire to be made upon him by his best gallies, both from the great and small artillery, till they had in a great measure destroyed the tackle and rigging of his ship, and killed a great number of his men, after which he commanded some of his stoutest men to board him. Hoquincourt stood all the while upon deck like a man invulnerable, with his sabre in his hand; and his men following his example, threw down the Turks into the sea as fast as they mounted, to such a prodigious degree, that it was with great difficulty that the admiral could make the rest to follow them. Provoked at length at such a brave resistance, he ordered the gallies to open a way for his capitana to come up to him; which he did with such force, by dint of rowing, that he did not doubt but the violence of the shock would have shattered Hoquincourt's ship, already damaged to a great degree by his artillery, into pieces: instead of which, it only helped to push it with greater force out of the haven into the open sea, where plying all the sail he had left, he safely got into the nearest Christian port, after having sunk several of the enemy's ships, and killed above 600 of their soldiers. This brave commander had no sooner refitted his ship than he sailed out again, and in that same campaign was shipwrecked near the isle of Scarpanto, and perished with all his company, to the number of 170 persons. About the same time the duke of Beaufort, high admiral of France, who had commanded the late unhappy expedition in Barbary, landed at Malta, and was saluted by all the artillery of the city; as was not long after M. de la Haye, the French ambassador at Constantinople; but the grand master declined seeing the former, because he did not think proper to give him the title of highness.

NOTHING happened considerable to the order on the following year, except the accession of Don Carlos to the crown of Spain, by the demise of Don John of Austria, which obliged the grand master to receive a new investiture, in the usual form, from the duke of Sermonetta, viceroy of Sicily; soon after which the admiral of the Maltbese gallies was sent with his squadron to Barcelona, to escort the Spanish infanta, now empress, to his imperial majesty, who had only married her by proxy; and who, upon her landing at Final, sent a most obliging letter of thanks to the grand master, for the good offices she had received from the admiral. The pope, this year, pursuant to the example of his predecessors, disposed of some more rich commanderies in favour of his relations and favourites, to the great prejudice and mortification of the order.

Achmet comes to the siege of Candia.

IN the year following, the grand vizier Achmet, being come in person to put an end to the Candian war, and to the siege of the capital of that island, the Venetians had recourse, as usual, to the pope and grand master, who dispatched their respective squadrons accordingly to their assistance; soon after which Alexander died, and was succeeded by Clement IX. who gave fresh cause of complaint to the order by his infractions on their rights. On the other hand, the prince landgrave of Hesse, cardinal and grand prior of Germany, came to an agreement with the grand pensionary of Holland, the lord John de Vigers, about the lands and revenues belonging to the order in the great commandery of Harlem, situate in the province of Holland, which the states of that province had seized upon. By these agreements the said states of Holland and West Friesland engaged to pay to the order the sum of 150,000 florins, in consideration of which the grand master and the other were to renounce all farther property and pretensions on those lands, &c. that were situate within those two provinces only, without including those which they had in other dominions of that republic, and of which they should be still allowed to insist, and endeavour their restitution, or to exchange them for an equivalent. This agreement was chiefly transacted by the mediation of the French king, and negotiated by his minister in Holland, the count d'Estrade.

A fierce engagement with 2 Turkish sultanas.

AMONG other extraordinary succours which were sent by several European princes into Candia, the grand master dispatched a battalion of 400 men, under the command of Hector de la Fay, who having lost a good number of them, immediately after his arrival, by the contagious disease that then reigned, thought it adviseable to save himself and the rest, by leaving a place whose infection was capable of destroying all the forces that were sent to its assistance, and sailed back with them for Malta. In this year happened likewise a fierce engagement between a brother of the knight Temericourt, lately mentioned, who was licensed to cruise under Maltbese colours, and

- a and two Turkish sultanas bound for Alexandria, richly laden. His galley being a brisker sailer, he easily got before them, in order to stop their entrance into the mouth of the Nile, and immediately saluted the foremost with a broad-side. He was preparing to board her, when he received a musket-shot in the head, which threw him flat on the deck, but did not prevent his inspiring his officers and soldiers to continue the fight. The Turks finding themselves fast grappled beyond the possibility of escaping, whilst the Christians poured in upon them with incredible speed and bravery, were just upon the point of surrendering, when the Turkish commander ordered a lighted match to be clapt to their powder, in order to blow up both together. The chevalier de Barre, who was in another Maltese galley, and engaged with the other sultana, seeing the danger his friend's ship was in, abandoned the sultana, to go and save the Maltese, which was already set on fire by parting it from the Turkish and quenching its flames. The success, however, did not answer his bravery; his friend Temericourt's brother died soon after of his wound, and the other sultana, which he had engaged, took the opportunity of his being otherwise employed to give him the slip.

- THE peace which was concluded the following year between the Turks and Venetians, upon the loss of Candia, and the constant assistance which the order had sent to the latter, during the war, gave them new cause to apprehend the resentment of the former, and that it would not be long before the sultan turned his whole force against them; to be therefore prepared against it at all adventures, the grand master sent for an excellent engineer, named Valpergo, from Savoy, to whom he committed the repairing of the old, and the addition of such new fortifications, as he thought necessary to secure the island, and especially the port, against any invasion. This gentleman, having taken a view of the port, caused several new outworks to be made in it. One fort was called, from the grand master, Cotonero; another Ricasoli, from one of the commanders, who gave 30,000 crowns towards the building of it.

- In the next year Clement X. having succeeded Clement IX. at Rome, sent an embassy to Malta, as was usual, to notify his election to the papacy, and at the same time to congratulate and commend the grand master for his care in fortifying an island which was the bulwark of Christendom; yet did not this hinder the pontif's bestowing the reversion of the grand priory of France on the knight of Vendosme, maugre all the opposition of the grand master and the whole order against that infringement. In the same year, prince Charles of Lorraine, son to the duke d'Elbeuf, and some other persons of distinction, were admitted into the order. About this time the number of the servants at arms being become excessive, the council made a decree against admitting any new ones till farther order.

- A GREAT scarcity being felt soon after through most part of Italy, and the pope being obliged to send his galleys out in quest of corn, he wrote to the grand master, to send some of his to escort them; which was readily complied with, and the command of them given to some of the most distinguished commanders. About the same time the brave Temericourt, being cruising in one of his own galleys, was attacked by no less than five large corsairs of Tripoli, against whom he made such a noble defence, and such dreadful havock among their men, that they were glad to save the rest by a hasty flight. But he was soon after overtaken by a sudden storm, which drove him against the coasts of Barbary, where his ship was dashed in pieces, himself taken prisoner, and sent to Tripoli, and thence to Adrianople, where Mohammed III. asked him whether he alone had beat the five large Tripolitan vessels? To which he boldly answered in the affirmative. Being asked what countryman he was, he told him he was a Frenchman. Thou must then be a deserter, said the sultan, for there is a solemn peace between the king thy master and me. To which Temericourt replied, I am indeed a Frenchman, but, what is still more, I am a knight of Malta, and am obliged by my profession to hazard my life against all the enemies of the Christian faith. The sultan, who admired his bravery, and was willing to engage him in his service, sent him at first to a prison, where he was treated with great humanity, and made him several advantageous offers, capable, as he imagined, to tempt so young a warrior, who was then, it seems, no more than 22 years of age, and, amongst them, he offered to marry him to a princess of the blood, if he would consent to turn Mohammedan. Finding him inflexible to all these promises, he resolved to try what effect a contrary treatment would have upon him, and ordered him to be remov'd into a dungeon, and kept him there a whole fortnight. He moreover caused him to be severely bastinadoed, and afterwards tortured, even to have some of his limbs mutilated; all which he bore with an heroic constancy, begging of Christ to enable him to confirm him in his resolution of dying a martyr to his faith. The tyrant, exasperated at his firmness, did not suffer him to wait long for that blessing, but ordered him to be brought out and beheaded, and his body to be thrown into the river that runs through the city, to prevent the Christians paying any veneration to it.

- g In the following year there happened a fierce contest between the commanders belonging to the French king and those of the order, about the salute; which, being brought at length before that monarch, the commander Hautefeuille, then ambassador at his court from the grand grand master, prevailed upon him, by his address and interest, to decide in favour of the order. Much about the same time a far more momentous controversy happened between the latter and prince Demetrius, about the lands and effects of the late duke of Ostrog, which he had, with the consent of the Polish senate, bequeathed to the order ever since the year 1618. That noble family now being extinct by the death of prince Alexander Ostrog, prince Lubomirski immediately informed the grand master of it, who sent him back letters of attorney, empowering him to defend the rights of the order against the said prince Demetrius's pretensions, who claimed that estate in right of his wife, who was sister, and, as he thence concluded, heiress, to the duke Alexander above-mentioned. Soon after this, the Mainots, a sort of mongrel Greeks of Morea, pretending to be weary of the Turkish tyranny, sent a deputation, to beg the assistance of the order to enable them to recover their liberty; upon which the grand master forthwith ordered the Maltese gallies to sail thither; but, upon their arrival, the commander found the people so divided, some being for shaking off the Turkish yoke, others for continuing patiently under it, that they were obliged to sail back without effecting any thing.

THIS year the viceroy of Sicily having sent to desire the assistance of the order, the grand master dispatched his squadron thither, in which a great number of knights of the great cross zealously embarked, as subjects of the king of Spain; soon after which the commander de Valbelle brought a new one, with fresh succours from France. The grand master about the same time settled a fund, out of his own private purse, for the maintenance of the fort Ricasoli, lately erected in the isle of Maltha.

The English fleet well received at Maltha.

IN the following year, king Charles II. having declared war against the Algerines, the English fleet came into the port of Maltha, where they met with a kind and honourable reception, for which our polite monarch sent the grand master a most obliging letter of thanks. The viceroy of Naples having formed a design of employing the Maltese gallies and succours against the Messenians, the grand master thought fit to countermand his orders; and to let that minister know, that it was inconsistent with the design and statutes of his order to intermeddle in any war between any Christian princes; and that, from the beginning of its institution, none of them had ever fought against any but infidels. The same year arrived at Maltha Frederic de Mogelin, ambassador from the crown of Poland, with a letter to the grand master, importing, that his dominions being terribly harrassed by the frequent incursions which the Turks made into them, he should be highly obliged to him and the order if he would please to send some powerful diversion into the Turkish territories. To which Cotoner answered, with his usual politeness, that, complying with his Polish majesty's desires, he should only fulfil the obligations which his profession laid him under, his order having been always ready to assist Christian princes against the infidels; and that in conformity to his majesty's wishes, he would immediately order his armaments to be considerably augmented, that he might render their service more effectual to him. In the same year he caused the foundation for a new lazaretto to be laid in the castle of Marza Muzet, which hath been since that time fortified with several strong bastions, and other outworks.

A grievous
pestilence rages
in the island.
1676.

A GRIEVOUS pestilence, which had begun to rage about the latter end of the last year, continued to make such havock both in the island and in the convent, that they could hardly find a sufficient number of forces in the former to man their caravans, and were obliged to lessen the number of knights in each galley from 21, the usual number before the plague, to 11 in the capitana, and nine in each of the rest. About the same time the dignity of grand marshal being become vacant, and claimed by two considerable commanders of equal merit and pretensions, the one named Macsonseule, and the other Gerlande, both of the tongue of Auvergne, the contest being likely to rise to a dangerous height, and the grand master unable to decide it, he be-thought himself of an effectual expedient to end it amicably, by ordering that each party should enjoy it alternately only, from month to month.

ABOUT two years after, during which interval we do not read of any thing material that happened at Maltha, the former of the competitors died, and the latter sailed out with his squadron of five gallies; and meeting with two Algerine corsairs near cape Passaro, fell a cannonading them without attempting to board them. This occasioned a general murmur in the convent, which began now to wish he had died instead of the other. A complaint was preferred against him in the council at his return, when he got himself off, by alleging, that the wind was full against him, and would not suffer him to approach the enemy. Soon after this, Peter Fletcher, a Majorcan privateer, sunk another Algerine, out of which he saved 100 Turkish soldiers, whom he went and sold at Maltha for 100 piasters per head. About the same time Don John of Austria, grand prior of Castile, being dead, the grand master and council were consulting to alienate about 8000 ducats per annum of the revenue of that vast rich priory in favour of some of their favourites; of which the king of Spain, who lays claim to the sole patronage of it, being apprised, expressly forbade their lessening, in any instance, the income of that overgrown benefice; with which injunction they were obliged to comply.

a IN the next year, a peace being happily concluded between Spain and France, by the marriage of the princels Maria Louisa, eldest daughter of the duke of Orleans, Don John de Villa Viciosa was sent by the grand master on an ambassy, to congratulate the Spanish monarch upon it, and took that opportunity to obtain from him a fresh supply of corn for the island of Malta, which began to labour under a great scarcity. The peace concluded with France. 1679.

IN this year the grand master, who had been for several years afflicted with a paralytic disease, fell into a complication of the stone and gout, accompanied by a lingering fever, which gradually exhausted his strength, without diminishing any thing of his usual vigilance and application; till a dysentery, which ensued some time after, obliged him to keep his bed, and to nominate Don Orlando Seralto, grand prior of Catalonia, for his successor. He languished till the 29th of April of the same year, and expired in the 73d year of his age, and 17th of his government, greatly regretted by the whole order. His remains were deposited, with the usual ceremonies, in the chapel belonging to the tongue of Arragon, and over his stately tomb was engraven an epitaph. Death of the grand master. 1680.

THE choice of a successor, after a great deal of caballing and bribery, which began during the late grand master's sickness, fell upon Don Gregory Carafa, a Neapolitan, to the great joy of the Italian tongue, who had not seen an Italian chosen to that dignity during the space of one hundred and twenty-eight years. One of his first cares was, to complete the fortifications of the island, which his predecessor had not been able to finish, and to rectify some abuses which had crept into the order during his long sickness. In the following year he had the pleasure to see the admiral Carrea return with six Algerine vessels which he had taken, by his address and bravery, when they thought themselves almost sure of him. He resigned soon after his place to the baily Colbert. In the year following the vice-chancellor Arrias resigned that office into the grand master's hand, after having enjoyed it above twenty years with great integrity and reputation, and was succeeded by the commander Carrero. About the same time father Jerom Molina, bishop of Malta, was, at the grand master's recommendation, presented to the bishoprick of Lerida by the king of Spain, and succeeded by David Cocco Palmieri, a person highly esteemed for his probity. The grand master having received a letter from Lewis XIV. notifying the birth of his grandson the duke of Burgundy, caused the usual rejoicings to be celebrated through the island, in which the knights of the three French tongues signalized themselves in an extraordinary manner. Soon after which, the dukes of Gaufren and Berwick landed at Malta, the latter of whom was admitted into the order, and presented with the great cross, together with the grand priory of England. 60. Greg. Carafa. 1681.

IN the following year happened the memorable victory over the Turks, and the raising of the siege of Vienna, which was followed by the Christian league against them, set on foot by pope Innocent XI. into which the grand master readily came, and ordered very great preparations to be made for the prosecution of the war; soon after which the Maltese squadron sailed out, under the command of the baily of St. Stephen, which spread a general terror over all the coasts of Barbary, and he drove the Turks out of the islands of Previsa and St. Maur. 1682.

THE year following, the Maltese squadron, commanded by Hector de la Tour, being joined by that of the pope and the Venetian fleet commanded by signor Morosini, sailed directly to Coron, a sea-port in Morea, and, after a brisk and bloody siege, in which the knights of the order greatly signalized themselves, and their general de la Tour lost his life, made themselves masters of the place. All this while the grand master caused the new fortifications to be carried on with all possible diligence: so that they, especially those of the castles of St. Elmo and St. Angelo, were in a great measure completed by the following year. Coron, &c. taken from the Turks. 1683.

THE squadron of the order sailed out again in the beginning of the following spring, under the command of their new general Orbestine, grand prior of Hungary, and, in conjunction with the confederate fleet, went and besieged Old Navarin, another sea-port, about 12 miles from Coron; and, next to that, the New Navarin, a place of great importance, not only on account of its advantageous situation, but likewise for the conveniency of its haven in the gulph of Zunto. Both places were well fortified, and defended by a good garrison, yet were both surrendered to the Venetian general in a few days; after which the whole fleet sailed to Modon, in the same peninsula, but much stronger than any of the former, and in the attack of which a good number of knights lost their lives; but the place was, after a stout defence, forced likewise to surrender. This success encouraged the confederates to attempt the reduction of Neapoli de Romania, capital of Morea. The place was accordingly besieged in form on the 30th of July. The seraskier tried in vain to succour the place, and was three times repulsed with loss; and 19 knights of the order, with a great number of their troops, were slain, either in those attacks, or at the siege. The city at length surrendered, after a month's defence; after which the Maltese squadron parted from the rest, and sailed homewards. In the same year the pope, to shew his grateful regard for the order, bestowed the cardinal's hat upon Don Fortunatus Carafa, brother to the grand master, Francis de Medicis, grand prior of Pisa, and Leopold Kottonitsch, bishop of Newstadt, all of the order. Modon, &c. taken. 1685.

Descent into Dalmatia.
1687.

IN the following year, the grand master ordered eight gallies to be equipt for that campaign, the command of which he gave to the chevalier Claude de Mechatein; these, in conjunction with the confederate fleet, made a descent on Dalmatia, laid siege to Castle Novo, the surrender of which rendered the Venetians masters of the whole Adriatic gulph. The knights signalized themselves in this siege to such a degree, that the pope wrote a letter of thanks to the grand master, full of encomiums on their bravery, and the great services they had done at that siege.

1688.

The following year produced nothing interesting at Malta, except some considerable promotions and successions from one preferment to another, which we need not dwell upon.

1689.

IN the following year the Maltese Squadron sailed out under the command of their general Mechatein, and joined the Venetian fleet, now no longer commanded by Morosini, who was by this time raised to the dignity of doge. The confederate fleet having attempted the reduction of the strong fortrefs of Negropont, were forced, after a long and difficult siege, to abandon it. The order lost in that expedition 29 of its most valorous knights, besides a great number of their men, who were cut off by the Turks. The loss of these so affected the grand master, that he was quickly after attacked with a violent strangury, attended with a raging fever, which carried him off on the 21st of July of the year following, in the 76th year of his age, and 10th of his government. His remains were deposited in the chapel belonging to the Italian tongue, in which he had caused his tomb to be erected in his life-time, and on which was engraven an epitaph, said to have been written by himself about two years before his death.

grand master.
1690.

Vignacourt.

HE was succeeded by Adrian de Vignacourt, grand treasurer of the order, and nephew to the late famous Alof de Vignacourt, who had been raised to that dignity many years before. Not long after his election the Maltese Squadron, returning from the Levant, brought the first news of the taking of the city and castle of Valonna in Albania by the confederate fleet, which occasioned great rejoicings to be made through the island. But, as we observed a little higher, the Turkish war having cost already a vast number of lives, and reduced the widows and children to extreme indigence, the new grand master made it one of his first cares to give them a speedy relief, and to make a proper provision for them, the rest of the convent following his example, and contributing towards so pious a work. His next care was to suppress the insolence of the Barbary corsairs, who, in the absence of their squadron, made frequent incursions into their chanel, and as far as the coasts of Sicily; to which end he ordered a strong galliot, well manned and armed, to be constantly upon the cruise in those seas. He was no less diligent in what concerned the security of the island, to which he added several new fortifications, and built fresh magazines where-ever he thought they were wanting, particularly a magnificent arsenal for the gallies of the order. Whilst he was thus generously taken up, he received a letter from the emperor Leopold, which imparted to him the welcome news of the complete victory which prince Lewis of Baden had gained over the Turks, and which caused general rejoicings through the island. All this while the pope's courtiers were soliciting for some of the pories of the order, as had been the custom during the reigns of the fore-going pontifs. But the new pope Innocent XII. put a generous end to that shameful practice soon after his election, by a new brief, in which he confirmed all the ancient rights and immunities of the order.

1692.

IN the following year, the grand prior of Messina, general of the Maltese gallies, joined those of the pope and Venetians, and accompanied them to the siege of Canea, one of the most convenient ports in the isle of Candia. But, having cannonaded the place during the space of 25 days, they were forced to raise the siege, on account of the season being too far advanced; and the Squadron of Malta arrived at that port at the time the order were making fresh rejoicings for the taking of the strong fortrefs of Great Varadin by the imperialists; about which time arrived also the marquis of Orville, nephew of the grand master, and was received by the order with the pomp and honours suitable to his rank and proximity to their sovereign.

A terrible earthquake at Malta.

IN the beginning of the following year the island felt a terrible earthquake, which began on the 11th of January, at ten of the clock at night, and lasted three whole days, by which several buildings were overthrown, and other considerable damage done; soon after which, four Sicilian gallies arrived, which acquainted the grand master with the dreadful fate of the city of Augusta, which was totally overthrown by the same earthquake; so that he was now wholly taken up in sending proper assistance to the sufferers, in ordering public fasts, prayers, and processions, forbidding the usual diversions of the approaching carnival, and repairing the damages which the public and other edifices, as well as the vessels riding in the port, and other parts of the island, had received by it. In the interim arrived the grand prior of Messina, at the head of the Maltese Squadron, bringing in a large vessel which he had taken from the Tunisians in his return from the Levant, in which were 150 soldiers. Upon his appearing before the grand master, he was accused of having suffered three Barbary corsairs and a tartan to escape. He was a was however acquitted soon after, when at his trial he made it appear, that he had chased them the whole day with all the sail and rowing he could make, till the night put an unavoidable stop to his pursuit. He was nevertheless deprived of his post, which was, the following year, conferred on Francis Sigismund, count of Thum, who, having joined the confederate fleet, assisted in the reduction of the city of Chios, which they took after an eight days siege. In the mean while Lewis XIV. and the duke of Savoy had begun to seize on several lands and revenues of the order, under pretence of carrying on the expensive war they were engaged in. The grand master failed not of making proper remonstrances to both courts; which, being backed by the pope's mediation, put a happy stop to that unjust attempt. That pontif at the same time was pleased to take a special cognisance of the long contest which had reigned between b the order and the republic of Genoa; and, partly by his address, and partly by his authority, put an effectual end to it; immediately after which several Genoese noblemen were admitted into the order.

In the year 1695 the admiral Sigismund sailed out with his squadron, and took a large vessel belonging to Tripoli, after a bloody contest of two hours, and sent it to Malta. He then proceeded to join the confederate fleet; but the Venetians refusing to enter upon any enterprize, on pretence that the season was too far advanced, they all returned to their respective posts, without effecting any thing worth notice.

THE pope, next year, transmitted a considerable number of galley slaves over to Malta, to reinforce the galleys of the order. The grand master falling ill of old age, and other infirmities, the candidates for the succession began their cabals and bribery betimes, and continued them till his death, which happened on the 4th of February of the following year, in the 97th c year of his age, and 7th of his government. His remains were deposited in the chapel belonging to the tongue of France, and his just encomium was engraven on his tomb. 1696. Death of the grand master. 1697.

He was succeeded by Raymund Perellos de Roccasoull, of the tongue of Arragon, and grand 62. Raym. baily of Negropont; one of whose first public acts was, to call a council of the order for the suppression of sundry abuses, particularly that crying and destructive one of bestowing the best commanderies on junior knights, at the recommendation of the pope, or other crowned heads; which so frequently disgusted the seniors, who had more just pretensions to so high a degree, that they bequeathed their riches and effects to their near relations, which ought in course to have d been sunk into the public treasury. The first step that was taken, in order to prevent it, was, to make pressing instances to the pope against all such partial recommendations, which tended to subvert the design of their institution, and ancient discipline. The next was, to pass a decree, expressly forbidding all the religious of the order the carrying of either gold or silver about them, and suppressing all cards, dice, and other games of chance.

THE peace of Reswick being concluded between France and Spain, the grand master caused great rejoicings to be made throughout the island; about which time arrived Boris Petrowitz Xeremetof, a relation of the late czar of Muscovy, with recommendations from that prince, from the pope and the emperor; and was received with all the honours due to his rank by the grand master and convent. In the next year, pope Innocent, having decided the contest which had e so many years been warmly carried on between the bishop of Malta and the grand prior of that church, about their respective jurisdictions, to the satisfaction of the order, the grand master caused a brazen statue of that pontif to be set up before the great gate of the church of Victory, with the inscription which the reader will find in the margin (N). The same year some Turkish corsairs having escaped being taken by the Maltese squadron, by a sudden change of the wind, the grand master and council, afraid lest it should be owing to the negligence of the commanders, ordered them to be tried for it; when it plainly appeared to have been owing to a contrary wind which prevented their pursuit; upon which they were honourably acquitted. 1698.

ON the 15th of February of the following year happened a notable engagement between Don Spinola, the Maltese admiral, and a Turkish vessel near the coast of Sicily. The galley which f first came up with the enemy having lost her mainsail by a sudden gust of wind, the admiral, who came next, advanced to the attack. The combat was sustained with great bravery; and the admiral's brother received a mortal wound in it, as he stood close to the grand prior of Messina, who, by reason of his great age, was incapable of standing upon his feet. His valet de chambre came next to keep him up, and was likewise shot to death by his side; upon which he supported himself by leaning his hand on the binacle that contained the compass, and continued the fight with fresh fury. The victory was just upon the point of declaring for the Maltese, when the Turkish commander came with full force, and struck his prow into the capitana, and made a dreadful gap in her. An obstinate engagement at sea. 1700.

(N) Innocentio XII. optimo & sanctissimo pontifici, liberaliter restitutis, em. & rev. dom. frater D. Raimondus de Roccasoull, grato & unanimi omnium voto tot tantaque beneficia æt. nitati dedicavit, an. M.D.C.IC.

THE wind chopping immediately to the south, was followed by a sudden storm, which quickly parted them, and dispersed the rest. The commander Javon, captain of the St. Paul, made all the diligence he could to assist the sinking capitana, and saved about fifty persons, among whom were the admiral Spinola, and some other commanders. His extreme desire of saving still more of them from the shipwreck made him tarry so near that place, that his pilot was forced to apprise him of the extreme danger they ran; yet all in vain, Javon being more intent to save others, than solicitous about his own life, would in all likelihood have perished, had not the violence of the wind driven him away against his will, and preserved him from the same fate. The order lost, either in the fight or shipwreck, no less than 21 knights and 500 soldiers and slaves, besides a good number of brave officers. The rest of the squadron were scattered at a great distance from each other; but quickly rejoined at Augusta, and arrived safe at Malta, though very much shattered by the storm.

A noble resolution of the grand master against the corsairs.

THE news of this disaster, attended with so considerable a loss, deeply affected the grand master; and that which more sensibly afflicted him was, to see what advantage the Turkish corsairs had gained by degrees over the order, and what prizes they were continually making upon the Christian merchants ever since the order had discontinued, as it had for many years, the maintaining of some stout men of war to keep those freebooters in awe, and contented themselves with the bare keeping up of a squadron of galleys against them. He had for some time entertained a desire to revive the old custom, but feared the difficulty of gaining the consent of the order. The horrid depredations which they now made on those seas, the number of families ruined by them, and the vast number of Christians that were condemned by those pirates to a most dreadful slavery, joined, without doubt, to the daily complaints, if not harsh reflections, which were made on an order which had been for so many centuries the bulwark of Christendom, and security of their commerce, was now become a cogent motive for them to enter into his views; and he succeeded in it even beyond his expectations, as soon as he declared his design to them.

As soon, therefore, as he had gained their consent, and raised a proper fund for it, his next care was to commit the management of it to some of the most experienced members of the order, and the execution of it to some of the best shipwrights. The choice of the former fell upon a knight of the family of St. Peter in Normandy, who then commanded some French vessels, and who, by his signal services to that monarch, had been advanced to the command of the foot soldiery; and it is to that worthy commander that we are beholden for that noble project, so highly approved by most Christian princes, and since printed among his brother the abbot of St. Peter's works, for utterly extirpating the whole nest of Barbary corsairs, and which was closely followed by the grand master. In the same year the brave commander Javon, lately mentioned, was unfortunately cast away with his ship the St. Peter, which struck among the rocks of the small island of Ostria. He was drowned, with three knights, and about 70 other persons; but the rest were saved by the other galleys.

IN the year following the Maltese squadron, coasting along the Barbary shore, met with the great soltana Binghen, carrying 80 guns and 300 soldiers. They engaged her with their usual bravery, and met with a suitable resistance; the combat was long and furious, and had cost a great number of lives before the knights could make themselves masters of her. Upon her being brought to Malta, the grand master ordered her flag to be hung up in the church of St. John d'Aix, the birth-place of the commander Ricard, who had first boarded, and had the greatest share in taking her, in order to perpetuate the memory of that noble action. Soon after, this squadron set sail again towards the coasts of Barbary, and advanced as far the Goletta, or citadel of Tunis, and brought away from thence a large Turkish vessel, and a brigantine, with the loss only of one knight and four soldiers. In the same year Philip V. having succeeded to the crown of Spain by the death of Charles II. confirmed all the rights and privileges of the order within his dominions, as did also Clement XI. who had succeeded Innocent XII. at Rome, by a new brief.

An embassy to the new pope.

THE grand prior of England was sent in the following year on a congratulatory embassy to the new pope, with order to obtain from him a regulation about the pretensions of the grand inquisitor of Malta, to a greater jurisdiction than was consistent with the privileges of the order. The court of Rome, according to custom, spun out the contest a considerable time, but it was at length decided by that pontif to the satisfaction of the order.

IN the year 1706, the admiral St. Peter, at the head of his squadron, sailing into the Levant, encountered three vessels from Tunis, richly laden. One of his galleys, named the St. James, having lost its mainmast in the engagement, and being forced to retire, the St. John came forwards, and attacked and took the Turkish admiral of 50 guns, and 370 soldiers, whilst the rest of the Turkish vessels made all the sail they could from the Maltese. This prize, being brought to Malta, was soon after converted into a galley of the order, and added to the squadron, under the name of the Holy Cross. On the following year, the commander of Langon, being a being ordered to convey a supply of ammunition, in the St. Peter, to the city of Oran, which was invested by the Algerine fleet, commanded by their bey, fought his way thro' the midst of the fire they made upon him on both sides, and, with that one galley of fifty guns, penetrated through the midst of them into the place, and conveyed the wished-for succour into it; for which he was advanced to the post of lieutenant-general of the squadron, and commander of the Maltese fleet.

In the year 1703, the king of Spain wrote a very pressing letter to the grand master, desiring him to send some farther succours into that city, with which he readily complied: but whilst the preparations were making for it, news was brought, that the Turks had made themselves masters of the place, which put a stop to that convoy. The news of the loss of that important place was soon followed by intelligence of a vast armament which was carrying on at Constantinople, and was commonly supposed to be designed against the isle of Malta; both which so deeply affected the grand master, that he was quickly after seized with a severe fit of the gout, attended with a violent fever, which would not permit him to attend to any public affairs for a day or two. On the third, finding himself a little better, he acquitted himself of some of his late obligations to the pope, by bestowing the commandery of Viterbo on his nephew Alexander Albani. Finding himself recover strength by degrees, he applied himself again to business with his usual diligence, especially about making preparations against the Turkish armament, which, he was now informed, consisted of twenty soltanas and forty gallies, and a proportionable number of forces. His first care was, to send for the assistance of the pope, and other Christian powers; his holiness dispatched to him immediately one of his tartans laden with powder, and other warlike ammunition, against a siege, and 150 soldiers, with a promise of sending him in a little time a much more considerable reinforcement. His other ambassadors returned likewise from France and Spain with fresh supplies of troops and ammunition; and the whole amount of those forces, upon a review, were found to consist of 10,000 effective men, well armed and disciplined, and all of them, as well as their officers, fully resolved upon a brave defence.

This vast pretended armament appeared soon after to consist only of five Turkish soltanas, which came to join other vessels at Tunis and Tripoli; which made the grand master suspect that their first attempt would fall upon the island of Gosa; upon which he immediately dispatched some of his best forces thither, together with all other necessities for its defence, whilst the brave grand prior of Messina, lately mentioned, was, at his earnest request, notwithstanding his extreme old-age, nominated to go and command them, in conjunction with general Langon, and the commander Mountfort, governor of the island.

ALL these preparations, together with the repairs which had been lately made to its fortifications, which were not, in all likelihood, unknown to the Turks, did so far discourage them from making any attempt upon it, that they contented themselves with setting fire to some Maltese vessels and houses they found along the coasts; after which they sailed back directly for the Levant. This sudden retreat did not hinder the grand master's finishing those magazines which his predecessor had begun, and filling them with all sorts of stores both for the war and the mouth; by which means the island began again to enjoy a better commerce, and greater abundance, than it had done for a considerable time before. A rumour being afterwards spread, that the four soltanas, and a brignatine, were gone to make a descent on the coasts of Calabria, the grand master forthwith ordered the squadron to sail away under the conduct of the commander Florigny.

He had not made above three days sail before he perceived a large vessel, which, upon closer inspection, proved the Capitana of Tripoli, commanded by a famed corsair, named Basha-Ali, carrying 56 large pieces, and 40 patereroes, and about 600 men. This was followed by a tartane of 12 pieces and 30 patereroes, commanded by Mohammed Ogl, who, in spite of his general's orders, resolved to sustain the attack of the Maltese squadron. Langon, who commanded the St. James, began the onset with such a brisk and continued fire, that he quickly set the whole rigging of both Turkish vessels in an universal blaze; the enemy, not being able to quench it, jumped into the water in the utmost consternation, but were for the most part saved by the Maltese long-boats, which came on all sides to their assistance; and, amongst them, took up the Rais or commander of the soltana of Tripoli, and about fifty Christian captives, to whom they gave their liberty, and about four hundred Turks, whom they carried off prisoners. The Maltese lost only one knight and five soldiers in this engagement. All the rest of the Turks, except the four hundred above mentioned, perished, as well as the two vessels. After this combat, the commander Langon sailed towards the coasts of Spain, and, in his way, met with the Capitana of Algiers, which mounted 50 guns, and had 500 men on board. A fierce engagement ensued, which lasted some hours; neither did the Algerines yield till all their officers were slain. But this victory proved a dear one to the order, by the death of the brave Langon, an officer of great courage and conduct, who lost his life in the engagement. His body was conveyed to Carthage,<sup>a</sup> and interred under the great altar of the cathedral; after which the grand master ordered an epitaph to be engraven on a sepulchral monument, set up in the memory of him in the church of St. John in the new city of Valetta.

IN the following year the grand master, not having been able to receive any supplies of corn from Sicily, according to the treaty, the viceroy obstinately refusing it, sent some of his gallies into the Levant, which returned soon after laden with it, and put a happy end to the scarcity which had prevailed in the island above a year.

The pope's inquisitor renews his tyrannic
practices.

THIS year the Maltese inquisitor, notwithstanding the pope's regulations concerning his jurisdiction, begun afresh to make some encroachments on the infirmity of the order, and took upon him to enter it in quality of visitor, accompanied with some of his officers, whom he<sup>b</sup> sent to visit several apartments of the palace. The commander Avernes, the then grand infirmary, was no sooner informed of the insult done in defiance of the statutes, then he came in person, and forthwith drove them out of the apartment. The inquisitor not only complained of the opposition offered to his officers, but entered a protest against it as null, and done against his authority; and, by that presumptuous step, laid the foundation for a fresh contest with the grand master, which he was in hopes would be decided more in his favour than the former had been. The grand master was again obliged to send two ambassadors, the one to Rome, to complain to his holiness of the intolence of his inquisitor, and the other to the French court, to desire his majesty to interpose his good offices with his holiness to put an effectual stop to the infractions made by that minister upon the rights and privileges of the order. Upon<sup>c</sup> the memorial presented to that monarch by the infirmary himself, Lewis XIV.<sup>m</sup> immediately wrote to the pope in the most pressing terms: but the inquisitor had by this time given the order fresh cause of discontent, by the frequent patents he had granted to several Maltese, by which he pretended to exempt them from their obedience to the grand master, their lawful sovereign. Against these the commander Zondodari, his ambassador extraordinary, made some very pressing complaints, the small success of which did but plainly shew, that the pontif was neither ignorant of, nor dissatisfied with, the proceedings of the inquisitor and his tribunal.

1713. YET did not all these just complaints discourage him from writing pressingly to the grand<sup>d</sup> master the very next year, for the assistance of some gallies of the order to come and repress the frequent excursions of the infidels on the coasts of Italy, where they made very considerable prizes, and committed dreadful outrages, besides carrying off great numbers of inhabitants into slavery.

IN the same year Adrian Langon, a near relation of the brave warrior lately mentioned, who now commanded the St. Catherine, being on his cruise in these seas, attacked the Algerine squadron, consisting of seven gallies, which he put to flight, except one called the Half-moon, of 40 guns and 400 men, which he boarded and took; thirty-six Christian slaves, who rowed in it, were set at liberty by him, and a great number of Turks slain, and the rest made prisoners, with the loss of only seven men.

1714. IN the next year he attacked a stout Algerine corsair of 56 guns and 500 men, near the isles of Hieres, and fought with him near six hours, without being able to force him to surrender, tho' he shot away his main-mast, and killed a great many of his men; so that, to prevent his escape, he was obliged to sink him, by which only two Christians and five Turks could be saved out of the whole crew. He took soon after another Barbary corsair, out of which he made 95 of the crew captives.<sup>e</sup>

rations at the Porte.

ALL this while the Soltan was carrying on a vast armament at Constantinople with more diligence than before. The grand master, still apprehending that it was designed against Malta, sent his summons all round to the knights, to repair thither with their usual arms and retinue, whilst he was taken up at home in putting it in a condition of defence. Upon receiving his sum-<sup>f</sup> mons, most of those knights and commanders, dispersed in several parts of Europe, made all the proper preparations to repair to the convent. Some who, by reason of old age, infirmities, or other impediments, could not appear in person, resigned the revenues of their respective preferments towards the expence of the war; whilst others, tho' not less infirm and disabled, did yet cause themselves to be transported thither to assist the rest at least with their advice. Many of those that were unable to contribute to the public expence, either as being yet in their noviciate, or without any preferment, did yet signalize their zeal, by becoming sureties for a variety of large sums that were contracted by the order for the procuring of arms, ammunition, and other necessaries, for a gallant defence. The grand master, over and above all those contributions, drew the sum of 150,000 crowns out of the public treasury, and borrowed a<sup>g</sup> much larger sum, by help of which he provided the island with every thing that could be thought a wanting for a vigorous opposition against so formidable a power. To all these preparations the pope contributed a small number of men and galleys, together with a full power to levy money on the ecclesiastical state.

WHILST these precautions were taking at Malta, an unknown person arrived there, of a good aspect, who offered his services to the grand master as an engineer, and gave such proofs of an uncommon skill in military architecture, that the grand master made no scruple to accept of them, and to let him take a full survey of the chief fortifications of the island, especially of the city of Valetta, which he did with much exactness and judgment, in company with some of the knights who had been deputed to attend him. He disappeared two days after, to their great surprise, which gave them just reason to suspect him to have been a spy sent from the Porte to take an exact view of the state and strength of the island, and confirmed their apprehensions that the Turkish armament was designed against it. To be fully satisfied about it, the grand master resolved to dispatch some trusty and expert person to Constantinople, to gain the best intelligence he could of the design of those preparations.

A Turkish spy takes a view of the fortifications. 1715.

He pitched upon a wealthy merchant, named Andrew Veran, a native of Provence, whom he sent thither in a ship richly laden with a variety of merchandizes. Veran landed first at Neapoli de Romania, capital of the Morea, where he was informed by the captain-general of the Venetians, that the Turkish armament was designed against his republic; and, upon his sailing through the Dardanelles, he received the news of the Porte's having declared war against the Venetians. Upon his arrival at Constantinople, he applied himself to the French ambassador, the count d' Alleurs, and put himself under his protection, and was by him more fully assured of all the sultan's designs. All this while numbers of knights and commanders of the order arrived at Malta, and brought with them volunteers, forces, ammunition, and other kinds of supplies, which the grand master made use of to reinforce his squadron, and sent it to join that of the pope and the Venetian fleet. Whilst these were at sea, Veran returned from Constantinople, and informed the council, that, from all he had been able to learn or observe, either the grand signor never designed that armament against Malta, or, if he ever did, he was since diverted from it, by the information he had received of the state of defence which the grand master had taken care to put the island in, and of the number of knights and other forces which came flocking to his assistance from all parts of Christendom.

d In the following year the Venetians failed not to apply to the grand master for fresh succours against the Turks; upon which he ordered five large vessels, and some galleys, to sail out to their assistance. These meeting with some Barbary corsairs, gave chase to them, and took one of the largest, of 54 guns and 500 men, and brought her to Malta, together with several saicks laden with all sorts of provision. Soon after this a contest arose among the commanders of the auxiliary squadrons, which was like to have had some dangerous consequence, when his holiness was pleased to put an effectual end to it, by declaring the Maltese admiral his lieutenant-general. After this the Maltese squadron fell on several Turkish vessels laden with variety of rich merchandize, and carried them off to Corfu, where he found the commander Lingo, who was admiral of the pope's galleys, and who, on his part, had been no less successful against the Turks, from whom he had taken a considerable number of vessels.

e In the following year the squadron set sail from Malta, reinforced by two frigates, and some other light vessels, in order to join the confederate fleet; and, in their way, sunk a large Turkish vessel, after a fierce engagement on both sides, but saved a great part of the men by the help of those light vessels, and made them prisoners. Soon after which the auxiliary forces had a fierce engagement with the Turks, in which the latter were so terribly treated, that they betook themselves to a speedy flight, after a combat of two hours, sustained on both sides with great obstinacy. The Maltese admiral De Bellefontaine, who commanded the whole fleet, behaved in that engagement with such conduct and bravery, that he was received, on his arrival at Malta, with the greatest marks of honour and distinction by the grand master.

f THE next year produced little that is worth recording; the grand master had indeed reinforced the squadron with the large galley called the St. John, and they actually sailed out at the usual time, and joined the confederates; but the Turkish courage was so effectually cooled by this time, that they did not care to give them a fresh occasion of signalizing themselves against them. In the same year the pope honoured the natural son of the king of Poland with the cross of the order.

THIS year produced nothing considerable, except some prizes which the Maltese squadron took from the Turks; two of which were richly laden for Constantinople; and on board another was the basha of Romelia, with his whole family, bound for Neapoli de Romania.

1719.

g THE next year was remarkable for the demise of the grand master Raimond Perellos de Roccafull, who died of extreme old age, accompanied with a lingering disease, under which he had laboured above a year, after a glorious reign of near twenty-two years, during which he bestowed most of his time and care in fortifying Malta and Gosa with variety of works, in building building of magazines, arsenals, and other public edifices, in making a necessary provision for the widows and children of those of his forces who died at sea or in the war, and in all other public acts which could add strength to the island, and a lustre to the order.

63. Mark Anthony Zondodari.

HE was succeeded by Mark Anthony Zondodari, a native of Siena, and of an illustrious family, who had been some years before sent ambassador to the court of Rome by his predecessor, to complain to the pope of the insolence and encroachments of his inquisitors at Malta. The general joy which accompanied his election, was soon after increased by the success which his squadron met with against the corsairs of Barbary, two of the largest of which were brought into the port, and, not long after, were followed by the Algerine admiral of 80 guns and 500 soldiers. In the same year the new grand master obtained a brief from the pope, by which every knight of the order, who had 300 livres per annum, was obliged to maintain one soldier at his own expence, for the security of the island; but we do not find that it produced any effect.

Adrian Langon's success
at sea.

THE Maltese squadron under the command of the brave Adrian Langon, who was sent, at the desire of the king of Spain, to cruise along his coasts, was no less successful against the Barbary corsairs. They began with chasing one of their galliots on the coasts of Sardinia; but this proving too brisk a sailer for them, they only retook a pink from it belonging to the Christians, which had been forced to surrender to it a few days before. Soon after this the St. John, commanded by the admiral, took an Algerine of 40 guns and 350 men, after an obstinate fight of an hour, by which about 20 Christian slaves were set at liberty, and 250 Algerines were chained to the oars. The next that fell in their way was the squadron of Tunis, consisting, among others, of the Patrona, the Capitana, and the Porcupine: the two former of which, taking advantage of a dark night, gave them the slip, after having maintained a long and bloody fight; but the last of them, called the Porcupine, was obliged to surrender, after having stood a continual fire till ten of the clock at night. Above 30 Christian slaves gained their liberty by that prize; and the success and valour of the commander Alognis struck such a general terror among the Barbary corsairs, that they dared not to stir out of their ports.

In the following year the grand master, who had been afflicted with a gangrene in his bowels above six months, expired on the 16th of June, in the 64th year of his age, and 5th of his government, greatly lamented by the order and the European princes, on account of his exemplary piety, extensive charity, and his strenuous application in putting the island in a better posture of defence than it had ever been in before; and in restoring, as well by his example as his authority, the antient discipline and privileges of the order, both in church and state.

64. Antonio
Vilhena.

HE was succeeded by Don Antonio Manuel de Vilhena, a Portuguese, of the Castilian tongue, a person of an illustrious family, who had, by his valour and merit, gradually passed through all the other dignities of the order, and was perfectly well acquainted with all the interests and maxims of it. The island being still in danger from the Turks, he made it his first care to complete the fortifications which his predecessor left unfinished, and to add some others where they were thought wanting, especially on the peninsula of Marza Muzetto, which still lay so exposed to the attacks of the Turks, that they might easily have made themselves masters of it, and by that means have facilitated their attempts on the adjacent works. On that he ordered a stout new fort to be erected, called by him Fort Manuel. Whilst that was constructing, he issued out an order, that all knights, who had attained the age of nineteen, should repair to him, with their proper arms and retinue, in order to be ready to oppose the Turks, in case the armament that was carrying on at Constantinople should be designed against their island, as it really proved to be.

It must be here observed, that all these vast preparations at the Porte were made at the instigation of a Turk, named Hali, who had been a slave at Malta a considerable number of years, and had afterwards served among the marines, and having acquired great favour with the Maltese knights, had been raised to be chief master of the Turkish slaves. This man did Mohammed Effendi redeem on his arrival at Malta, in his way to France, whither he was sent ambassador, and brought back by him to Constantinople, where he informed the ministers of the Porte of the state of that island, and of the order, with the great number of Turkish captives of all ranks, who groaned under a cruel slavery, and would not fail of raising a general revolt among them, if a proper attempt was made to surprise the island, they being there much more numerous than the inhabitants.

By these remonstrances he easily obtained a squadron of ten men of war, commanded by Abdi Capitan, which he told them would be sufficient to accomplish the design, as they would have nothing to do but appear before the island, where they would find all the slaves up in arms. Hali was allowed to accompany them in this expedition, with the title of captain; and the squadron set sail accordingly for Malta; yet their design had not been kept so secret at the Porte, but the grand master had intelligence time enough to frustrate it, by the care he took a to have all the slaves closely secured, and put out of a condition to answer their end ; so that when the Turkish squadron appeared before the island, all their hostilities terminated in some few discharges of the artillery on both sides ; after which they presently retired, only Abdi Capitan, the commander of it, took care to have the following letter conveyed to the grand master :

“ THE chief of the island of Malta, the officers of his council, and the heads of the tongues of France, Venice, and other nations, who worship the Messiah, are given to understand by this letter, that we have been expressly sent by the grand signior, lord of the universe, and refuge of mankind, to enjoin them to deliver into our hands all the slaves who are found under their miserable government, to the end they may go and present themselves at the foot of his supreme and august throne. Such is his will ; and the end for which he has thus armed us ; and if you fail of complying with his commands, you will be made to repent of it by the most dreadful punishments. Send your answer to Tunis.”

THIS haughty and threatening stile being so well known to be the language of the Porte, the grand master did not fail to send a proper answer, which was to this effect : “ That his order was not instituted merely to rove on the seas, and make slaves, but to cruise upon them with their armaments, in order to secure the navigation and commerce of the Christians ; that they attacked none but such as did annoy it, and, by making slaves of the Christians, did justly deserve to be made such themselves ; that he had nothing so much at heart as to procure the liberty of those that were captives in the sultan’s dominions ; and that if his highness entertained the same views, he was ready to enter into a negotiation with him for a mutual restitution of their captives, either by way of exchange or ransom, on the footing on which it was practised by other princes ; and that if his highness would be pleased to signify to him that such were his intentions, he would omit nothing that was in his power to second them.”

THIS answer was not sent, as was desired, to the admiral of the Turkish squadron, but to the count de Bonac, then ambassador from the French court to the Porte, who was left at his liberty to deliver it to whom he should think best, who accordingly presented it to the grand vizier. He was a few days after agreeably surprised to find that minister disposed to treat not only of an exchange of captives, but even of a peace with the grand master. The vast advantage which not only the order, but all Christendom, would reap from such a peace, easily encouraged the ambassador to use all the address and application he was capable to obtain it : and as he was in high favour and esteem at that court, and especially with the prime minister, he quickly gained his assent to the articles which he had proposed to him.

THE plan was thereupon sent both to France and Malta, where it was equally liked and approved of, excepting only that the grand master preferred a limited truce to a peace, and apprised him of his reasons for it, which may be easily guessed at.

THE following articles were soon after agreed upon between the grand master and prime vizier ; viz.

1. THAT there should be a reciprocal exchange of captives ; and that if those of either side should be found more numerous than the other, they should be redeemed at the rate of 100 piastres per head.

2. THAT this exchange should extend no farther than to those captives which had been taken under the Maltese and Turkish flags.

3. THAT the truce should be for twenty years, which might be renewed after that time.

4. THAT the states of Barbary should be excluded out of the treaty ; and that the Porte should not give them any assistance, directly or indirectly, against the Maltese.

5. THAT these last should enjoy the same privileges within the grand signor’s dominions which the French did.

6. THAT this treaty should become null as soon as any Christian prince was at war with the Porte.

THESE articles, tho’ generally approved, and even applauded at Constantinople, were nevertheless strenuously opposed by the captain basha, partly, as is reasonably supposed, because he had not been consulted about them ; whereas, being of a maritime nature, they equally belonged to his province ; and partly because all such pacific treaties were generally disagreeable to the whole posse of sea-officers ; so that he found no difficulty to exasperate them against it, whilst the grand vizier, apprised of the universal discontent they had given to that powerful body, saw himself obliged to suspend that negotiation for a time. It was not long, however, before he took an opportunity of acquainting the French ambassador, that it might easily be revived, provided some effectual methods were taken to induce the captain basha, and the rest of the maritime chiefs, to come into it : the plain meaning of which was to make it their interest to do so. The count de Bonac easily apprehended him ; but as that required time, as well as new instructions and remittances from France and Malta, the further negotiation was suspended till they could be procured. a vessel taken.

A Tunisian

In the mean time, the grand master being informed that a Tunis vessel, followed by a tartane, had taken two barks, the one belonging to Sicily, and the other to Genoa, near the island of Pantaleria, dispatched the St. John galley, with another frigate, after them. The latter, being the better sailer, soon overtook and attacked the vessel, and after a mutual fire, which lasted near four hours, obliged it to surrender. It was a noble ship and excellent sailer, carrying fifty-eight guns, fourteen brass patereroes, and 400 men. It had been made a present of by the Porte to the Dey of Tunis, to serve him for a patrona, and had infested those seas for some time with no small success. As for the tartane, it was chased by the St. John a considerable time, and made a stout defence; but was at length forced to yield, and both were brought into the port of Malta. b 1725.

In the following year, with which we shall close the Maltese history, as having little or nothing considerable, except the yearly excursions and successes against the Turks and Barbary corsairs, pope Benedict XIII. to express his esteem and gratitude to the grand master and the order, for their vigilance over, and great services to, Christendom, sent to him, by one of his Camerarii, the helmet and estock which he had blessed on Christmas-day. The latter of which is a silver gilt sword, and the other a purple cap or bonnet of velvet, embroidered with gold, and adorned with a dove, the emblem of the Holy Ghost, enriched with pearls, diamonds, and other precious stones; which present was received with the usual tokens of gratitude and professions of loyalty and zeal for the holy see, by the whole convent. c

The History of Spain.

S E C T. I.

The history of the kingdom of the Visigoths in Spain, from the accession of Euric, or Evaric, to that of Recared the First, who is also styled the Catholic.

THE Visigoths, who triumphed over the Suevi in Spain, under their king Theodoric, became masters of that extensive country under his successor Euric, who is therefore commonly, and with no great impropriety, considered as the founder of the Gothic kingdom in Spain<sup>a</sup>. With his reign, therefore, the Modern History of that nation properly commences; but, to render it the more intelligible to the reader, it will be requisite to say something of the state in which things were, in that as well as the adjacent countries. The eastern coasts of Spain were the greatest part of them at that time in the hands of the Romans, though their power was in a manner ruined, the western empire at that juncture having no head<sup>b</sup>. As for the empire of the east, Leo the First then held the sceptre; and not long after named, as we shall see, an emperor of the west<sup>c</sup>. As for the western coasts of Spain, they were almost wholly in the hands of the Suevi; and their king Resmund, having married the daughter of Theodoric, remained in quiet possession of those territories which this conqueror had still left him<sup>d</sup>. But for the interior provinces, together with those of Gaul, bordering upon Spain, they were in the hands of the Goths, who fixed the seat of their kingdom for the present at Thoulouse<sup>e</sup>. As for the Vandals, who had transported themselves to Afric, and were masters of all the coasts opposite to Spain, they had for their monarch Genseric, who had been very successful against the Romans, and was now considered both as a lawful and very potent prince<sup>f</sup>. In point of religion, all these nations were Christians; but the Visigoths, Suevi, and Vandals, were Arians, and are charged with dealing very harshly by the Catholics, that is, with the inhabitants of those provinces of Gaul and Spain which they had torn from the Roman empire<sup>g</sup> (A).

(A) The history of the kingdom of the Goths in Spain is in itself fruitful of great events, and capable of affording the reader entertainment, at the same time that it is the fundamental history with respect to the inhabitants of that extensive kingdom; and without a thorough knowledge of which, even the relations of much later times can be but very imperfectly understood (1). Besides, this history is of great consequence towards giving a just idea of the political constitution which originally subsisted among that brave and warlike nation, and the several alterations that became necessary in different conjunctures (2). Add to all this, that it affords us very full evidence against the prejudices of those who would persuade us, that all was so dark and barbarous within the compass of that period, which is our present subject, as to exclude us from all hopes of seeing it reduced in any tolerable order or certainty. Yet amongst the original authors, on whose authority the principal facts are taken, some were very eminent for their abilities, learning, and veracity (3). As for instance, Idacio, bishop of Lamego, who wrote a chronicle grounded upon that of Eusebius, and continued down to his own times, in which he is allowed by the best judges to have set things down with great punctuality and exactness (4). St. Gregory of Tours, who wrote the history of the Franks in ten books, and delivered

EURIC, EUVORIC, EUVARIC, EUTHORIC, or EVARIX, for by all these names we find a him mentioned, was a younger son of Theodoric the First, king of the Visigoths, in Gaul, and ascended the throne of his father by the murder of Theodoric II. his brother, who had before fixed himself thereon by the murder of their elder brother Thorismund<sup>b</sup>. It does not appear that Euric met with any difficulty in obtaining the possession of any part of those extensive dominions which Theodoric acquired; neither does it appear, that Resmund, king of the Suevi, made the least attempt to revenge the death of his father-in-law, or disputed the succession. On the contrary, mutual civilities and reciprocal embassies passed between them<sup>c</sup>. Leo, emperor of the east, thought fit to associate Anthemius in that dignity; and soon after both emperors began to make great warlike preparations both by land and sea, with an intent, as it afterwards appeared, to attack Genferic king of the Vandals, who, having entered into a close alliance with Resmund and Euric, these two princes, as well to favour their own views, as to create a diversion, resolved to attack the countries in Spain which were still in the hands of the Romans; and this they did with so great success, that they both made very considerable conquests, the former making himself master of Lisbon, and the latter taking considerable tracts of country<sup>k</sup>, which hitherto had made parts of the Roman province. Euric entered afterwards into a negotiation with Anthemius, probably that he might obtain better information as to the state of affairs in the empire, that he might take his measures more effectually for driving the Romans intirely out of Spain, where his power was already so great, that instead of being jealous of the Suevi, he looked upon them rather as his dependents, and, being a prince of great address as well as ambition, managed them at his pleasure<sup>l</sup> (B).

therein a multitude of particulars relating to the monarchy of the Goths in Spain, is also in very great credit. (5). To these we may add St. Isidore, metropolitan of Seville, who left not only a chronicle, in which the transactions, for which we have occasion to cite him, are set down according to the regular order of time, but also a history of the Goths, the Suevi, and the Vandals, extremely useful in this history, and a treatise of illustrious persons, which afford still farther light as to the passages in the two former works, that would otherwise be somewhat obscure (6). We have added, more especially at the beginning of every reign, the authorities of such general histories of Spain as are in the highest esteem, such as those of the Jesuit Mariana, who wrote concisely, but very elegantly, of the affairs of his country in Latin (7), and more largely in his own language, and with great spirit and freedom (8). We have quoted, as occasion required, from both these works. Mayerne de Turquet has written in French a general history of Spain, collected from Mariana and other authors (9). His work was formerly more considered than it is at present; but inasmuch as it serves for the ground-work of most of those histories of Spain which have been written in other languages, it is not amiss to indicate to the reader in what part of his performance the detail of those things which we have represented succinctly may be found. The history of Spain by Don Juan de Ferreras is allowed to be the most copious and exact of any now extant (10). This author lived in our own times, was indefatigable in the study of the antiquities of his own country, extremely accurate in chronology, very impartial in his narratives, and one, who as he enjoyed great opportunities of correcting the errors and mistakes of other writers (11), so he has practised it freely and fairly, not with the dogmatic air of an angry critic, but with all the candour and modesty that becomes a man of letters, and a sincere inquirer after truth.

(B) In the course of the ensuing history, we follow, generally speaking, the chronology established by Ferreras, not only because he has been remarkably careful in that respect beyond most other historians, but also because he had far better lights, and has shewn very great judgment in making the best use of them. We may join to these two a third reason, which is, that the chronology of this author agrees the best of any with all the foregoing histories, in which there is incidentally any mention made of transactions with the court of Spain (12). As for that æra by which most of their old historians account, and which for that reason has been styled the æra of Spain, men even of very great learning have been very much divided in their sentiments about it. St. Isidore of Seville, in his etymologies (13), asserts, that this term is derived from the Latin word æra, and that the occasion of it was the general description and taxation of the Roman empire in the reign of Augustus. As his opinion is both rational and probable, we may as well adopt it as any other. But then as to the time when this æra commenced, it admits of as great, or rather greater, variation in sentiments. There has been printed of late years in Spain, by the care of Don Gregorio Mayans y Siscar, a very curious and judicious work, by one of the most eminent antiquaries in that kingdom, upon this subject (14). However, in this too we follow the sentiment of Ferreras, and allow the Spanish æra to be earlier than the common calculation of the birth of Christ by thirty-eight years. We mention this, that in case the reader should have recourse to any of those ancient authors which compute by the æra of Spain, he may be under no difficulty in reducing it to the computation followed by us: which may be done with the utmost facility, either by subtracting thirty-eight years from their computation, or adding the year of our Lord as it stands in ours.

- a Euric resolved to carry his scheme into execution without delay <sup>m</sup>. His forces, having passed the Pyrenæes, presented themselves before Pampeluna, which speedily submitted. From thence they proceeded to Saragossa, which made no great resistance, any more than several other places in its neighbourhood. The nobility and gentry, assembling in arms, endeavoured to stop the progress of the Goths, but, being easily defeated, what is now stiled the principality of Catalonia, and the kingdom of Valencia, were quickly overcome <sup>n</sup>. At this time, as some authors say, Euric himself passed into Spain, and, putting himself at the head of his armies, penetrated as far as Lusitania <sup>o</sup>; which giving him an opportunity of entering the Roman province on all sides at once, he became in a very short space intirely master of all that they possessed. Having settled garrisons in such places as he thought most convenient, and b provided in the best manner he could for the administration of the civil government, he returned again into Gaul <sup>p</sup>, without giving any disturbance to the Suevi, who by this time saw their error, and that, by assisting the Romans, though they had extended their territory, they had notwithstanding diminished their power <sup>q</sup>.

He reduces the greater part of Spain under his power.

A. D. 571.

- THE confusions in the western empire, where Olybrius had defeated and put to death Anthemius, encouraged Euric in his views of enlarging his dominions by attacking the Romans in Gaul. While he meditated this expedition, Olybrius dying, Glycerius assumed the purple; and, that he might be in a better condition to oppose the Visigoths, he took a great body of Ostrogoths, under the command of Widimer, into his service, and sent them into Gaul, for the defence of the provinces <sup>r</sup>. The subjects of the empire, being catholics, behaved so differently towards these strangers, who were Arians, that they quickly deserted the service, and went over to Euric, who was of their own communion <sup>s</sup>. Siagrius, at the head of the Roman forces, and Childeric, king of the Franks, had assembled a numerous army, in order to oppose Euric; and, by bringing things to a quick decision, were defeated in a general engagement; soon after which, Euric made himself master of Tours <sup>t</sup>. His victorious army being strongly reinforced by the troops under Widimer, the monarch of the Visigoths, he turned his arms against Bourges, which he likewise reduced, after defeating an army raised for its relief <sup>u</sup>. He was prevailed upon by St. Epiphanius, bishop of Paria, to make peace with the emperor Julius Nepos. This however, he soon after broke, and besieged Clermont in Auvergne, which, not without some difficulty, he reduced <sup>v</sup>. After this conquest, he gave some time to repose; and keeping his court at Bordeaux, received there, as we are told by an eye-witness, in a royal manner, the ambassadors of all the neighbouring princes <sup>x</sup> (C).

He conquers almost all the country between the Loire and the Rhosne.

A. D. 473.

A. D. 475.

- THE western empire being intirely overthrown, on the deposition and death of Augustulus, by Odoacer, king of the Heruli, who thereupon assumed the title of monarch of Italy, that prince thought he could not take a more prudent step, in order to establish his new-founded state, than to make an alliance with Euric, king of the Visigoths, to whom, at the same time that he proposed this alliance, he made an offer of all the places that were still in the hands of the Romans <sup>y</sup>. Euric readily embraced these terms, and soon after took the field, in order to reduce the cities to which this treaty gave him some colour of title. He besieged, and, after some resistance, made himself master of Arles, and soon after Marseilles shared the same fate; yet he did not enjoy these conquests in peace <sup>z</sup>. The Burgundians, who had before seen the increase of his power with envy, grew jealous, now he was become their neighbour; and, to stop the progress of his arms, made an irruption into his territories with a mighty army. Euric marched against them with his veteran troops; and the dispute being ended by a decisive battle <sup>a</sup>, in which he gained a complete victory, he returned afterwards to Arles, where he spent the few remaining years of his life in peace. He turned his thoughts now to the cultivation of the milder arts; and as he knew that a government could never subsist long where the laws were uncertain, he caused a complete code of those made by his predecessor and himself to be collected and published <sup>b</sup> (D). He was a zealous Arian, and is said to have persecuted the catholics in

His conquests in Gaul, to the time of his death.

(C) The author, upon whose credit these facts are related, is one of the most celebrated of that age, Sidonius Appollinaris, who was upon this occasion at the court of our Gothic monarch, and speaks of his grandeur and magnificence from his own knowlege (15). It is from him likewise that late writers have taken what they object to the memory of this prince, in relation to his ill usage of the catholics; but then it is to be observed, that they carry things much farther than our author did, and make him appear a much greater bigot than he really was.

(D) The person chiefly employed by our monarch in compiling this code was Leo, his prime minister; he was descended from Cornelius Fronto, preceptor to the emperor Marcus Aurelius, and the most eloquent person of the time in which he lived (16). This descendant in Gaul with great severity; but the accounts we have of this seem to be exaggerated, since it is allowed, that his subjects in Spain enjoyed, during his reign, a profound peace<sup>a</sup>. He is on all hands allowed to have been a magnanimous and a magnificent prince, and to have ruled wisely the territories which he had valiantly acquired. He died in the month of September, in the year of our Lord, four hundred eighty four, and in the nineteenth of his reign<sup>d</sup>. He had by his queen Ragnachild a son, who succeeded him, and a daughter, whom he gave in marriage to Sigismer, a prince among the Franks<sup>e</sup>.

ALARIC the second succeeded his father, and reigned quietly over all his dominions in Spain and in Gaul<sup>f</sup>; but, if there be any credit due to some writers, he sullied the very beginning of his reign with a very mean and unworthy action. Siagrius, a Roman general, who still held Soissons, and some other places, was attacked by Clovis, king of the Franks, and, in his distress, took refuge in the dominions of Alaric, who at first received and protected him, but afterwards delivered this unfortunate person to that vindictive monarch, who put him to death<sup>g</sup>. Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, having, at the instance of the emperor Zeno, entered Italy, where he defeated and put to death Odoacer, king of the Heruli, remained quiet possessor of his dominions, and governed them with such wisdom, as induced Alaric to court his alliance. Accordingly he espoused Theudicota, who some say was the natural daughter of that monarch; which was very acceptable to his subjects, as it seemed to presage a lasting peace, without prejudice to the interests of their nation<sup>h</sup>. Two brothers, Gondeband and Godefill, at that time governed the Burgundians, the former making Lyons, the latter Geneva, the seat of his residence; and entering into a war with each other, drew Clovis, king of the Franks, into the quarrel, who took part with Godefill, as Alaric did with Gondeband, who, having slain his brother, and united his dominions to his own<sup>i</sup>, soon after deserted the Visigoths, and reconciled himself to the Franks; which, as may be gathered from the historians of those times, produced a jealousy between Clovis and Alaric, who appear to have been both of them naturally haughty and suspicious<sup>k</sup>.

A. D. 500.

THE Goths having now enjoyed many years peace, law-suits and disputes about property became much more frequent than in former times, which induced Alaric to direct Anian, one of the most famous lawyers of that age, to make an abridgment of the Theodosian code for the benefit of his subjects, which was afterwards published by his authority<sup>l</sup> (F). He likewise laboured to compose amicably the differences that had arisen with Clovis; and, for that purpose, there was an interview between the two princes, which, tho' it produced a good correspondence in appearance, was far from putting an end to their animosities, as to the cause of which historians differ; but it seems most probable, that Clovis, who had lately become a Christian, was excited to make war upon Alaric by the bishops and clergy in his dominions, who hated their sovereign for being an Arian, and this notwithstanding he had permitted them to hold a council very lately at Agde<sup>m</sup>. Theodoric, king of Italy, offered his mediation, and threatened to act with all his forces against the aggressor; which however did not hinder Clovis from making an irruption into the territories of the Visigoths, where the city of Tours was presently yielded to him by his partisans<sup>n</sup>. Alaric marched against him with a numerous army, with which he acted for some time upon the defensive; but, not being able to restrain the ardour of his forces, it came at length to a decisive battle, in which the Visigoths were totally routed, and Alaric killed, as the French historians say, by the hand of Clovis<sup>o</sup>. This engagement happened within three leagues of Poitiers, in the year of our Lord five hundred and seven, according to the best historians, tho' Mariana places it in the year before<sup>p</sup> (G).

of his was also in all respects a man of singular abilities; he professed the catholic religion in the court of a monarch who was an Arian. He was a person of great learning, unblemished character, and, which which is no less to our present purpose, was esteemed the best civilian of that age (19). In all probability it was from him the advice came of collecting and publishing these laws by the authority of king Euric, whose preface stands before them, and it is said they were considered and confirmed by an assembly of seventy bishops (20).

(F) In order to have a clearer conception of this matter, it may be necessary to observe, that the subjects of this monarch being Gauls and Spaniards, as well as of his own nation, the Goths, and as these had lived long under the dominion of the Romans, they had contracted not only a deep reverence, but a warm affection, for their laws, upon the capital maxims of which those of the Goths were likewise founded (21).

- a AFTER this unfortunate battle, some of the most prudent captains in the army of the Visigoths retired into Spain with Amalaric, the only son of their deceased monarch, by his queen Theudicota; but the rest of the troops, judging a prince of five years old very unfit to restore the disturbed state of their affairs, readily consented that Gesalaic, who was the natural son of Alaric by a mistress of his, should assume the royal dignity <sup>1</sup>. His first action was against the Burgundians, who, under the command of Gondebaud, marched to besiege Narbonne, which Gesalaic could have hindered; but, being defeated in a general action, he fled into Spain, where he raised new disturbances <sup>2</sup>. In the mean time Theodoric sent Ibbas, one of his generals, with a great body of troops to the assistance of the Visigoths, who, having in some measure recovered their spirits, behaved with so much courage and resolution, as obliged both the Franks and Burgundians to abandon the best part of their conquests, for which they stood at least as much indebted to the disaffection of the clergy as to the success of their army <sup>3</sup>. After this, Ibbas marched against Gesalaic, who had taken possession of Barcelona, recovered that city, and forced the usurper to transport himself and his few adherents into Africa, where they were received by Thrasamond, king of the Vandals, tho' he was brother-in-law to king Theodoric <sup>4</sup>; who, in consideration of the trouble and expence he had been at, kept the country of Provence for himself, and administered the affairs of the rest of Alaric's dominions, as regent for Amalaric; appointing Theudis, an Ostrogoth by birth, but a person of great prudence and merit, to have the chief direction in the councils of the young prince <sup>5</sup>. A. D. 507.
- b WITH the help of those pecuniary supplies which he received from the king of the Vandals, Gesalaic returned into Gaul; and, having raised a considerable body of forces, he passed the mountains, directing his march towards Barcelona, within four leagues of which city he was encountered by a part of Theodoric's army, and, being entirely defeated, was forced to fly back into Gaul; but being overtaken, before he could reach any place of safety, by a party of the Ostrogoths, they put an end to his troubles and his life: by this incident, and the death of Clovis, king of the Franks, the Visigoths were equally freed from the miseries of an intestine war, and the apprehensions of a foreign invasion <sup>6</sup>. Theudis governed Spain with great ability, and yet not without giving some kind of umbrage to Theodoric; for though, pursuant to his orders, he sent him the revenues of that kingdom, yet he could not be prevailed upon to return into Italy, to render an account of his administration. He married also a Spanish lady of distinguished family, and who brought him immense riches; so that when he surmised either his life or liberty to be in danger from the suspicions of Theodoric, he was in a condition to raise and maintain a body of two thousand men, in the nature of guards <sup>7</sup>. The king of Italy, therefore, having no other method to recover that power which he had put into the hands of Theudis, declared his grandson Amalaric of full age, and ordered him to be put into possession of his father's dominions, which was accordingly done <sup>8</sup> (H). almost every circumstance relating to this event, as well as the year in which it happened. The former represents Alaric as intirely in the wrong, as having given protection to the enemies of Clovis, held secret correspondencies in his kingdom, and had even formed a design to murder or assassinate him at their late interview (22). The latter, on the contrary, assures us, that these ought to be regarded rather as calumnies than as facts, since they are not mentioned by the most considerable writer of that age (23), but have been taken upon the credit of later and less credible authors (24). He therefore ascribes the war to the ecclesiastics about Clovis, who pressed him to undertake it, and to the intrigues of the catholic prelates in Alaric's dominions, who invited the Franks (25). They are wide of each other also as to the place where this decisive battle was fought; Mariana says, that it was en Campos Vogladenses; which his French translator, father Charenton, interprets the plains of Vavillé, and places them at the distance of thirteen leagues from Poitiers (26); whereas Ferreras assures us, that Alaric encamped within three leagues of Poitiers, in sight of a town which he calls Voclad (27), and which is believed to be that now called Vougle (28), where his people forced him to give the Franks battle. Mariana is very express as to the year; he not only says that it was 506, but adds, that he had published his body of laws mentioned in the former note in the month of February preceding (29). His French translator acknowledges this to be an error (30), and it is not the affair of a stranger to decide this difference; but Ferreras, who places it a year later, agrees better with the French and other foreign historians (31). (H) We are told by Mariana, that Amalaric did not assume the government of his dominions till after the demise of his grandfather (32); whereas Ferreras asserts the contrary, which makes the difference of above three years. The former has the honour of being followed by Petaveus, a very learned chronologer, though he produces no authority to support that fact, which cannot be said of Ferreras (33); though it is agreed by in this quarrel.

ON the death of Theodoric, he was succeeded in his dominions by his grandson, Athalaric,<sup>a</sup> the son of his daughter Amalasuntha, by Eutharic, a Goth, born in Spain, who deceased before his father-in-law<sup>z</sup>. The new monarch of Italy was very young; and, to prevent any dispute with the king of the Visigoths, it was agreed, that the river Rhose should be the common boundary of their territories; that no part of the revenue of Spain should be any longer remitted to Italy; and that the treasures which Theodoric had removed should be restored<sup>a</sup> (1). His affairs thus settled, Amalaric found himself inclined to marry; and the princess upon whom he cast his eyes, was Clotilda, the daughter of Clovis, and the sister of those princes amongst whom the kingdom of the Franks was divided<sup>b</sup>. They listened very readily to this proposition; and the marriage being concluded, Clotilda was received with all possible demonstrations of joy by her subjects, and the wedding celebrated with the utmost solemnity.<sup>b</sup>

At this time, in the opinion of all parties, there could not have been a more judicious alliance, or one that afforded a fairer prospect, either in respect to public peace, or to private happiness<sup>c</sup>; yet it was not long before those uneasinesses commenced, which, in their issue, proved so fatal both to the king and kingdom of the Visigoths<sup>d</sup>.

AMALARIC was either desirous himself, or was influenced by his priests, to bring over his queen to the Arian heresy; and, as she was a zealous catholic, this was the source of those differences that broke out early, and continually increased between them, till at length the poor queen was so ill treated, that she wrote a long letter of complaint to her bretheren, in which she gave a large account of her sufferings, and the daily insults she received, not only from that monarch, but from his subjects; and, with it, sent a handkerchief stained with her blood, occasioned by the blows she had received<sup>e</sup>. Upon this, Childebert, king of France, marched with a numerous army into the territories of Amalaric, who, collecting as great a force as he was able, took the field against the invader; but had the misfortune to be defeated, and was forced to take refuge on board his fleet<sup>f</sup>. But, recollecting that his treasures were left in the city of Narbonne, he went on shore again, in hopes of recovering them; and had scarce entered both, that the years of the reign of Amalaric were not reckoned from the time of his accession, but from the time that he assumed the government. It is from a date of this kind that Ferreras proves his computation, since an author of indisputable credit tells us, that Montanus, metropolitan of Toledo, who died in the year five hundred thirty one, sat in that see nine years during the reign of Amalaric, which, according to Mariana's account, would be impossible, since he allowed him to reign but five (34). What some writers say of the marriage of Theodoric in Spain (35), is plainly a mistake for that of Theudis, who actually married a Spanish lady; which was one circumstance that made him so formidable to his own master Theodoric, as to determine him to send his grandson, then about the age of twenty one, to take upon him the administration of his own affairs. This is at once so natural and so consistent an account of this transaction, that it is not easy to find any reason to question it; but then it must be allowed, that this is a fact established from consequences, and which it was very easy even for so great a man as Mariana really was, to overlook. We see clearly from the whole current of this history, that it was the power of Theodoric which protected the whole monarchy of the Visigoths from crumbling to pieces (36). He is however said to have taken a considerable part of their dominions in Gaul, by way of indemnification for the expences he was at: however, as this would certainly have fallen into the hands of the Franks, if he had not taken it, and as it enabled him to keep a body of troops there sufficient to restrain the attempts of that ambitious and warlike nation, we cannot tax him with any great injustice (37).

(I) We have the particulars of this agreement set down by Ferreras, and that upon very good authority;

but he does not tell us when these treasures were carried away from Carcaffone (38). On the other hand, Mariana tells us, that immediately after the defeat and death of Alaric, the Franks, under the command of Clovis, made themselves masters not only of his riches, but of all the treasures collected by his predecessors, and, amongst the rest, the holy vessels which belonged to the temple of Jerusalem, which Alaric, the first king of the Goths, brought away from Rome, after he had sacked that famous city, and left as perpetual monuments of his victories to his successors. Some of this wealth, it is said, fell into the hands of the Franks, when they plundered the camp of the Goths, and made themselves masters of Thoulouse (39). It is however acknowledged, that, according to some authors, the treasures of the crown were lodged at Carcaffone, and that it was the desire of having them in their power which brought the Franks and Burgundians before that place; from whence, however, they were obliged to retire, by Theodoric's sending a numerous army to his relief; and upon this occasion, in all probability, it was, that this monarch thought fit to remove those riches, that the Franks might not have so strong a temptation to continue their invasions: it is not very strange that Theodoric should not be in any haste to restore these valuable effects to his grandson; and, on the other side, it is far from being difficult to account for the restoring of them at this juncture (40). The dominions of the Ostrogoths in Italy were then governed by a princess who was a widow, as regent for her son, who was a child; and therefore we need not wonder that, for the sake of preserving the friendship of a powerful young monarch, she should readily comply with his demands, more especially as those demands were founded in justice (41).

a the city, before it was surpris'd by the enemy ; on which, retiring for safety into a church belonging to the catholics, a common soldier run him through with his spear<sup>g</sup>. Others say that he retired to Barcelona, and was assassinated there by his own subjects (K). It is more credible that he was killed in the month of December, in the year of our Lord five hundred thirty-one<sup>h</sup>. The victorious Childebert carried all his treasures and queen Clotilda back into his own dominions ; and that princess dying on the road, her body was interred with that of her father, in the monastery of St. Genevieve, which, at that time, was consecrated to the apostles St. Peter and St. Paul : amongst those treasures were sixty chalices, fifteen patins, and many other vessels, all of solid gold, which the victor distributed amongst the churches in his own kingdom<sup>i</sup>.

b THE royal family of the Goths being intirely extinct, their monarchy, which seems hitherto to have been in some measure hereditary, became afterwards strictly elective. The first who mounted the throne, by the choice of the nobility, was Theudis, who had governed Spain with so much reputation during the minority of the deceased prince. He was scarce seated on the throne, before he saw the neighbouring kingdoms of the Vandals in Africa subverted by the armies of the emperor Justinian, under the command of the famous Belisarius, and this before he could determine with himself whether it would be consistent with his interest to interpose in the quarrel<sup>k</sup>. It appears, however, that he did not neglect any opportunity of recovering the places that had been conquered by the Franks, and that he met with considerable success in these endeavours. But the princes of that nation, having at length put an end to the kingdom of Burgundy, c resolved to employ all their forces in driving the Visigoths intirely out of Gaul ; which however they were not able to effect<sup>l</sup>. Some years after they reviv'd the same project. Childebert, king of the isle of France, and Clotaire, whose residence was at Soissons, pass'd the mountains with a very numerous army, and having reduced every thing in their passage, advanced with great rapidity to Saragossa. Theudis, who found it impossible to raise an army capable of withstanding them, very judiciously determin'd to make his utmost efforts against them upon their retreat, and gave his orders accordingly to Theodisele, whom he appointed his general<sup>m</sup>. Childebert and Clotaire, after having made a composition with the inhabitants of Saragossa, returned with the spoils they had collected in the course of this expedition ; but when they came to repass the Pyrenees, the general of the Goths harrassed them continually, and would probably have destroyed their whole army, if Childebert had not engag'd him, by a present of a great sum of money, to leave the passage free for twenty-four hours, which gave him and Clotaire an opportunity of saving themselves and the best part of their army<sup>n</sup>. The French historians are very silent on this head ; but the facts, however, seem both probable and certain.

THIS war thus ended, the king of the Visigoths was alarmed by the prospect of new dangers ; for the imperial forces, not content with overturning the kingdom of the Vandals in Africa, turned their victorious arms against the city of Ceuta, which, though we have no account how it came into their hands, was at this time in the possession of the Goths, and reduced it before Theudis was in a condition to afford the garrison any relief<sup>o</sup>. He had however assembled an army for this purpose ; and, becoming better apprised of the importance of this place, from its loss, he caus'd his troops to be embark'd as soon as possible, in hopes of recovering it before the Romans had time to repair and provide for its defence. But, though an Arian, it seems he was so strict in his observation of Sunday, as a day of rest and devotion, that the enemy, taking advantage of his piety, made a general sally with such success, that he was oblig'd to raise the siege, and return with his fleet and army into Spain<sup>p</sup> (L). He did not long survive this disgrace ;

(K) We have the former of those two accounts mentioned in the text from St. Gregory of Tours, who lived in those times (42), and therefore it seems to deserve better credit than the latter, which however is reported by Isidore of Seville.

(L) All the modern Spanish historians concur in relating this expedition of king Theudis into Africa as we have represented it in the text ; and all cite, in support of what they say, the authority of St. Isidore of Seville, which would admit of no dispute, if we were sure that he said what they make him say (43). But, notwithstanding the unanimity of the Spanish writers, a modern French historian is fully persuaded, that the Septa Oppidum, in Isidore, does not refer to Ceuta in Africa, but to the little town of Sette in Languedoc, which the Franks having taken from the Goths, king Theudis thought it a point of such importance, as to sail with a body of troops, embark'd on board a fleet collected in haste, in order to recover it ; and that, in this expedition, his forces received that signal blow which oblig'd him to return into Spain with much disgrace (44). The same author likewise adds, that the medals still preserved, having on one side the face of Clotbarius, and on the reverse a cross, with these words inscribed round it, Victoria Gothica, alludes to this action. In order to remove the great difficulty, which is, that Septa Oppidum should signify Sette in Languedoc, as well as Ceuta in Africa, he assures us, that, in some Spanish disgrace; for a person, who either was, or pretended to be mad, having formed a design <sup>a</sup> against his person, without any provocation that history mentions, found means to enter into, and stab him in, his palace <sup>a</sup>. Theodisele succeeds him, and proves a very wicked prince.

THE throne of the Visigoths being vacant, the nobility elected, in the room of their deceased prince, Theodisele, who is also called by some historians Theudisele, Theodigele, and Theodiges, who then commanded the troops. In all human probability, his true character was not then known, or so much as suspected; but, after his elevation, it was quickly discovered: for, being extremely given to women, he set no bounds to his lust, or, where it was necessary to the gratification of it, to his cruelty <sup>b</sup>. This in a short time made him universally odious: as he had already taken off several persons of distinction, some of those who were nearest his person began to be jealous of their own safety, and therefore resolved to provide for it at the expence of a tyrant, who, by violating all laws, had forfeited, at least in their opinion, all title to fidelity, and even to compassion. They waited therefore only a favourable opportunity to remove him; and it was not long before they met with one, which, in effect, was of his own procuring <sup>b</sup>. He invited them to a splendid entertainment, which was one of his principal delights; and, when the evening was far advanced, and most of the company warm with wine, those who were in the secret suddenly put out the lights, and, before he could recover himself from his surprize, buried a dagger in the bosom of Theodisele <sup>w</sup>. This dismal tragedy was acted in the year of our Lord five hundred forty-nine, so that he enjoyed, or rather abused, the regal dignity about a year and five months (O). <sup>c</sup>

On his assassination, Agila is advanced to the regal dignity.

It was natural enough for those who had thus removed one king, to think they had a right, under the same plea of necessity, to make choice of another; and therefore, without waiting for the usual forms, they placed Agila on the throne. This disgusted many of the nobility, who had no share in the election; and his irregular conduct soon increased the number of his enemies <sup>y</sup>. The city of Cordova was the first that refused to acknowledge him for their sovereign; which provoked him to such a degree, that he marched thither with a numerous army, fully resolved to chastise the inhabitants in such a manner, as might deter others from following their example <sup>z</sup>. The people of Cordova, issuing out of the city, attacked him in the field, defeated his forces, killed one of his sons, and obliged him to retire with great precipitation. This success of theirs excited revolts in several places; which Athanasilde, a noble, but a very ambitious Goth, managed with such dexterity, that those who were in arms, and without a chief, invited him to put himself at their head, and proclaimed him king <sup>a</sup>. He might very probably have attained his views without foreign assistance, but he was in haste to be a king; and, <sup>d</sup> maps, he has found Cap de Sette called Monte Septa; and he farther asserts, that Bernard Guido, bishop of Lodova, who flourished more than four hundred years ago, affirmed, that the country was called Septimania from the name of the promontory; which conjecture, though he does not approve, yet he thinks that it is a strong argument of its being antiently called Septa. However, notwithstanding all he says, it will be difficult to find any author in which this cape is called in Latin by any other name than Settium Promontorium. We do not pretend to decide upon this head, because much may be said on both sides.

(O) We are assured by Mariana, that this monarch was the son of the sister of Totila, king of the Ostrogoths, which might in all probability be one motive for raising him to the throne, an honour he so little deserved. We are assured by a very grave historian (45), that this king of the Visigoths, suspecting a miracle which the catholics gave out to be wrought annually on the eve of Whitsunday, in the cathedral church of Offet, where, though wiped ever so dry, the fonts were continually filled with water, he came two years together, and examined it with all the care imaginable;

and, though he was not able to detect any appearance of forgery, he came thither again the third year, when he not only caused the doors of the church to be shut and sealed as he had done before, but previously directed a deep trench to be thrown up round the church, to prevent water from coming by any adjacent springs; all which, however, was without effect, to the king's great surprize. Mariana says, that he was employed in surveying this trench at the very time that he was stabbed (46); which would do no great honour to the miracle, if we could suppose it to be true. But Ferreras allows there are great objections to it (47): in the first place, there is no such city as Offen, Offen, or Offet, in Lusitania; in the next, Theodisele, as a multitude of Spanish writers agree, did not reign above a year and a half (48), which makes it impossible that he could examine this miracle three years together; but, besides all this, St. Isidore of Seville, who mentions a miracle of this kind, and who would have been the best authority that could have been cited in favour of this, places it in Sicily (49), which plainly proves, that what was said to have happened in Spain, had never come to his knowledge.

a that he might be so the sooner, demanded assistance from the emperor Justinian, to whom this application was very welcome, more especially as he proposed at the same time to give a certain district on the coast of Spain, in return for these auxiliaries<sup>b</sup>. The emperor, therefore, sent over a body of troops from Africa, under the command of Liberius, who was immediately put into possession of the maritime country, from the fortress of Gibraltar to the confines of the kingdom of Valencia<sup>c</sup> (P).

THE Spanish inhabitants were very well pleased with this change of masters; for they had always a strong propensity to submit to the imperial authority, on the score of their religion; so that Liberius found it not at all necessary to weaken the body of troops he commanded, by separating them into garrisons<sup>d</sup>. He made haste, therefore, to join Athanasilde; and they were about taking the field, when they were informed that Agila was marching directly towards them, with an intent to give them battle, or to besiege the city of Seville<sup>e</sup>. They began, upon this, immediately to move towards him; and it was not long before a decisive engagement ensued, in which, after an obstinate resistance, the army of Agila was defeated, and himself, with its broken remains, compelled to retire to Merida<sup>f</sup>. He did all in his power to revive the spirits of his party, and to recruit his troops; but the nobility who were about him, considering the many miseries brought upon their country by this civil war, the danger they were in by admitting a foreign force, and disgusted with the insolent behaviour of one who had so indifferent a title, and who, notwithstanding, was continually threatening the utter extirpation of those in rebellion, resolved at last to take that step which appeared to them most for their interest; and, having secretly concerted their measures, removed him much in the same way that those who proclaimed him king had removed his predecessor<sup>g</sup>. This happened in the year of our Lord five hundred fifty-four; and at the same time that his death was made known to the army, Athanasilde was proclaimed king with universal acclamations<sup>h</sup>. He was no sooner informed of this unexpected and surprising resolution, than he sent to give the army assurance of his kind acceptance of their good wishes, and soon after came and joined them with his own. From this time he was, without any farther dispute, acknowledged the legal sovereign of the Goths, whose affairs were now in such a situation, that, if this civil war had not been thus determined, they might very probably have been reduced again under the power of the emperor, who, having recovered Africa and Italy, was very ambitious of retrieving Spain<sup>i</sup>.

d ATHANAGILDE, according to some historians, established the residence of the Gothic monarchs at Toledo, as being a city most happily situated for that purpose, being almost in the centre of their dominions; yet, being strictly examined, this will be found perhaps no more than conjecture<sup>k</sup>. He was without doubt a prince of a very gracious disposition, and one who chose to establish his authority rather on the affection, than, as his predecessor had done, on the fears, of his subjects, which however made him generally and cheerfully obeyed. The Romans, or, as they are called by some modern writers, and not improperly, imperialists, either believing they could never be paid for the service which they had rendered this king at the beginning of his reign, or prompted by the native Spaniards, who, on account of the difference of their religion, hated the yoke of the Goths, began to extend their power, and added several important places to those which had been yielded to them, whether by consent or force does not appear. This, however, provoked the Goths, who represented their fears in such strong terms to Athanasilde, that, finding nothing was to be done by persuasion, he had recourse at length to force, and quickly took from the imperialists all their new conquests. It is possible that some events of importance happened in this war, and that there might be other causes than those we have mentioned; but the silence of the historians of those times has concealed them from our notice<sup>l</sup>. It appears, however, that, from his conduct in this and other respects, Athanasilde rendered himself universally beloved by his subjects, and generally respected by his neighbours<sup>m</sup>.

(P) We have observed in the text, that the Spanish historians call the foreigners, that were now invited over, by different names. As, for instance, they very frequently stile them Romans, because these people themselves affected that title, as subjects of the Roman empire; and for another reason which deserves notice, which is this; that the Goths, who were Arians, unwilling to call the Spaniards catholics, stiled them Romans, as living in communion with the bishop of Rome, and might possibly apply the same title to these strangers in the very same sense. They called them likewise Greeks, the modern historians more especially, because they were the subjects of the Greek emperor. But the title of imperialists is clearer than either of these, as it conveys an idea at once of people subject to an emperor, and governed by his lieutenant who, in those days, was stiled the patrician; an office of very high rank at court, and with which it seems such of the nobility were honoured as the emperor of Constantinople thought fit to trust with his province in Spain (50).

His family, the marriages of his daughters, and the death of that monarch.

THIS monarch of the Visigoths, by his queen Goswintha, had two daughters of admirable beauty, the fame of which reached to France, now governed by four young princes. Of these, Sigebert, king of Austrasia, youngest but one, seeing with regret how much his brethren had dishonoured themselves by unequal marriages and their dissolute lives, resolved to demand in marriage Brunichilde, or Brunebaud, the youngest of Athanasilde's daughters; and accordingly sent Gogon, who was his prime minister, at the head of a splendid embassy, for that purpose<sup>a</sup>. To him that princess was delivered, with a large sum of money, and conducted into France, where she quickly became a catholic; and, though some French historians represent her as a very bad woman, yet others, as well as Mariana, of the Spanish writers, give her a very high character<sup>o</sup> (Q). This marriage was so much applauded in France, that, the year following, Chilperic, king of Soissons, the youngest of the four brethren, resolved to request of Athanasilde his other daughter Galswintha, though he had already two wives, Andoverc, and the infamous Tredegonde<sup>p</sup>. It was with great reluctance the king of the Goths yielded to his desire, and not till the kings his brethren guaranteed his promises, which however were very ill kept, since, at the instigation of Tredegonde, he caused the queen to be strangled; upon which his brethren invaded his dominions, and he was at length obliged to yield to Brunebaud those places which had been given by way of dowry to her sister<sup>q</sup>. Athanasilde, having reigned in peace, and with great reputation, thirteen years, deceased in the year of our Lord five hundred sixty-seven, and before his death, as some writers say, was reconciled to the church<sup>r</sup>.

An inter-regnum of 5 months after his decease, which occasions many inconveniences.

AFTER the death of this wise and great prince, there followed an interregnum of five months; a certain historian says, of five years<sup>s</sup>. The nobility pretended, that they were not able to fix upon a person who had the virtues requisite to support so high a dignity; but, as Mariana well observes, it is much more probable that they had their private views and particular interests at heart, since ambition and jealousy have usually a much larger share than the love of peace, or regard to the public interest, in all disputes of this kind<sup>t</sup>. But, from whatever cause these divisions might arise, they had a dismal effect on the affairs of the nation; for the imperialists, taking advantage of this untoward situation of things, extended their conquests<sup>u</sup> daily, at the same time that several great men began to oppress their vassals; so that, for want of a king, there started up many tyrants<sup>w</sup>. This however produced one good effect; the people in general, and more especially the inhabitants of great cities, began to express their distaste in very loud terms; so that the nobility found, that the best way to provide for their own safety, was to proceed, without farther delay, to the choice of a prince<sup>x</sup> (R).

Liuba is at length elected king of the Visigoths, and dies after a short reign.

UNDER these circumstances, the majority of the nobles at last cast their eyes upon Liuba (so his name appears upon his coins), or, as historians commonly call him, Liuba, who was at that time governor of the Gothic provinces in Gaul, whom they elevated to the throne<sup>y</sup>, though not with the universal consent of the nation, which perhaps is the reason that the historian before-mentioned includes the years of what others stile his reign, in that interregnum which followed on the death of his predecessor. It is indeed agreed, that no prince ever deserved a crown better; for he was not only pious, prudent, and brave, but of so public a spirit, and preferred the welfare of his subjects so much to his private advantage, that, perceiving affairs

(Q) The apology written by Mariana, in favour of this princess, is far from being the least shining part of his history (51), as it must be allowed, that he has offered many probable arguments against receiving in the gross all the imputations that have been thrown upon her. In doing this, he has followed the steps of Boccace and Paulus Emilius, both of them elegant and judicious writers, who saw the ill usage this unhappy queen received in the same light that he did. The strict examination of this matter belongs to another part of our history; and the main intention of this note is, to direct the reader's regard to the consequences that followed with respect to the Goths, from this marriage; which, with a little attention, he will perceive to be the source of the principal events of the two succeeding reigns, in which the greatest changes were brought about, in respect both to church and state, that happened during the continuance of the Gothic kingdom (52).

(R) There is great discordance in the accounts given us by historians who lived in and near these times of this interregnum, at the same time that what they say is so very concise, that it is not easy to comprehend with any certainty their true meaning (53). It is not however altogether improbable, that Liuba was governor of the territories which the Goths possessed in Gaul during the reign of Athanasilde; and that his administration was so wise and just, that the people remained firm in their obedience, while the inhabitants of Spain were in a state of confusion for want of a prince; and that it was the observation of their different circumstances that induced the latter to insist upon an election, and perhaps determined them likewise to desire that the crown might be placed upon the head of that worthy person, who, while their domestic dissensions exposed them to their foreign enemies, covered Spain on that side, which must otherwise have been the weakest (54).

- a would suffer if he removed out of Gaul, and that the Visigoths were in great danger of being driven out of Spain if they had not a chief of distinguished abilities at their head, he proposed to the nobility associating his brother in the regal dignity, as a measure which this conjuncture required, and which led him to propose it<sup>a</sup>. The then state of things, the nature of the expedient, and the disposition of the people, who loudly applauded the king's generous disposition, obliged the nobility to yield to this motion. Liuba, therefore, having made this provision for the security of that part of his dominions, continued to reside in Gaul, where he kept his subjects in the full possession of peace and prosperity to the time of his decease, which happened in the year of our Lord five hundred seventy-two<sup>a</sup>. We have chosen to represent the few events in this short reign all together, that they might appear with greater perspicuity to the reader, than they would have done if intermixed with that of his brother, who became the sole monarch of the Goths at his decease, and one of the most distinguished princes of that nation who had hitherto reigned in Spain<sup>b</sup>.

- LEOVIGILDE, whom his brother had associated in the government<sup>c</sup>, was a person of great power and distinction. Before that event happened, he had espoused Theodosta, the daughter of Severian, duke or governor of the province of Cartagena, whom the Spanish historians conceive to have been the son of Theudis, once king of the Visigoths. By this lady, who was dead before his elevation to the throne, he had two sons, Hermenigilde and Reccared, and, in virtue of this alliance, had a great interest among the native Spaniards, as well as the Goths<sup>d</sup>. In order to extend this still farther, and to put an intire end to those disputes that still subsisted, he thought proper to espouse Goswintha, the widow of the late king, which contributed not a little to augment his authority<sup>e</sup>. He then proceeded to assemble an army, with which he attacked the imperialists, and laid siege to Medina Sidonia, which made an obstinate resistance. At length he found means to enter into intelligence with one of the inhabitants, by whose assistance his soldiers entered into the place, and put all that were in it to the sword, that it might strike a terror into those who had revolted during the time of the late troubles<sup>f</sup>. The city of Cordova felt next the weight of his arms: which he was the more desirous of reducing, as it was a place of great strength, and very important by its situation, but more especially as its inhabitants had shewn a very great zeal for their new masters. They made therefore, as might well be expected, a very vigorous and even obstinate defence, till the king found a weak place. This he prudently battered with that artillery of the first invention and greatest force, a large sum of ready gold, by which he gained admittance; and, being once master of Cordova, reduced many other cities and fortresses, rather by the terror than the application of his arms<sup>g</sup>. Thus while the prudence of Liuba kept all things quiet in the Gothic province in Gaul, the valour and vigilance of Leovigilde restored the reputation of the Goths in Spain.

- WHEN he became sole monarch of the Goths, and saw, that partly through hope, partly from fear, the nobility testified in general a very great affection for his person, and profound obedience to his commands, he resolved not to lose so favourable an opportunity, but, under various plausible and popular pretences, intimated the expediency of associating his two sons, as heirs expectant of the kingdom, and possessors likewise of such a share of authority as he thought proper to intrust them with; which being received with applause by many, and opposed by none, Hermenigilde and Reccared were publicly proclaimed princes of the Goths<sup>h</sup>. Thus the reader sees what an influence the personal virtues of a king will always have, even on an elective constitution. This great affair finished, the king turned his arms against the inhabitants of Cantabria, then a very large province, comprehending not only what is now called Biscay, but all the neighbouring mountainous countries. Notwithstanding the hardness of the people, and the natural strength of the places which they inhabited, Leovigilde reduced them by degrees, chastised them severely for their revolt, and obliged them, though not without great difficulty, to submit to that form of government which he judged convenient to impose; which conquest added not a little to the reputation of his arms, and the security of his government<sup>i</sup>.

- IN the course of these wars, Mir, king of the Suevi, had afforded some assistance to his neighbours, who were in arms against the king of the Goths, which was sufficient to provoke a prince of Leovigilde's disposition, and who was on the point of turning the whole force of his dominions against the Suevi, when their king made such submissions by his ambassadors, as diverted the storm for that season<sup>k</sup>. Leovigilde invaded next the inhabitants of the mountains of Orospe, which are thought to comprehend the Sierras of Cayo, of Molina, and Cuenca, to the frontiers of the kingdom of Murcia, lying in the very heart of his dominions, and which, notwithstanding, depending on their wild inhospitable country, thought to preserve their savage freedom from suffering any controul through him, as they had done against his predecessors. But the king, who understood perfectly the art of war, and his troops that were continually used to conquer, soon taught them a new lesson, obliged them to submit to his mercy, and, upon a second revolt, punished them, as his manner was, with extraordinary rigour<sup>1</sup>. The peace of his dominions being thus settled, he, by the advice of his queen, resolved to demand the princess Ingonde, her grand-daughter by Brunehaud, for his son Hermenigilde; and this marriage being quickly concluded, to the satisfaction of both parties, he put the young prince and his consort into possession of part of his dominions, and sent them to keep their court at Seville<sup>m</sup>. The joy occasioned by this match did not last long; for Hermenigilde, by the persuasion of his wife, became a catholic, upon which a civil war ensued between him and his father, in which the young prince expected assistance from the imperialists; but the old king prevented that by bribing their general<sup>n</sup>; and in a short time reduced his son to such distress, that, at the persuasion of his brother Reccared, he submitted, and, being despoiled of all ensigns of royalty, was sent prisoner to Toledo; notwithstanding which he remained firm in his religion<sup>o</sup> (T).

Troubles in different parts of Spain, and the retreat of the Vascons.

THE dispute between the father and the son had, as might be well expected, the most dismal effects upon the catholics; all of whom were considered by Leovigilde as rebels from principle; and therefore he treated many of the catholic bishops and clergy with that rigor which was natural to him, and which, by degrees, increased into a general persecution; the rather, because of their intrigues with the Suevi, and with the kings of the Franks, from whom, as they were of the same religion, it was natural for the catholics in Spain to expect assistance and encouragement<sup>p</sup>. Queen Brunehaud interposed her good offices in favour of the prince, and of her daughter, but to no purpose; for her mother Goswintha, who was a bigotted Arian, prevented any good effects that might otherwise have attended her solicitation<sup>q</sup>. These religious debates, amongst other mischievous consequences, are supposed to have been the principal cause of the general revolt of the Vascons, who inhabited the countries of Guipuscoa, Navarre, and Jacca; whom, notwithstanding, king Leovigilde quickly reduced by force of arms; and, as well to preserve the memory of his success, as to provide the more effectually against any future revolts, he built, in the district of Alava, a new city and fortress, to which he gave the name of Victoriac<sup>r</sup>. But so short-sighted are the views of all human politics, that this had an effect of which the king never entertained the least suspicion; for though it preserved the country, it lost him the people<sup>s</sup>. The Vascons saw that it was impossible for them to resist the monarch of the Goths, whose forces, by a continual course of action, were become invincible; and therefore, quitting their native seats, they passed the mountains in great multitudes, and, in spite of all the resist-

(T) There seems to be some confusion in the account which Mariana gives us of the disputes between the king and his son Hermenigilde, which may be easily excused; for, amongst many of the antient historians who have undertaken to record these events, there are hardly two that agree about a fact, much less in reference to its circumstances. If we may depend on some, Goswintha, the grandmother and mother-in-law of the princess Ingonde, was very deformed in her person, had lost an eye, and was not only very hasty and passionate, but obstinate also and implacable (97). She pressed the princess, who was but sixteen when she was married, to quit the catholic religion, and to be rebaptized, as the practice was amongst the Arians at that time; and, upon her refusal, had recourse not only to menaces but blows, threw her on the ground, stamped upon her with her feet, and pulled her on the floor by the hair of her head (98). All this happened in the first year after their marriage, which induced the king to send the prince and his consort from court; one author says to Merida (99), and another to Seville (1); but as the latter was upon the spot, and bore a share in this persecution, it is more probable that he is in the right. St. Leander, who was then metropolitan of that city, confirmed the favourable inclinations Hermenigilde had to the catholic faith, and admitted him into its communion (2). An antient historian asserts, that, upon this occasion, he took the name of John (3); which Mariana thinks improbable, because that name does not appear on the gold medals which he caused to be struck soon after his conversion, and distributed amongst his friends (4). Before the end of the year the rupture happened, and prince Hermenigilde, thro' the perfidy of the imperialists, found himself under a necessity of taking sanctuary, out of which he was drawn by the intercession of his brother, to whom the king had promised that he would use him tenderly; notwithstanding which, he reproached him bitterly, when he came into his presence, and ordered him to be confined (5). The true reason that the king's resentment ran so high, was from an apprehension that Hermenigilde's conduct would produce an irreparable breach between the Catholics and Arians, which would exceedingly weaken his power. In order to prevent this, he caused an assembly of the clergy to meet the next year, who were directed to try to frame such forms of public prayer as might be used by both parties; in the management of which scheme the king succeeded tolerably well in this assembly; but when it came to be put in execution, this project proved abortive (6); and as the king attributed this to the hopes the catholics had of Hermenigilde's accession, it incensed him the more against that unfortunate prince (7).

a ance that could be made, possessed themselves of a part of Aquitaine, which from them received the name of Vasconia, or, according to the French pronunciation, Gascony <sup>1</sup>.

WHILE the king was thus occupied in the northern part of his dominions, his son Hermenigilde, having made his escape from the place of his exile or imprisonment, began to take the best measures he could for his own security <sup>2</sup>. But it was not long before Leovigilde marched against him with a numerous army, took Merida in his passage, and advanced directly towards Seville. As in the former war he was deceived in his expectation of assistance from the imperialists, so in this he was undone by his dependence upon the Suevi, tho' with this difference indeed, that Mir, king of that nation, raised all the forces that he was able to assemble, and marched with them to join prince Hermenigilde; but the old king, having exact intelligence of all his motions, brought him into such distress, that he endeavoured to pass out of Lusitania, by intercepting his communication with his own country, at the same time that the bulk of the Gothic army lay between him and prince Hermenigilde, who was at a great distance; so that at length he was constrained to abandon his alliance, and, as some Spanish historians say, obliged to send a part of his troops, which served as auxiliaries at the siege of Seville <sup>3</sup>. That inflexible temper, for which the king was so remarkable, displayed itself to an extraordinary degree in the course of this siege; for a number of persons being turned out of the place, to prevent a famine, he caused them to be put to death without mercy <sup>4</sup>. In a short time the city was in all respects so distressed, that prince Hermenigilde was, with great difficulty, able to make his escape to Cordova; soon after which the place surrendered, and the king marched to besiege his son in Cordova. This he quickly reduced; and Hermenigilde, being made prisoner, was sent loaded with chains to Seville, and not long after removed from thence privately to Tarragona; but that prince having sent an ambassador to Constantinople, to solicit the assistance of the Greek emperor; and orders being sent from thence to the general of the imperialists in Spain to attack the Goths; and that general marching directly towards the place of the prince's confinement, his father caused him to be removed again privately to Seville, and shut up in a tower <sup>5</sup>. He had not continued long there, before an Arian bishop was sent to persuade him to change his religion; which he absolutely refused to do, or to communicate with that prelate at the feast of Easter; and of this as soon as the king was informed, he caused him secretly to be put to death, in the night of the thirteenth of April, in the year of our Lord 584 <sup>6</sup>; which day, therefore, is dedicated to his memory, as a saint and martyr, by the church of Rome <sup>7</sup>. As for the princess Ingonde, he had by her only one son, named after her grandfather Athanagilde, who was sent to Constantinople after his father's death <sup>8</sup> (V).

AFTER the death of his son, Leovigilde prosecuted the war against the imperialists but faintly; yet guarded his own frontiers so well, that they were able to make no impression. In the mean time, however, he augmented his forces, and filled his magazines; from whence it was evident that he had some military expedition in view; and the imperialists, sensible of their inferiority, apprehending his intention was to drive them intirely out of Spain, sued to him for peace; which was readily granted <sup>9</sup>. He then turned his arms against the Suevi, who were at that time under the power of an usurper, named Andaca, who having deposed Eboric, the son of Mir, their lawful sovereign, had obliged him to shave his head, in order to keep it upon his shoulders; that is, to render himself incapable of the regal dignity, by becoming a priest <sup>10</sup>; which had created such jealousies and animosities in the minds of the people, that Leovigilde met with but a very feeble resistance in his passage to Brague, where the usurper kept his court;

(V) We find in Mariana no mention at all made of the first submission and imprisonment of Hermenigilde; but the whole of the story is prosecuted in a continued narrative, in which, however, are inserted the king's letters to his son, exhorting him to alter his sentiments and his religion, and the prince's answer; whereas Ferreras, by a comparison of the several facts and dates that occur in antient authors, makes it highly probable, that the second war between the king and his son took its rise from Leovigilde's violent persecution of the catholics, who thereupon revolted in many places; which, with the hopes of being assisted by the Suevi, induced Hermenigilde to make his escape, and put himself again in arms. We find also great differences, and even contradictions, in the relations given by antient writers of the events of this war; and the only point of consequence in which they seem to be agreed is, that the city of Seville suffered extremely, and was at last reduced by a long siege.

Some writers say, that Hermenigilde retired first to the imperialists, and finding himself but coldly received, withdrew from thence, and shut himself up in Offet, with no more than 300 men; that though the place was very strong, yet being suddenly invested by the king, and being attacked before the garrison recovered their surprise, it was carried by assault. Others affirm, that the people of Cordova, to whom Hermenigilde fled for refuge, fearing the king's resentment, endeavoured to make their peace by delivering him up. Here it is that Mariana introduces Hermenigilde's taking sanctuary in a church, where his brother had a conference with him, by his father's permission; and that historian also gives us Reccared's speech. The princess Ingonde, who was then in the hands of the imperialists, endeavouring to retire privately with her son to her mother, they seized her, and sent her over into Africa, where she died.

which city being invested, was quickly surrendered; Andaca falling into his hands alive, whom <sup>a</sup> he banished to Badajoz, where, as he had served his master, he was, by the command of Leovigilde, shaved a priest <sup>c</sup>. Thus the dominions of the Suevi were added to those of the Goths, and the two nations had thenceforward the same sovereign. The Franks, who had afforded Hermenigilde little or no succours while he was living, invaded his father's dominions in Gaul, under pretence of revenging his death; upon which, Leovigilde, who was grown old and infirm, sent his son Reccared to repel this irruption; believing his own presence necessary to prevent any stir in Spain, where, by persecuting the catholics, he had excited a spirit of disaffection among his subjects <sup>f</sup>. The young prince discharged his office so well, that the Franks were every-where repulsed; but his marriage with Rigorite, the daughter of king Chilperic, upon which his father depended chiefly for restoring peace before he died, proved abortive, <sup>b</sup> occasioned by the death of her father <sup>e</sup>. Gontrand, king of Orleans and Burgundy, continued to arm against the Goths, notwithstanding the little success he met with in his former expedition; and Reccared was again sent by his father into Gaul, to resist these invaders; where having defeated their forces, and settled the peace of the province, he returned into Spain, and married, by the advice of the old king, Bada, the daughter of a rich and powerful Goth, which was universally acceptable to the nation <sup>h</sup>. A little after this, and towards the close of the year, Leovigilde, worn out with age and infirmities, breathed his last at Toledo, and, as some historians say, quitted his errors a little before his end, and was reconciled to the catholic faith by St. Leander, metropolitan of Seville, who had been highly instrumental in the conversion of his son Hermenigilde: yet this is doubtful, as is also the exact time of his death; but the best historians place it in the year of our Lord 585, when he had reigned eighteen years <sup>i</sup> (X). <sup>c</sup>

view of his conduct, and its consequences.

THE great actions performed by this monarch, and the consequences of them, in respect to this nation, are of so extraordinary a nature, as oblige us to enter more particularly into his character. Leovigilde, like most other heroes, was equally distinguished by good and bad qualities; if he was ambitious in a high degree, if he was avaricious in a greater, if he was severe and inflexible beyond measure, he was at the same time extremely brave in his person, a great oeconomist, a lover of justice, and one who was desirous that all, who kept within the measure of their obedience, should enjoy his protection in its full extent <sup>k</sup>. He is not much obliged to the historians who lived in or near his time, and yet they furnish us <sup>d</sup> with facts that sufficiently prove all we have advanced. He found the government in great confusion; he reduced it into perfect order. The laws, which, from the time of Alaric, had been very much neglected, he revised, repealed such as were useless, and added others agreeable to the circumstances of the times. He settled a royal treasury, which had been wanting to his predecessors, and brought the finances under some regulation <sup>l</sup>. He was the first of the Gothic kings that distinguished himself by robes, and other regalia; and it is observed, that he behaved himself on all occasions with such firmness, prudence, and

(X) There are two questions that arise upon the death of Leovigilde, which are not easily settled; the first is, as to the time, which Mariana fixes to the year 586; though he cites one Maximus, who pretends to have been present at his death, and who, not content with marking the year, tells us likewise the day of the month, and of the week, which, according to him, was Wednesday, April the 12th, 587; but the work attributed to this historian has been long ago detected by the ablest Spanish critics to be a gross forgery. The abbot of Biclar fixes it to the latter end of the year 585, and is followed therein by Moraks, Baronius, Paddilla, Ferreras, and other judicious writers; and with very good reason. It appears from the acts of the 3d council of Toledo, that the 8th of May 589, was in the 4th year of king Reccared, which shews that his accession must have been before that day, in the year 586; and we shall see that he did not assume the regal dignity without the form of an election. Isidore of Seville, and the best of the old historians, agree, that Leovigilde reigned 18 years, or rather, that he died in the 18th year of his reign, which, as it began in 568, must therefore have ended in 585. Isidore of Seville fixes the accession of Reccared to the year of the Spanish era 624; from which if we take, according to Ferreras, 38 years, it leaves 586 for the year of our Lord; in the beginning of which he succeeded, according to our computation. But if, according to the sentiments of the best Spanish critics, we find the year of our Lord by subtracting 39 years, his accession will be placed in the year 585, which agrees exactly with what the abbot of Biclar says, and with the records of the council of Toledo; and is at the same time a direct proof, that the account of the pretended Maximus before-mentioned is mere fable. The other question relates to his conversion; as to which St. Gregory of Tours says, it was reported in Spain, that he abjured his heresy, did penance, and was reconciled to the catholic faith, before he died. Pope Gregory the Great assures us, that he died an Arian; and both these authors must speak from hearsay; and therefore their authority seems to destroy each other. It is pretty clear that he recalled Leander, metropolitan of Seville, a little before his death; and it is said, that he assisted him in his last moments; from whence Ferreras thinks it probable that he might die a catholic, and recommend the establishing this religion to his son. Mariana is so sure of it, that he gives us the speech which he made, or might have made, upon this occasion. But Ferreras thinks the whole was transacted with great secrecy, from an apprehension that the nobility among the Goths, who were almost all Arians, might be prejudiced against prince Reccared, if the king's conversion had been publicly known. The judicious reader will form upon this subject what judgment he pleases.

a majesty, that he was much more respected, and, out of comparison, better obeyed, than any of the princes he succeeded; and this by all ranks and degrees of people, in some measure through fear, but chiefly from a conviction of the great advantages that arose from his wise and uniform administration, which, while it kept the nobility in awe, secured the commons from oppression<sup>m</sup>.

But the principal point in his, and indeed in almost every great prince's character, is this, His peculiar advantages in the administration of government. that he was endowed with talents exactly suited to the conjuncture in which he lived; so that his virtues, and even his vices, concurred to the establishment of his government. He comprehended clearly the defects in the Gothic policy; he applied the proper remedies, and he applied them in due order. He began with restoring military discipline; and, when he had restored it, he kept his troops always in action. His predecessors, either thro' want of inclination or leisure, had suffered the inhabitants of Cantabria, and other mountainous countries, to live after their own manner, and without paying the same respect to the laws and regal authority with the rest of their subjects; which he corrected, and took away numberless evils that flow'd from it. He took care to make all places accessible, and to exact obedience alike from all his people<sup>n</sup>. He knew how to cajole, to corrupt, and to divide his enemies, and by these arts, he gradually prepared them for conquest. He attacked them always separately; and whilst his preparations were supposed to be intended against one party, he suddenly made peace with them, and turned his arms against another<sup>o</sup>. He acted on the defensive against the Franks, because he knew that conquest on that side would be very difficult to make, and more difficult to keep. He laid hold of proper occasions; so that his designs were never rendered abortive by his impatience. He made the imperialists feel the weight of his arms, that they might be afraid of offending him; and, as soon as an opportunity offered, he reduced the countries inhabited by the Suevi, while the power of their neighbours was but low, and their own affairs in great confusion<sup>p</sup>.

The history of the Suevi, Sueves, or Suevians, settled in Spain, from the restitution of their government under Remismond, to the total destruction of their kingdom by the Visigoths.

d TH E manner in which the Suevi, with other barbarous nations, entered into Spain, in the beginning of the fifth century, as also how the Visigoths came to engage in a war with this nation, at the request, or at least with the consent, of the Roman emperor, many years after, have been clearly and copiously explained in their proper places<sup>a</sup>. We are in this section, to take up the thread of the history there, and to shew how, after the defeat and death of that obstinate prince, who had involved this nation in an unjust, and, at the same time, an unnecessary war, by which they were undone, they came to retrieve their affairs, so far as to think of reviving their government, and of demanding leave from Theodoric king of the Goths, without whose permission they durst not do it, to proceed to the election of a new prince; in consequence of which they began once more to make a figure, tho' by no means such an one as they had made, or at least were capable of making, before the subversion of their former monarchy<sup>b</sup>. It is true they were still, in point of numbers, very considerable; but, as they were less brave, they were still more barbarous in their manners than the Goths, and were at the same time so pent up in that small district, which they still retained, and which comprehended part of Lusitania, and part of Galicia, that they scarce knew how to act, or on which side to turn<sup>c</sup>. For the Romans were still in possession of the opposite coasts of Spain, and of the best part of Lusitania and the Goths enjoyed all the interior part of the country<sup>d</sup>; at the same time that the people of Galicia, though they might have been absolutely free, yet chose to stile themselves subjects of the empire, and, in that quality, acted against the Suevi with all the force they were able to raise, and yet with no great effect<sup>e</sup> (A).

(A) The monarch of the Suevi, at the time this great revolution happened, was Recharius, a prince who had been extremely fortunate in several military expeditions, and who, seeing the distress of the Roman provinces, had flattered himself with the hopes of making an intire conquest of Spain; in which it is highly probable

THE proposition made on behalf of this nation to Theodoric, as it was a mark of their submission, met with a favourable reception; and they might have brought their affairs into some tolerable order, if they could have been unanimous in an election: but, instead of this, they split into parties, and set up two kings; Maldras, who had been at the head of such as endeavoured to preserve their independency, and Frontan, who was in the greatest credit with the opposite faction<sup>f</sup>. The former of these princes fell with his adherents into Lusitania, where he committed great cruelties upon the Romans, and treacherously surprised the city of Lisbon, while the latter, and those who stuck to him, remained in Galicia, where they made peace with the natives<sup>g</sup>. Frontan did not long survive this; and upon his demise, Remismond was chosen king by his adherents. In a short time after, Maldras made another irruption into Lusitania, where he committed great cruelties; and Remismond, on the other hand, forgetting the treaty that was so lately concluded, renewed his incursions into Galicia; but the inhabitants defended themselves so well, that the Suevi were able to make no great impression<sup>h</sup>. The subjects of Maldras being offended with his barbarous temper, which had prompted him to the murder of his brother, killed him in a tumult, and set up Frumarius for his successor<sup>i</sup>. Remismond, taking advantage of the Easter holidays, which in those days were observed with great devotion, surprised the city of Lugo, put the governor and most of the inhabitants to death; after which the place was pillaged. But Neposianus, at the head of the Roman troops, and Sueneric, who commanded the forces of the Goths, advancing to the relief of the Galicians, killed great numbers of these invaders, and forced them to abandon their new conquests<sup>k</sup>. Some false reports having engaged these generals to retire, the Suevi renewed their incursions, and did as much mischief as ever; till Remismond had intelligence that Frumarius was advancing towards him with a numerous army; upon which he disposed every thing to meet him, in order to decide their pretensions by a battle<sup>l</sup> (B).

bable that he would have succeeded, if he had struggled only with the Roman power (1). But Mariana observes, and, as far as we can collect from the meagre chronicles of those times, not without probability, that Theodoric, king of the Goths, had framed to himself a project of making himself master of Spain, but in a better manner, and with a fairer colour, than that of attacking his neighbours in the time of their distress. It was for this reason that he set up Avitus for emperor, from whom he obtained a permission to conquer all that he could from the barbarians, that is, from the enemies of the Romans in Spain (2). Rechiarus, intent upon executing his own project, invaded what the Romans called the Carthaginian province, without the least apprehension, that, in doing this, he was really taking the first step towards facilitating Theodoric's design, whose sister he had married. The king of the Visigoths immediately sent an embassy to his brother-in-law, to expostulate on the matter, and to engage him to desist from making war on the subjects of the empire; though he had good reason to believe this could not produce any great effect. Rechiarus did not so much as give his ambassadors a civil answer; but having shewn, in coarse terms, how little he was pleased with their presence, he dismissed them, and made a new irruption into the territories of the empire. Theodoric sent his deputies again to complain of this proceeding, and to intimate the necessity he should be under of giving assistance to his allies (3). Rechiarus fiercely answered, that he would speedily come, and give an account of his conduct at Thoulouse. Theodoric, who expected such an answer, immediately passed the mountains with a numerous army; and Rechiarus, being informed of his approach, marched with the whole force of his kingdom to oppose him. A decisive action ensued in the month of October, Anno Domini 456, near the city of Urbico, on the frontiers of Galicia; in which, after an obstinate dispute, the Suevi were totally routed, and Theodoric pursued his victory with great clemency towards such as submitted, and with unrelenting severity towards those who resisted. Rechiarus fled to Porto, with an intention of making his escape from thence to Africa; but the vessel being forced back by contrary winds, he was quickly seized, and sent prisoner to the conqueror, who, in the month of December following, put him to death (4). Some say, that the emperor Avitus being deposed the next year, Theodoric, who had made these conquests as his ally, and who refused to acknowledge the new emperor Majorian, thought he had a good title to keep them for himself (5).

(B) The Chronicle of Idacio, as he is called by the Spaniards, or, as his name is written in Latin, Idatius, and other antient histories, are writ in a manner so concise, that it is extremely difficult to frame any thing like a narrative out of them. Mariana has certainly succeeded as well in general as any other writer; for, with much quickness and penetration, and with an admirable vein of eloquence, he had a sound judgment, and spoke his thoughts with great freedom, yet, in this part of his history, he was not a little embarrassed (6). He makes Frontan or Frantan, as he calls him, to be chosen at the same time, or rather before Maldras, whom he calls Masdras; whereas Idacio clearly acknowledges that Maldras was king of the Suevi before the election of Frantan (7); and whereas Mariana makes Remismond the son of Maldras (8), it is evident from the same old author, that they were kings at the same time, and headed the contrary factions; and that when Maldras was killed by his own faction in a tumult, they elected for his successor Frumarius (9), whom Mariana will have to be the successor of Frontan (10), and whom some writers, without any foundation, will have to be the brother of Remismond, and the son of Maldras also (11), which occasions strange confusion in the history, and renders it at once improbable and <sup>a</sup> THIS gave some relief to the long-harassed natives of Galicia; and their quiet lasted longer than it otherwise would have done, from the event of this action, which, though fought with great resolution on both sides, and extremely bloody, yet proved only a drawn battle, by which both parties were so weakened, that it was agreed to send embassadors to king Theodoric<sup>m</sup>, and desire his interposition; yet as soon as they had breathed a little, and notwithstanding this reference, Remismond renewed his incursions into Galicia; of which the natives complaining to the king of the Visigoths, he sent Cyrilla to the city of Lugo, where he had a conference with the chief men amongst the Galicians, and afterwards made a temporary pacification with the king of the Suevi, which was of no long continuance<sup>n</sup>. In the midst of these transactions Frumarius died, and those who had remained subject to him, considering the mischiefs their whole nation had suffered by setting up two kings, while their territory was scarce big enough to require one, and reflecting on the slaughter they had made of each other in the last battle, very prudently dispatched deputies to acquaint Remismond with what had happened, and to offer him their obedience, which he very willingly accepted<sup>o</sup>. At this time, therefore, the restitution of their monarchy may be properly placed, and the former looked upon as times of confusion.

An obstinate and bloody battle between the last.

THE first step taken by Remismond, after he became the sole monarch of this nation, was to send embassadors to Theodoric, to acquaint him with this event, and to desire that he would bestow upon the king of the Suevi one of his daughters in marriage; which proposition was very kindly received, and the princess, with a large sum of money for her dower, committed to the care of the embassadors, and sent with a numerous escorte of troops from Thoulouse<sup>p</sup>, where Theodoric kept his court, to the frontiers of Galicia, where Remismond received her, and the marriage was solemnized with great pomp and splendor. About two years after, Remismond, taking advantage of the confused state of affairs in Spain, surprised the city of Coimbra, and, after having pillaged it, abandoned his conquest<sup>q</sup>. About the same time, this monarch, in compliance with his queen, embraced the Arian heresy, and sent embassadors to his brother-in-law the king of the Visigoths, to desire that he would send certain prelates to instruct his subjects in that belief; and accordingly one Ajax, who was by birth a Gaul<sup>r</sup>, repaired to the court of Remismond; and thus the Suevi, who, it seems, were ready to embrace their monarch's religion, received the first tincture of Arianism. This alliance with the Visigoths did not hinder the king of the Suevi from making fresh irruptions into Galicia, where he pillaged the town of Aunona, or Abona, between the rivers of Douro and Minho, notwithstanding that they were under protection of Theodoric, and treated the inhabitants with great cruelty; upon which they sent deputies to Thoulouse, to complain of this treatment to Theodoric<sup>s</sup>, who thereupon sent embassadors to expostulate upon the matter with his son-in-law, but without effect; which might possibly have raised some disputes between them, if the monarch of the Goths had not been killed by his brother Euric about this time, as has been already mentioned<sup>t</sup>.

Remismond, sole monarch of the Suevi, marries the daughter of Theodoric.

THIS circumstance seems to have been favourable to the views of Remismond, who gave a kind reception to the embassadors of Euric, renewed his alliance with the Goths, and soon after plundered all the adjacent country<sup>u</sup>. The year following, in consequence of intelligence he had with Lusidius, he entered and made himself master of Lisbon; upon which the Goths, who were in Spain, and saw his soldiers enriched by these predatory expeditions, followed their example, and plundered without the least distinction the territories of the Suevi, and of the Romans likewise<sup>w</sup>. All this time Remismond had embassadors at Thoulouse and at Rome, who, it is probable, acted the part of spies also, and gave him intelligence of the situation things were in, and the understanding that there was between the Romans and the Goths, that he might take his measures accordingly, and extend his territories on both sides, while it was not in the power of either of those princes to send a number of forces into Spain, sufficient to curb these insolent and perfidious breaches of peace<sup>x</sup>. It is highly probable, that, in the course of his reign, he made very considerable acquisitions, and reduced his subjects into better order than that in which he found them<sup>y</sup>. But what were the consequences of this, how long he reigned, whether he established the royal seat at Braga, when or where he died, or was buried, is out of our power to relate, since there is an absolute chasm in the history of this nation for upwards of fourscore years; so that we know not so much as the names of those kings who unintelligible. In respect to this period, therefore, of Suevis history, Ferreras has been our principal guide (12), as well on account of the pains he has taken to range facts in their proper order, as because he agrees precisely with the old authors; whereas Mariana very rarely quotes his authority, and sometimes perhaps trusted his memory a little too much.

reigned during that space, at least with any tolerable degree of the certainty <sup>a</sup>. We must therefore rely upon the indulgence of the reader for this involuntary omission, and proceed to the next prince, of whom we find any account, either in the antient chronicles or Spanish historians <sup>a</sup> of later date, who have been very industrious in their researches (C).

Carriaric king of the Suevi, converted to the catholic

CARRIARIC, or Theudemir, was king of the Suevi in the middle of the sixth century, and cotemporary with Agila king of the Visigoths. He appears to have been a prince of a mild and pacific disposition, and under whom the Suevi were in a very flourishing condition, since it is manifest that his dominions comprehended the kingdoms of Portugal and Galicia, and the best part, if not all, of the principality of Asturias <sup>b</sup>. This monarch had an only son, who fell into a wasting dangerous disease, which baffled the skill of the physicians of those times, and inclined his father, abandoning all other helps, to address himself wholly to devotion <sup>c</sup>. He had heard of miracles wrought by the intercession of St. Martin bishop of Tours, and therefore he made a vow, that if, thro' the interposition of this saint, his son recovered, he would embrace the faith of this holy bishop; that is, he would become a catholic. Having taking this resolution, he sent deputies to visit the tomb of St. Martin on his behalf, who carried presents to the saint in gold and silver, equal in weight to his son <sup>d</sup>. At their return, they made a large relation of wonders they had heard and seen; but, in the mean time, the young prince was not at all better. Carriaric attributed this to his remaining still an Arian; upon which he thought fit to embrace the catholic religion without delay, caused the plan of a fine church, which he intended to dedicate to St. Martin, to be drawn, and laid the foundation; immediately after which he dispatched deputies a second time with richer presents than before, and orders to obtain some of the relicks of that saint for his new church <sup>e</sup>. They succeeded in all their requests, and the prince perfectly recovered; upon which he embraced the catholic religion as well as his father, and, at his confirmation, took the name of Theodimir <sup>f</sup>. We know nothing farther of this monarch; and we should have known nothing of him at all, if this transaction had not been related at large by Gregory of Tours. This king died in the year 559, and was buried in the new church he had built to the honour of St. Martin, which is believed to be the cathedral of Orense, a province of Valencia <sup>g</sup> (D).

(C) Upon the irruption of Euric into Spain with a great army of Visigoths, and extending his conquests on every side, Remismond, without doubt, took his advantage, and made himself master of the remaining part of Galicia; for he durst not now stir round the side of Lusitania, part of which Euric himself subdued; and, as we have shewn in the foregoing section, secured to his successors the greatest part of Spain. In the confusion that happened afterwards in the kingdom of the Visigoths, upon the death of Alaric, and again upon that of Amalaric, we have little reason to doubt that the Suevi might enlarge their territories a little, because, as we shall see hereafter, their kingdom became much more considerable than it seems to have been in the days of Idacio bishop of Lamego, whose chronicle ending here leaves us entirely in the dark as to this nation (13). He was a catholic bishop, and zealous for his religion, which made him less favourable to that nation, by whom he had been very ill-treated, even before they had become Arians, and, through the suspicions of Frumarius, had suffered a long imprisonment, without any just reason (14); Ferreras complains loudly, and not without cause, that none of the bishops of Spain continued his chronicle. It is indeed true, that, in some manuscript histories of the churches of Oviedo and Toledo, there is mention made of two kings of the Suevi between Remismond and Theudemir, viz. Rechila and Theudemond; but as it is evident that those named are interpolated, Ferreras thinks they deserve no credit; and therefore has not so much as admitted them into his catalogue of the kings of this nation (15).

(D) We have assigned in the text the reasons which induced, and indeed obliged, us to mention these miracles, which we have done as concisely as possible. Mariana and Ferreras expatiate largely on this head in their respective histories; but with this difference, that Mariana calls the king of the Suevi, whose son was miraculously cured, Theodimir, without mentioning Carriaric at all, and places this event at least ten years later than it ought to be. Ferreras has rectified both these mistakes, and has also shewn us whence they arose. It seems, in some late editions of the works of St. Gregory of Tours, the name of Theodimir is inserted; and as this agrees with what another antient author has written, Mariana, without scruple, took Theodimir for the king whose son was so strangely cured; and this drew him into the other mistake. We are assured, however, by Ferreras, that all the manuscripts have Carriaric (16), and particularly one of 800 years old, which was in his own possession (17). As to the date, it is agreed on all hands, that Martin bishop of Dumio, who went into Galicia from Tours with the relicks of St. Martin, was the great conductor of this important affair; and St. Gregory relates, that this prelate died A. D. 580, when he had been thirty years a bishop (18). On his authority, therefore, the fact is stated in the text; and as it renders the thread of the history perfectly smooth and consistent, and is also confirmed from the records of the first council held at Braga, at which this bishop assisted, there seems to be not the least colour of doubt that this transaction is rightly placed, notwithstanding that the celebrated Petavius, and other writers of great credit, have followed the chronology of Mariana (19), without taking pains to examine the original authors (20), who have mentioned this event.

<sup>a</sup> THEODOMIR, who succeeded his father, held, in the 3d year of his reign, a council at Braga, which was his capital, where he made a solemn abjuration of the Arian heresy; in which, it seems, he was followed by most of the prelates and clergy in his dominions, to the general satisfaction of his subjects, many of whom were catholics before <sup>h</sup>. About six years after he held another council in the city of Lugo, in which it was resolved to render that see metropolitan; which circumstance we mention, because it affords us the fairest opportunity of coming at a distinct knowledge of the provinces which made up this monarchy <sup>i</sup>. To the old metropolitan of Braga the following bishops were to remain suffragans, viz. Porto, Lamego, Coimbra, Viseo, Idogna, and Dume; whereas the new metropolitan of Lugo had for his suffragans the bishops of Iria, Orense, Tuy, Britonia, now called Mondogredo, and Astorga; so that, in the dominions of Theodomir, there were twelve dioceses <sup>k</sup>. This prince died in the latter end of the year 569 (E).

MIR, or, as Mariana calls him, Miro, succeeded his father Theodomir, and was also a prince of great piety. He seems, however, to have found himself under a necessity of acting under the influence of Leovigilde, king of the Visigoths, in conjunction with whom he attacked the territories which the imperialists possessed in Spain, and forced the Rucones to acknowledge him for their sovereign <sup>l</sup> (F). It has been matter of doubt who these people were, or where their country was situated; but there seems to be no room to question, that till this time they had been subject to the Roman governors, and that the Suevi made war upon them as the allies of the Visigoths <sup>m</sup>.

(E) We have by no means the least intention to stray beyond our proper bounds, and to invade the province of ecclesiastical historians, by mentioning the time when councils were held; but the councils held in Spain, during this period, were in some measure parliaments also, or assemblies of the states; for the great men sat in them, as well as bishops; and as they were called by the authority of the king, so the canons made in them were very often approved and confirmed by him also (1). It is this that makes the assembling of councils, where any records of them remain, that renders them of so great use in illustrating the civil history of this country. In respect to this first council of Braga, it is agreed, that it was held A. D. 563, and in the third year of Theodomir; and this it was that induced Mariana (2) to place the conversion of the Suevi so much lower than he ought to have done, as may be proved from the proceedings in that council; for the acts are signed by Lucretius, metropolitan of Braga, Andrew, bishop of Iria, Flavia, and, in the third place, by Martin, bishop and abbot of Dumio, after whom subscribed five other prelates (3). Now as it was the custom of those times to subscribe according to the seniority of their consecrations; it is evident that Martin bishop of Dumio, must have been some years a bishop, since there were five prelates in this assembly younger than he. This agrees exactly with what was said in the former note, on the authority of Gregory of Tours (4), who places the date of Martin's becoming bishop of Dumio in the year 550 or 551, which, as the reader sees, is very consistent with the records of this council, in which, as Mariana himself observes, there is mention made of king Ariamer (5), which he supposes to be a mistake for Theodomir; but it is more probable that it should have been Carriaric. To put this matter out of all doubt, and to convince the reader that Theodomir was not the king, but the son of that king, who sent deputies to the tomb of St. Martin, let it be considered, that this council was held in the third year of Theodomir's reign, and that Martin, who came a private man to Braga with those deputies at their return, had been twelve years a bishop when this council assembled (6).

(F) The abbot of Biclar (7) calls these people, who were at this time attacked by the Suevi, Arragones, which is very probably supposed to be an error in the print or in the manuscript (8). Isidore, metropolitan of Seville, files them Rucones, or Rocones, but where to find them is the difficulty (9). Some authors, and, amongst these, Mariana, conceive them to have been the inhabitants of the little province of Rioja, which indeed lay very conveniently on the confines of this monarch's dominions, and, though it be but small, is nevertheless celebrated for having as pure air, as rich a soil, and as great plenty of corn and fruits, as any part of Spain (10). If this be the true account of the matter, then these people must have been deprived of their liberty, or subdued after some revolt, since they lay at a distance from, and quite out of the way of, the imperialists. But others again suggest, that this might have been the country of Alpujarros, the inhabitants of which, from their living amongst rocks, had the name of Rocons, or Rucons, who it is thought might depend upon the imperialists; yet this notion is not a little embarrassed; for, in the first place, this small country, which, in spite of all the negligence of nature, is, if not one of the most fruitful, yet one of the best cultivated districts in Spain, owes all this to the industry of its present inhabitants, descendants from the Moors, formerly masters of the kingdom of Granada, within the bounds of which this little country lies (11). We have therefore no reason to suppose, that, in former times, it wore the same aspect that it does at present; or, if we should grant this, it will do us but little service, since, however probable it may be, that at this time the inhabitants were subject to the Greek emperor, yet how the Suevi could have any quarrel with them, or why the king of the Visigoths should suffer king Mir to march with an army through his territories, to conquer these people, is not easily understood (12). The former, therefore, seems to be the more probable opinion; and, it may be, where-ever the Spanish inhabitants could preserve or recover their liberty, they thought it an honour to file themselves Romans, though they had little or no correspondence with the countries that were still governed by a patriarch sent from Constantinople (13).

(13) Prefacion

It was not long after this that the king assembled the second council of Braga, at which both the metropolitans, and most of their suffragans, assisted<sup>a</sup>. He called, in the following year, an assembly of the states of his kingdom, at Lugo, where various regulations, chiefly respecting the church, were made<sup>o</sup>. In the disputes that happened between the king of the Visigoths and his son, Mir, out of his zeal for religion, was inclined to favour Hermenigilde, or at least to support the catholics; but not having a strength sufficient to do this by force of arms, he sent ambassadors to Gontran, one of the monarchs of the Franks, to engage his assistance<sup>p</sup> in the same cause; but his ambassadors unluckily passing through the territories of Chilperic, king of Soissons, that prince caused them to be seized, and kept in prison, till, by another embassy to him, king Mir procured their release<sup>q</sup>. We have shewn, in the foregoing section, what share this monarch took when things came to extremities between king Leovigilde and his son Hermenigilde, and how, after raising an army in favour of the latter, he was constrained to employ it, or at least to suffer it to be employed, against that unfortunate prince, in whose defence it was raised<sup>r</sup>. Whether this misfortune had any effect upon his spirits, or whether the fatigues of the expedition, joined to bad air and unwholesome waters, proved injurious to his health, so it was, that, upon his return to Braga, he was seized with a violent distemper, of which he speedily died, in the year of our Lord five hundred eighty two<sup>s</sup>.

Euric or Eboric succeeds, and is deposed by Andaca.

A. D. 583.

HE was succeeded by his son Eboric, Evoric, or Euric, who was very young, and who, before he had wore the crown a year, was dispossessed of it by an ambitious nobleman, whose name was Andaca, contracted to his sister, but who, to fortify his usurpation, espoused Segonce, the widow of king Mir, and the mother-in-law of Eboric, whom he thrust into a monastery, and obliged to enter into holy orders, that he might be incapable of resuming the crown<sup>t</sup>.

The Visigoths defeat the usurper, and reduce the whole kingdom.

A. D. 584.

ANDACA did not long enjoy the fruits of his disloyalty, or the title of king which he had usurped; for, as soon as Leovigilde had reduced the imperialists to sue for peace, he suddenly turned his arms against the Suevi, wasting all the country with fire and sword, till he entered Braga, which was the capital, where he deposed Andaca, obliged him to enter into holy orders, and then banished him to Badajoz<sup>u</sup>. Thus an end was put to the kingdom of the Suevi; for the country was reduced to the condition of a province, notwithstanding the efforts made by one Amalaric, who assumed the title of king, but was quickly defeated by the generals of Leovigilde, who sent him prisoner to their master: the subversion of this kingdom happened in the year of our Lord five hundred eighty-four<sup>v</sup>.

As we have no mention made at all of the affairs of the Suevi, in any other than church chronicles, and the writings of other ecclesiastics, as in truth the learning of those times was wholly among the clergy; so we cannot reasonably expect, that, from their short memorials, we should be able to collect much, either as to the manners or the circumstances of this nation; yet, notwithstanding their silence, there are several good reasons why we may conclude, that the Suevi, at the time of their being subdued by the Goths, were at least as opulent, if not more so, than the rest of the inhabitants of Spain<sup>x</sup>; for all the antient writers agree, that the countries occupied by them were very fertile in corn, abounding in rich fruits, and exceedingly rich in metals; so that, if it was well peopled, and those people industrious, they must have been rich. Secondly, they had enjoyed a profound peace for near a century; for, if they had but engaged in any wars either against the Visigoths or Romans, there could not have been such a gap in their history; and, lastly, having so long a tract of coast, it is not possible that they should have been without commerce. It is true, that these are conjectures only; but it is also true, that they may be supported from facts, since what is reported of king Carriaric, the presents sent by him to the tomb of St. Martin at Tours, the building and endowment of churches and monasteries in his reign, shew him to have been rich, at least for those times<sup>y</sup>. The number of bishops sees in his dominions, which, though in extent not a third part of Spain, were at least half the number of dioceses in that country, is an additional proof; and the seizing some ships belonging to the Franks, on the apprehension of a rupture, demonstrates, that the ascribing some degree of commerce to these people is far from being a groundless supposition<sup>z</sup>.

The history of the Visigoths, from the reign of Reccared the First, the Catholic, to the intire subversion of their monarchy by the Moors.

THE principal nobility of the Goths readily concurred in raising to the throne Reccared, the only surviving son of their deceased monarch, who had deserved so well of the whole nation in his campaigns against the Franks<sup>a</sup>. His first care, as soon as he was seated on the throne, was to pursue the negotiations his father had begun, in order to establish peace with that potent nation. It was with this view that he sent ambassadors to Gontran, king of Orleans and of Burgundy, who, notwithstanding his late defeats, absolutely refused to hear of any accommodation; but at the court of Childebert, king of Austrasia, these ministers were better received, and on the assurances they gave, that Reccared was so far from having any share in the death of his brother that he beheld it with the utmost detestation, a treaty of peace was speedily concluded<sup>b</sup>. In the mean time Sisbert, by whose hands Hermenigilde was said to be put to death, and who had been captain of the guard to the late king, engaged in some dangerous designs against the new monarch, which brought upon him the punishment he deserved<sup>c</sup>. This summer the forces of Gontran made an irruption, under the command of Didier and Austrovalde, into the provinces which the Goths still held in Gaul, and, being very numerous, carried all before them<sup>d</sup>. At length the army of Reccared endeavoured to stop their progress, and were quickly routed; but Didier, with that impetuosity natural to his nation, pushing the victory too far, and appearing with a small body of forces before Carcassone, where the Goths had taken shelter, they suddenly marched out, and, having surrounded, cut him and his people to pieces: which so elevated their spirits, that they proceeded directly to the attack of the rest of the army under Austrovalde, whom they also defeated with a vast slaughter<sup>e</sup>. The news of this victory were extremely welcome at the court of Toledo, and might perhaps contribute not a little to facilitate the great work the king had then upon the carpet (A).

THE conversion of the king had been early brought about by Leander, metropolitan of Seville; but the declaring himself publicly a catholic was still considered as a very delicate point<sup>f</sup>. At length, after the great victory obtained over the Franks, it was resolved, that the king should propose to the grandees and prelates about his person introducing the catholic religion throughout his dominions; which he accordingly did, in the month of October; and the motion was received, as those things generally are, with all the exterior marks of approbation and applause<sup>g</sup> (B).

(A) According to the French historians, the true cause of that extraordinary and obstinate aversion, shewn by king Gontran towards the monarch of the Visigoths, was openly imputed to the intrigues of Leovigilde with that restless princess Fredegonde, which were alleged to have been carried on in the darkest manner, and for the worst purposes (1). At the bottom, however, it is owned, that the real source of this implacable hatred was an ambitious desire of driving this nation intirely out of Gaul, which produced a resolution of continuing the war, notwithstanding any propositions for putting an end to it, so long as their domestic troubles continued in Spain (2). Upon these principles it was that the king of Burgundy would not suffer Reccared's ministers to come into his presence, but ordered them to retire to Macon, from whence they were directed to send him an account of their commission; upon receiving which, he declared he would have nothing farther to do with them, and prohibited all correspondence between his subjects and the Visigoths (3). Soon after this (as the Spanish authors affirm) the Franks invaded Reccared's territories, beat the army that was assembled to oppose them, and advanced toward Carcassone, where Didier, by an imprudent contempt of an enemy once beaten, was cut off with a small body of horse; and this unexpected blow intimidated the Franks so much, that they made a hasty retreat, which put an end to the campaign (4). On the whole, it is evident enough, that as the historians of one country are disposed to exaggerate, so those of the other are inclined to extenuate, this business; and it is also worth observing, that Gregory of Tours places this event in the life-time of Leovigilde (5).

(B) On his first accession to the throne, we are assured, that Reccared manifested the most upright intentions. His behaviour towards Goswintha, whom he treated as if she had been his own mother, was not only admired by his own subjects, but celebrated by foreigners; and it was by her advice, and with her assistance, he reconciled himself to the court of Austrasia (6). She seems to have gained his confidence by pretending to become

Several conspiracies formed by the Arians against the king's person and government.

A. D. 587.

IN the very beginning of the next year, Autalacus, an Arian bishop, and zealous for his opinion, caballed with two counts, Granist and Vildegern, who were likewise dissatisfied with the king's measures, to raise a general insurrection<sup>a</sup>. In this they succeeded so far, that, at their instance, a considerable body of people took up arms, and falling suddenly upon the catholics, killed many of them, and, amongst them, several ecclesiastics<sup>i</sup>; but the principal officers of the king's troops, being firmly attached to their duty, quickly assembled an army, and put the rebels to flight, the two counts being killed upon the spot, which put an end to this affair, and to the life of the Arian bishop, who is said to have died of discontent<sup>k</sup>. This did not hinder the forming a new and more dangerous conspiracy; of which Sunna, an Arian prelate, who had been metropolitan of Merida, and in high favour with the late king, was the author<sup>l</sup>. He drew to his party two counts, Witeric and Siggon; and, after mature deliberation, doubting of their interest in the city of Toledo, they resolved to open their enterprize at Merida with the murder of Mausona, the metropolitan, who, after being exiled to make way for Sunna, was now recalled, and Claudius, who had the chief command of the forces, and was governor of the city<sup>m</sup> (C). The scheme laid for bringing their design about was this: Sunna proposed a conference with Mausona under the pretence of abjuring his heresy; this conference was to be held in the portico of the cathedral church, and in the presence of Claudius. Witeric, who was that nobleman's great favourite, undertook to dispatch him and the metropolitan as he stood behind their backs; and count Siggon was to assemble a number of Arians to support this action when it was done, and to seize the city<sup>n</sup>. All things went to their wish; Witeric took his post, at the interview, behind the duke and the prelate; while Sunna made a long speech, to give him an opportunity of performing what he promised; but Witeric's dagger stuck so fast in the scabbard, that he was not able to draw it<sup>o</sup> (D). Another plan was then laid, which was to have taken place at a public procession; but in the mean time Witeric, from motives either of piety or ambition, disclosed the whole matter to Claudius; who caused the principal conspirators to be apprehended, gave the king a distinct account of all that had happened, by whose orders they were severely punished<sup>p</sup> (E).

a catholic; in which artifice, no doubt, she was imitated by many of the courtiers, who, to carry on their intrigues the better, appeared very probably the most zealous converts. This might induce the king to believe the conversion of his subjects to the catholic faith a work of greater facility than in truth it was, and in this opinion he might be confirmed by arguments drawn from political motives.

(C) These honours, which in Latin are dux and comes, in Spanish, duc or duque, and conde, were unknown to the ancient Romans, and first introduced under the Greek emperors. When, therefore, the kings of the Visigoths became so potent, as that they apprehended very little difference between them and the emperors of Constantinople, they judged it a manifestation of their own greatness to introduce the same titles; the rather, because the inhabitants of their dominions, having been subjects of the empire, were accustomed to those titles, and to give such as were clothed with them all the reverence they could expect (7). The duke was in those days a military honour, and the person who bore it was commander in chief of the forces within a certain province, whence in process of time he was distinguished by the name of that province (8), came gradually to have a near relation to it, and to exercise, in the name of the sovereign, a civil jurisdiction also; which in Spain, if we may credit Mariana, advanced pretty early to the prerogative of directing the mint, whence that species of money called ducats (9) received its name. Count, again, was not originally a local honour, but a title of office (1); some were governors of towns; others officers in the army, and denominated from the nature of the corps they commanded, so that there were counts of the archers, counts of pioneers, &c. Others were officers in the king's household, and they were distinguished in the like manner; so that there were counts of the butlers, counts of the stable, whence the title of constable is derived; and others were counts by their names, which was a mere honorary title (2). It is requisite farther to observe, that the same person was often both duke and count, and that these honours were in this age, and long after, personal only, and not hereditary.

(D) This Witericus was a young nobleman, who attended on the person of the king, and was in great credit with him, which in all probability recommended him to the favour of Claudius, duke of Lusitania, who appears to have been the ablest man in the service of this monarch, and the person upon whose military skill his master chiefly depended (3). It is suggested, that he entered into this base design, through the persuasions of an Arian bishop, and out of his zeal for that sect (4); but though religion is the common pretence for most conspiracies, they are rarely entered into by men of any religion, more especially if they have any parts, as Witeric certainly had.

(E) The detection of this plot gave the king, and his minister duke Claudius, an opportunity, which they did not let slip, of crushing the heretics effectually, by seizing on the persons of the principal leaders, disarming the common people, and taking proper measures to put resistance out of their power. As to the chief conspirator Sunna, so much regard was shewn to his episcopal character, that it was offered to his choice, whether he would abjure his heresy, or quit the kingdom. He chose the latter; and was sent to Africa, where he died (5). Count Vacriola, who was very deep in this detest-

a THESE proceedings taught the Arians to act with a greater caution, as they still persisted in their design of retrieving their lost power. With this view Goswintha, the dowager of Athanasigilde, and Leovigilde, who had embraced the catholic religion in appearance, took her measures privately with Ubila, an Arian bishop, to remove the king, whom they considered as the great obstacle to their designs; but, the plot being discovered, Ubila, out of respect to his character, was banished only; and, while it was under deliberation what should be done with Goswintha, that miserable princess died, either through remorse or despair<sup>a</sup>. The king, to give a check to this spirit of heresy, so dangerous to himself and to the public, ordered all the writings in favour of Arianism to be brought in and burnt<sup>b</sup>. He next renewed, or rather attempted to renew, his negotiation with Guntran, king of Orleans and Burgundy, who remained as inflexible as ever; and sent a fresh army of sixty thousand men, under the command of Boson, to support Austrovalde, who, having recruited his army, had taken Carcaffone<sup>c</sup>. The king of the Visigoths sent Claudius, who was governor of Lusitania, to command in Gaul, where he had the good fortune to gain a surprising victory, which would have done more honour to the Spanish arms with posterity, if their authors had not related it with such circumstances as render it altogether incredible<sup>d</sup> (F).

KING Reccared, being very desirous to settle the affairs of the church on so firm a basis that it should never be shaken, summoned for that purpose a council at Toledo, where five metropolitans and sixty-two bishops assembled, and made several canons, which were signed by the king, the metropolitans, and the prelates; and thus the conversion of the Goths to the catholic faith became a national act<sup>e</sup>. But, notwithstanding the seeming unanimity with which this great affair was transacted, Argimund, a nobleman in great credit with the king, governor of one of the principal provinces in his dominions, and who had free access to his person, framed a treacherous design against his life, in which he found means to embark a great many persons of different ranks, which very probably made way for the discovery and punishment of himself and other offenders<sup>f</sup>. The Jews petitioned the king to abrogate one of the canons of the late council, by which they were rendered incapable of public offices, of keeping Christian slaves or concubines; and, that they might induce him the more readily to exert his able design, fled to the church of St. Eulalia, and obstinately refused to submit himself to justice. Upon this, judgment was given against him, that he should remain the servant or slave of that church for life, and be employed in such kind of work as the clergy should think proper (6) Count Paul Siggon had both his hands cut off, and was banished into Galicia (7). Those of the better sort, who had been engaged with them, lost their offices and estates, and the meanest of the conspirators were sent into exile. In all those proceedings it is evident, that the king shewed his prudence rather than his resentment, and made the necessity of being secure the only argument for his severity (8).

(F) The French general Austrovalde entered the territories of the Visigoths first with a numerous body of troops, and, meeting with little resistance, advanced to Carcaffone, of which he took possession. Soon after this event arrived Boson with a more considerable army, and vested with the chief command. He was displeased with the conduct of Austrovalde, and the disputes between these commanders had a very bad effect on their inferior officers and their troops, which, joined to the want of any apparent strength to oppose them, occasioned such a contempt of discipline, and such general licentiousness, as must have rendered them an easy conquest to the Visigoths, if they had had any army in the field (9); but, it seems, the forces in the Spanish province were so much inferior, that they retired to the very mountains, and satisfied themselves with taking possession of the passes, where they waited the arrival of duke Claudius with the troops under his command. After their junction, Claudius found his army much inferior to the enemy, but withal found that they wanted discipline, and were without intelligence (1). He caused therefore, his army to advance towards them with as much secrecy as it was possible, and, having brought them as near to the camp as was practicable without a discovery, and made such a disposition as he judged most expedient, he then put himself at the head of a small body of his best men, and boldly attacked their camp, where, finding them feasting, and in confusion, he made a prodigious slaughter before they were in any condition to make a proper defence. At length Boson, having put part of the army into tolerable order, attacked the Visigoths in his turn; upon which duke Claudius made at first a slow, and in a little time a precipitate retreat. The French general pushed him vigorously, the whole army joining in the pursuit, till they found themselves on a sudden attacked by the Visigoths on both their flanks, while duke Claudius, with that handful of brave men, under his immediate command, made a noble stand; so that in a little space the rout became general; and the French, abandoning the field of battle, placed all hopes of safety in speedy flight (2). This, as far as we are able to collect from a comparison of different accounts, is an impartial representation of this signal victory. A contemporary Spanish writer asserts, that it was gained by duke Claudius with three hundred of his guards (3), which some treat as an improbability, and others as a miracle. The truth seems to be, that he ascribed the victory to those who made the first attack. A French historian, who also lived in those times, acquaints us, that there were five thousand killed, and three thousand taken prisoners, (4); but the Spanish historians unanimously affirm, that this was the most decisive victory gained in that age, and so it appears to have been from its consequences; for the French, who were before altogether intractable, began to be well inclined to peace; and Reccared, who was a prince remarkable for his moderation, made a right use of his victory, by concluding an advantageous treaty, without trusting to the uncertain hopes of future victories.

authority, they offered him a very large sum of money, which Reccared, with a magnanimity <sup>a</sup> worthy of so great a prince, rejected with disdain <sup>2</sup>. Upon the death of his queen Bada, Reccared demanded in marriage Clodofinde, the daughter of Brunebaud, and the sister of Ingonde, whom he obtained, notwithstanding she had been promised in marriage to the king of the Lombards, who was an Arian; but it is thought that he in some measure purchased this marriage by the cession of the two fortresses of Jubiniac and Corneillan, part of his dominions in Gaul, to queen Brunebaud, who entered immediately into possession of them <sup>3</sup>; and it is believed that Clodofinde was sent into Spain, notwithstanding we have no distinct account of the celebration of this marriage by any of the ancient historians <sup>2</sup>. Reccared also sent ambassadors to compliment pope Gregory the Great, and to carry him presents of a considerable value, to facilitate a request he made him to procure an extract of the treaties between his predecessor Athanasilde and the emperor Justinian, that he might be precisely acquainted upon what terms the imperialists held the territories which they still possessed in Spain <sup>4</sup> (G).

excellent government.

593. The patrician, who at this time governed those countries on behalf of the Greek emperor, had suffered his people to make some excursions into the dominions of king Reccared, who resolved to take this occasion of reducing these people within bounds, which, by various successful expeditions, he performed; for, it seems, he was a prince of so great justice, that, notwithstanding the provocation he had received, and the superiority of his forces, he would not attempt an absolute conquest, but granted them a peace upon equitable terms <sup>b</sup>. This war was hardly finished, before he found himself embarked in another against the Gascons, who had retired into Gaul in the reign of his father, and, elevated by their success there, made an irruption into the country which they had formerly possessed in Spain; however, the forces which Reccared sent against them quickly recovered the places they had taken, and compelled them to repass the Pyrenees <sup>c</sup>. These military exploits interrupted, in some measure, the king's endeavours to regulate the civil and ecclesiastical affairs of his monarchy, upon such a foot as might equally contribute to the glory of his successors, and to the welfare of his subjects; but, as soon as peace was restored, he resumed those salutary projects: he took care to revise the laws of the Goths, and to make such alterations as the change of customs and manners had rendered necessary <sup>d</sup>. He was employed in this and other acts of a like nature, when he was seized with that illness which deprived Spain of so great and good a prince <sup>e</sup>, in the month of February, in the year of our Lord six hundred and one.

598. He left behind him three sons, Liuva, Suintila, and Geila; but who were the mothers of these princes, is by no means clear <sup>f</sup>. The eldest is supposed to have been a natural child, begotten on some woman of mean condition, five years before his accession to the crown; and it is very likely the other two were the sons of Bada, since there is no author that mentions having issue by queen Clodofinde <sup>2</sup>. The respect of the nobility, and the affection of the people towards his memory, was so strong, that, notwithstanding the blemish in his birth, and his being but twenty years of age, Liuva was elected and proclaimed king without opposition <sup>h</sup>. The dawn and the close of his reign, however, followed close upon each other; for, notwithstanding he was a young prince of great hopes, and did nothing that ought to have deprived him of the affections of his people, yet he was quickly despoiled of his crown, his liberty, and his life <sup>i</sup>. The instrument of all this mischief was Witeric, whose life his father had spared. We have but a very dark account how it was brought about, and shall therefore follow the sentiments of an eminent historian, who suggests, that this cunning traitor first inveigled the young prince to signalize his very accession to the throne by the expulsion of the imperialists; which having represented to him as a very easy thing, and being intrusted

(G) This count Argimond, the principle conspirator, was chamberlain to the king, and might therefore have executed his detestable design with very little difficulty, if the death of his master had been all he sought; but he had his own advancement likewise in view, and proposed, when the throne was vacant, to fill it with his own person, which obliged him to seek assistance among the nobility, and this made way for the detection of his designs (5). The king, who saw how much his clemency had been abused, dealt with this nobleman and his associates much more severely than had been practised in regard to the former conspirators; for, in the first place, the count's head was shaved, which, as Mariana remarks, degraded and rendered him infamous, then he was whipped, and his right hand cut off; after this, being mounted on a mule, he was led through the streets of the capital, and exposed to the derision of the people; and lastly was beheaded; all his accomplices were likewise punished with death, which put an end to those conspiracies that had been hitherto so frequent (6).

a with the army that was to perform this great action, he corrupted the principal officers, and, with their assistance, not only deposed the king, but cut off his right hand, thrust him into a prison, and not long after put him to death<sup>k</sup> (H). A. D. 603.

WITERIC was immediately declared king by those who had assisted him in the perpetration of these cruelties; and, as if he intended to have shewn that he was not altogether unworthy of that dignity to which he was raised in so unwarrantable a manner, he prosecuted the war against the imperialists with vigour, and, in a general action in the neighbourhood of Sigüenza, gained a complete victory, and brought their affairs into the utmost distress<sup>l</sup>. This gained him some reputation, for the populace are always on the side of success. Soon after Theodoric, king of Burgundy, demanded in marriage the princess Hermenbergue his daughter, testifying, at the same time, a desire that the feuds which had so long subsisted between the Franks and the Visigoths might, in consequence of this marriage, be buried in perpetual oblivion<sup>m</sup>. This flattered the vanity Witeric extremely; he was doubtful how the neighbouring princes would relish the method by which he rose to sovereignty, and was charmed with this mark of deference and esteem which he could so little expect. He treated the ambassadors with all imaginable kindness, yielded very graciously to their request, and sent the princess Hermenbergue back with them into France, with a numerous and magnificent equipage. This scene of triumph was, however, quickly interrupted; Theodoric took some distaste to Hermenbergue, and sent her back again to her father<sup>n</sup>. Some say, and it is not at all improbable, that Brunehaut effected this by her intrigues; but, however it was brought about, this so exceedingly offended Witeric, that he endeavoured to form a confederacy with the monarchs of the Franks and Lombards against the king of Burgundy, in order to strip him totally of his dominions, in revenge of the affront offered to his daughter (I). 604.

THIS negotiation, which he pursued with indefatigable zeal, and at a vast expence succeeded to his wish; Clotaire, king of Soissons, Theodobert, king of Austrasia, together with Agilulph king of the Lombards, entered into the alliance; and the division of Theodoric's dominions was already settled, when, by promising Theodobert better conditions than were allowed him by this treaty, Theodoric drew him to his side, and the rest of the princes growing diffident of each other, the league was dissolved<sup>o</sup>. This rendered Witeric despised at home,

(H) The deficiency of antient and contemporary historians renders this part of our history somewhat obscure. The chronicle of San Juan de Valclara, as the Spaniards stile him, or, as he is generally called, the abbot of Biclár, notwithstanding that he was bishop of Girona, ends under the former reign (7); so that all the light we have now left is the history of St. Isidore of Seville, an author very succinct, more especially in such passages as do no honour to his country. There is indeed a certain writer who pretends to fix the very day on which Liuva was murdered, which, he says, was the fourteenth of April six hundred and four; and that he was buried in the church of St. Mary at Toledo, with great lamentation; but as his authority is of no credit, we cannot rely upon his information (8). Mariana assures us, that this young monarch rendered himself respected and beloved by his sweet and majestic air, his beneficence, and other royal virtues, which he inherited from his father, so that his loss was bitterly bewailed by the whole Spanish nation. He farther remarks, that some pieces of gold coin, bearing the impression of this prince, are still extant, having on the reverse Hispali Pius, to shew that they were coined at Seville (9). He farther observes, that we may be certain these pieces ought to be attributed to Liuva the Second, and not to his uncle, Liuva the First, because the prince they represent has a crown upon his head, which regal ornament was not in use before the reign of Leovigilde, of whom, and of Reccared, there are several pieces of gold coin extant in the French king's cabinet.

(1) The history of this lady's marriage, which was very near being fatal to two of the greatest nations in Europe, has in it something so strange, that the principal circumstances deserve our notice (1). This Theodoric, king of Burgundy, was so well disposed to an alliance with the king of the Visigoths, that he sent Aradius, bishop of Lions his high constable Eborim, and count Rogon, a nobleman of high rank at his court, as his ambassadors to Witeric at Toledo. The monarch of the Visigoths objected the bad behaviour of some of the French kings to their wives, and particularly the dissolute behaviour of their master, who had several mistresses, and children by them; so that he was unwilling to proceed in the negotiation, unless these ministers would bind themselves by an oath, that the princess should be always treated in a manner suitable to her quality, and that the king should never remove her from the throne, which security they accordingly gave. When they brought the princess into France, the king came to meet her at Chalons on the Saone, where he seemed to be extremely well pleased with her, and behaved with all the respect and tenderness imaginable (2). While this marriage was treating, Brunehaut had represented to the king's sister Theudelane, that, without doubt, her influence would be intirely lost from the moment the queen was espoused. This put her upon practising every art of which she was mistress, to delay the solemnity; and, having carried this point, she insinuated, that the princess had some personal defects, by which the king was gradually disgusted. After having kept her about a year, he resolved, against all the rules of honour and decency, to send her home again; and, having broke through these, he made the less scruple of being dishonest likewise, and detained a large sum of money which she brought with her out of Spain. In one respect he seems to have acted right; he cast no aspersions whatever upon the lady, but suffered the blame of this action to lie wholly where it ought to lie, upon himself (3).

home, where the ill usage the daughter had received was ascribed to the wickedness of the father; and a rumour being spread at the same time, that he was privately an Arian, and meant to restore that heresy, such a general defection ensued, as prompted some, whom he had disobliged, to fall upon him as he sat at dinner, without the least suspicion of what happened, and, having stabbed him, they threw the body out to the people, who, after dragging it through the streets, and offering a thousand insults, they at last buried it amongst malefactors executed for their crimes, in the year of our Lord six hundred and ten <sup>p</sup>.

election, and short reign over the Visi-goths.

AMONGST those who directed the resentment of the populace against the miserable Witeric, there was one Gundemar, a man of great quality, and adorned with many virtues. He had previously formed schemes for placing himself upon the throne, and they were attended with success; for, very soon after the death of Witeric, he was elected and declared king. He studied to maintain a constant correspondence with the Franks, which for many ages was looked upon as a mark of prudence and good policy; but, from some papers which have been seen by Mariana <sup>a</sup>, and other Spanish historians, it appears, that he bought their friendship by an annual pension, which did him no honour in the sentiments of the Visigoths, accustomed to receive rather than pay such kinds of tribute (K). Yet in his person he was brave; and had no sooner information that the Gastons had renewed their incursions, than he marched against them with an army, entered their country, which he laid waste with fire and sword, obliging them to take shelter in their mountains <sup>r</sup>. After his return to his capital, he directed a council to be held at Carthagena, in which several canons were made by the prelates who assisted therein, which he afterwards signed and confirmed; a plain proof that the king's supremacy remained as yet unimpeached in Spain <sup>s</sup>. While he was thus employed, the imperialists committed hostilities against his subjects, which constrained him to turn his arms against them; and they, finding their forces far inferior to the Goths, retired to a strong camp, where they fortified themselves in the best manner they were able. Gundemar, however, attacked and carried their intrenchments, gaining a signal and a bloody victory, which terribly distressed their affairs, and extinguished all desires of revenge for the present <sup>t</sup>. He then returned into his own dominions, and held another assembly of the clergy; soon after which he fell sick, and died in the beginning of the year six hundred and twelve, when he had governed but a short time, and had rather raised than satisfied the expectations of his subjects, who, notwithstanding, expressed great concern for his death, on account of the unquestionable proofs he had given of his piety, courage, and zeal for the public welfare <sup>u</sup>.

SISEBUT was elected upon the demise of Gundemar, with the universal approbation of the nobility and clergy, on account of his many excellent qualities, amongst which his learning was not the least conspicuous <sup>w</sup>. He was scarce seated on the throne, before the public tranquillity was disturbed by two insurrections, one of the Asturians, and the other of the Rucons: against the former the king sent a body of troops commanded by Rechila, and another against the Rucons, at the head of which was prince Suintila, in the sentiments of many the son of Reccared; and both these officers met with all the success that could be expected, obliging the people to return to their duty, after they had chastised them for departing from it <sup>x</sup>. This

(K) The substance of this note will shew the reader with what discretion public histories are to be read; for none of those that have been hitherto published of the kingdom of the Goths in Spain, written either by contemporary writers, or by those who lived near these times, say the least word of that connection, which, it seems, subsisted between king Gundemar, Theodoric, king of Burgundy, Theodebert, king of Austrasia, and Clotaire, king of Soissons; which last, in the reign of Gundemar, became the sole king of the Franks (4). Yet, in the opinion of the best modern historians, it incontestably appears from the letters of count Bulgerano, at that time governor of the territories possessed by the Visigoths in Spain, which papers are still preserved in the archives of the university of Alcala, and in the library belonging to the church of Oviedo, that Gundemar paid these princes an annual tribute, amounting to a considerable sum for those days; and, as is very natural in such cases, was had in great contempt by those to whom he paid this pecuniary acknowledgement (5). It seems that, to cultivate a friendship with that nation, he sent an embassy into France, composed of persons of distinction, who were very ill treated; which he was so far from resenting, that he sent other ambassadors, who were still worse used, and sent back again without being admitted to an audience. Count Bulgerano, who it is probable was not let into the secret of his master's extraordinary complaisance, was so provoked at this, that he refused to suffer the French ambassadors sent to Gundemar to pass through the province; and even went so far as to declare war in his master's name, in order to obtain satisfaction for the indignity that had been offered to the crown, and recovered the two fortresses which Reccared had yielded to Brunelaud, that princess being dead, and none of her descendants remaining (6). The boldness of this proceeding had a good effect; and, as the count stopped there, the French did not think fit to make any attempts on that side; so that in this posture things remained till the death of Gundemar, and a better understanding between the two crowns was restored under the reign of his successor:

- a gave the king great satisfaction, as it did credit to his arms at the beginning of his reign, and afforded him rational hopes of success in the design he had formed of completing, what several of his predecessors had made some trials to effect, the entire reduction of what the imperialists possessed in Spain, where at this time they were masters of the whole coast, from the straits of Gibraltar to the frontiers of Valentia, and had also the little country of Algarve, with a line of numerous little fortresses along their frontiers. As he knew that this would be very acceptable to his subjects, and would deliver his successors from many inconveniences, he made the necessary preparations for assembling a potent army, and for providing all things necessary for their keeping the field longer than was usual in those days; which could not be done without affording the enemy an opportunity of guessing at least at his design, and consequently of providing for their own defence; though it does not appear, from their method of managing the war, that they fully penetrated the scheme of king Sisebut, or believed there was any danger of his executing it if they did; since, if they had, they would certainly have acted only on the defensive, and availed themselves of the strong places they had fortified with so much care.

- THE patrician Cesarius had at this time the direction of the affairs of the imperialists in Spain; and, as soon as he was informed that Sisebut was at the head of his army, he marched with his forces to give him battle, in which he was totally defeated with great loss<sup>b</sup>. Sisebut prosecuted his victory like a great captain, and one who did not fight for the honour of victory, but for the consequences of it, and actually reduced several great towns on the frontiers, which none of his predecessors had ventured to attack. Cesarius, believing that the only method left to deliver his country from so formidable an enemy was to bring on another engagement, in which he might have better fortune, took all imaginable pains to recruit his army, attributing the success of their Goths in the last action to their superiority in number. Experience convinced him of that error; he fought again, and was again defeated, with much greater loss than before; for, exclusive of those who were killed on the field of battle, many thousands of his soldiers were taken prisoners<sup>c</sup>. Sisebut availed himself fully of this victory like an able general, and a good prince; for he gave directions that the utmost care should be taken of the wounded, paid the ransom of all the prisoners to his own soldiers, and then released and sent them home<sup>d</sup> (L). This behaviour put it out of the power of Cesarius to raise another army, and most of the fortresses surrendered as soon as he appeared before them. The patrician knew not what to do with a prince whose clemency was more fatal to him than his courage; and, perceiving that he had conquest in view, he very prudently determined to make the best terms he could<sup>e</sup>. He sent, for this purpose, an ambassador to king Sisebut, under colour of doing honour to Cecilius, a bishop among the Visigoths, who, desirous of leading a quiet and retired life, had quitted his see, and taken shelter in a monastery among the imperialists, from whom Sisebut had demanded him at the beginning of the war<sup>f</sup>. By this ambassador Cesarius sent a letter to the king, desiring to know what terms the imperialists might expect, in case, for avoiding the effusion of Christian blood, they should be disposed to submission. The king received the minister kindly, answered the letter graciously, acquainting Cesarius with his terms; who consented to them, provided he might have leave to send them to his master the emperor Heraclius, for his approbation<sup>g</sup>.

Reduces them to desire a peace on any terms he would prescribe.

WE are assured by Mariana, that king Sisebut, having made choice of Theodoric, a nobleman much in his confidence, to repair with Ansemund, whom Cesarius had appointed to carry the treaty to Constantinople<sup>h</sup>, the emperor readily accepted it, adding only this condition, that the king of the Visigoths would rid his dominions of the Jews; for Heraclius, who was much given to judicial astrology, and other superstitions, was exceedingly troubled about a prophecy, that the empire should be speedily subverted by a wandering and circumcised nation, enemies to the Christian faith, which he applied to the Jews; and not contented with persecuting them in his territories, pursued them into France, Spain, and other countries, with impla-

(L) The very high character this monarch had obtained, both as a statesman and as a general, might well induce us to believe, that in this there was at least as much of policy, as of generosity and tenderness of heart. An ancient writer, however, assures us of the contrary; and "that king Sisebut, when he saw the great slaughter his troops made of the enemy, cried out in a transport of passion, Unhappy man that I am, to see so much blood spilt through my means! whereupon, at the hazzard not only of the victory, but of his person, he prevented any farther carnage, and rescued with his own hand many who were on the point of being killed" (7). He might, without doubt, have had the honour of driving the imperialists out of Spain; but, whether from a motive of justice or policy is uncertain, he chose to leave them still a small district, which they held rather by his courtesy than by their own power, or that of the emperor, whose affairs at that time were in a very low condition, and likely to fall still lower (8).

cable resentment<sup>1</sup>. However this matter may be, there are two things equally certain; the first, that Sisebut did actually persecute the Jews, compelling numbers to be baptised, and obliging the rest to leave his territories<sup>2</sup> (M); the other, that the emperor Heraclius ratified this treaty, and gave up all the country he possessed in Spain, along the coast of the Mediterranean, reserving only Algarve, as it is now called. Upon the execution of this treaty, it is believed, that king Sisebut caused the city of Evora to be fortified, and several towers to be erected on his frontiers, for the protection of his subjects, in case the imperialists should ever grow sick of being confined within such narrow bounds<sup>3</sup>. Such was the issue of this war, which did honour to the courage, the clemency, and the capacity, of this victorious monarch, who in so short a time achieved a conquest so important.

His accomplishing one great design was, with this wise and able prince, only the first step to another; for the inhabitants of the opposite coast of Africa committing frequent piracies upon those who were now become his subjects, he brought the whole naval force of his kingdom round to that side; and, as the most effectual method of putting an end to these disorders, he embarked the best part of his army that had subdued the imperialists, and, making a descent in Mauritania, reduced Tangier, Ceuta, and all the adjacent district, into which he put strong garrisons, and so freed his people at once and for ever from the dangers they were exposed to on that side<sup>4</sup>. This was the last great action of his life, except that which some would persuade us brought upon him the judgment of a sudden death<sup>5</sup>, the reader will judge with what probability. The bishop of Barcelona permitted a play to be acted in his church, in which were introduced certain superstitious ceremonies of the pagan religion. Eusebius, metropolitan of Tarragona, to whom that bishop was a suffragan, gave an account of this proceeding to the king, who immediately wrote him a letter, which is still preserved, directing him to depose that prelate, and to consecrate another in his stead, which was accordingly done<sup>6</sup>. In this it is pretended that the king exceeded the bounds of his authority; but those who say so plainly beg the question, since the metropolitan's application to that monarch is such a proof of the supremacy of the kings of Spain in those times, as will never be overthrown by the surmise of the king's days being cut short on that account; which is so much the more impertinent, as the bishop was deposed before Easter one year, and the king did not die till the spring of the next, which was the year of our Lord six hundred twenty-one<sup>7</sup>.

Reccared II.

THE nobility among the Goths, believing it incumbent upon them to shew how true a sense they had of the merit of their late sovereign, set his son, though a minor, upon the throne; and he was accordingly declared king, by the name of Reccared the Second<sup>8</sup>. He was endowed with many good qualities; and resembled his father so much in the whole turn of his disposition, that the nation unanimously approved the setting the crown upon his head, and promised themselves the greatest felicity under his reign; but the rejoicings for his accession were hardly over, before a general sense of sorrow was awakened by his loss, which happened when he had held the sceptre some say three, and some say four, months<sup>9</sup>. We are not told where, or of what distemper, he died; but, it seems, he was no sooner dead, than the eyes of the Visigoths were turned upon prince Suintila; which is not at all wonderful, if he really was, what Mariana and other historians affirm him to be, the son of Reccared the catholic, by his queen Bada<sup>10</sup>; which, however, Ferreras very much doubts<sup>11</sup>, because the antient historians, who could not be ignorant of the fact if it was so, are nevertheless silent upon this subject<sup>12</sup>. However that matter might be, Suintila had personal merit enough to engage the attention of his countrymen, whose forces he had commanded in several expeditions, and had thereby established a reputation both of being an able and a successful general.

(M) We have stated this matter in the text as it is related by Mariana (9), always a most elegant, and, generally speaking, a careful and impartial historian; yet here he seems to be mistaken, and to have been governed by those probabilities which we have represented in their utmost strength in the upper part of the page. But a most judicious, learned, and noble Spanish critic, has very clearly and candidly shewn, that the imputation upon the emperor Heraclius is no better than a popular story, very ill founded: that king Sisebut was so far from being influenced either by the persuasion or the conduct of that emperor, as Mariana and other historians upon his credit have supposed, that in reality he published these edicts against the Jews very early in his reign, and before he had any correspondence with the court of Constantinople (1).

<sup>a</sup> SUINTILA began his reign by taking certain measures which were universally acceptable to his own subjects; for he directed that the laws should be strictly put in execution, without respect of persons, and that proper care should be taken for the relief of the poor: that, on the one hand, such as were guilty of bad actions, from the malignancy of their hearts, might not escape with impunity; and that none might be tempted by necessity to trespass on the laws, on the other. By a steady attention to these points, the domestic tranquility of his people was secured, which however was quickly troubled from abroad by a formidable irruption of the Gascons, who spread terror and devastation where-ever they came <sup>w</sup>. The king had no sooner intelligence of this, than he dispatched orders to the governors of the adjacent provinces to assemble what forces they could, and to secure the passages behind these barbarous invaders, who, finding themselves for some time unopposed, continued to advance, and to live every where at discretion <sup>x</sup>. But it was not long before king Suintila appeared in person at the head of a numerous and well-disciplined army; upon which the Gascons began a precipitate retreat; but finding it impossible to repass the mountains, and perceiving themselves environed on all hands, they sent deputies to the royal camp, to implore the king's compassion, on any terms that he should be pleased to prescribe <sup>y</sup>. Suintila gave these deputies a favourable reception; and having obliged the Gascons to restore all they had taken, and to build a strong fortrefs to prevent their future incursions, he suffered them to return home safely, with a gratuity for their labour. The name of this place was Oligito, but modern writers are by no means agreed by what name it is distinguished at present <sup>z</sup>. Some think that it is the city of Olite <sup>a</sup>, once the capital of the kingdom of Navarre; others imagine it to be Fontarabia <sup>b</sup>, on the frontiers of France and Spain; and others will have it the city of Valladolid <sup>c</sup>. We mention their several opinions, because where the natives of a country, in cases of this nature, disagree, it would by no means become us to decide. Where-ever it was, the king's clemency and prudence sufficiently appeared, in making so just a use of his superiority to convert a present calamity into a means of preventing any thing of the like nature from falling out in times to come <sup>d</sup>. This expedition over, he returned to Toledo in triumph, his subjects being alike rejoiced at the signal advantages his courage and conduct had gained, and the just and moderate use he made of them.

622.

<sup>d</sup> SUINTILA, desirous of atchieving all that was still necessary to make his sovereignty independent and illustrious, conceived a design of driving the imperialists out of that little corner which they still possessed about cape St. Vincent <sup>e</sup>. His army was more than sufficient for that purpose, and therefore he made but little doubt of carrying this country in one or two campaigns. If it be true, which Mariana suggests, that the emperor Heraclius was so imprudent as to divide the government of this little territory, and to appoint two patricians, contrary to the custom of his predecessors, which gave the king of the Visigoths an opportunity of raising jealousies between them, it is no wonder that he thought the conquest easy <sup>f</sup>; but it seems more probable that there was but one patrician who ventured to give the king battle when he entered this country, and had the misfortune to fall in the engagement; upon which another assumed the title and administration, till such time as the court of Constantinople thought proper to send a new governor, together with the necessary supplies <sup>g</sup>. But the affairs of Heraclius were at this time in such confusion, and he found himself so hard pressed at home, that he was content to name a governor, and leave him at liberty to act according to the situation of things at his arrival. Suintila pushed his conquest with such vivacity, that the new patrician saw little or no hopes of preserving that country to his master: he collected, however, what forces were still left, and, with a courage inspired by despair, disposed all things for an obstinate resistance <sup>h</sup>. The king, unwilling to expose an army, that had already done him so much service, to the loss that must have ensued from vanquishing men who had scarce any thing to lose but their lives, and who would therefore be sure to sell them dear, insinuated to the patrician, that tho' he looked upon his conquest as secure, yet he was unwilling to destroy so many brave men, who might be useful to their country, and to themselves elsewhere; and that therefore, if they would transport themselves out of Spain, he would gratify himself, his officers, and even his soldiers, in such a manner, that they should have no reason to complain <sup>i</sup>. This proposition, being known, discouraged the troops of the enemy to such a degree, that the patrician found his closing with the king's offers was not only the wisest, but the single measure which was left for him to take; so that the evacuation of the country was settled by a kind of convention, and Suintila, as he had promised, made the patrician and all his dependents an ample compensation for what they left behind, esteeming it a cheap purchase, since, upon their departure, he became sole monarch of all Spain, an honour which none of the kings of the Visigoths had hitherto reached <sup>k</sup>.

Having procured the consent of the nobles to associate his son, Suintila becomes a tyrant.

A. D. 626.

THE reputation acquired by this conquest facilitated the only great point Suintila had now a in view, which was, procuring the consent of the nobility for associating his son Ricimer in the government, which included a tacit election upon his father's demise<sup>1</sup>; a thing, however difficult in its nature, that he obtained with so much ease, as proved the means of rendering it altogether ineffectual (N); for such is the unhappy disposition of some minds, that, though equal unto every difficulty and danger, they are easily seduced by prosperity. As soon as this was done, as if, the reward of his virtues being attained, they were of no farther use, Suintila almost at once threw off the character of a gracious prince, to put on that of an oppressive tyrant<sup>m</sup>. Seduced by the evil counsels of his queen, and his brother Gelian, he grew haughty, voluptuous, and avaricious, treated the nobility with contempt, exercised the most unjustifiable acts of cruelty on all who testified their dislike of his proceedings; and levied such prodigious taxes, as diffused universal poverty and discontent through all the provinces under his dominion. This in a short time disposed every thing for that revolution which afterwards happened; for a prince, who has once lost the hearts of his subjects, is in the power of every accident, and the murmurs of the commons naturally inspire the grandes with thoughts of turning them to their own advantage, more especially in elective monarchies, where the voice of the people conveys or confirms a title<sup>n</sup>.

An insurrection against him, in consequence of which he is deposed.

THE provinces belonging to the Visigoths in Gaul were then governed by Sisenand, a person of great distinction, and one who, with considerable talents, had an ambition that surpassed all bounds. He was quickly informed of that amazing change which had happened in the behaviour and temper of the king his master, which put him upon forming intrigues that might conduct him safely to the throne<sup>o</sup>. He had various correspondences in Spain; but the knowledge his friends had of the martial disposition and great military talents of Suintila, made them unwilling to hazard a revolt unless they could be secure of some support. In order to procure this, Sisenand applied himself to Dagobert, king of France, a prince who, amongst other foibles, was strangely delighted with a glaring and preposterous magnificence, to whom he promised a fountain of solid gold, and exquisitely wrought, of the weight of fifty pounds, which Aetius the Roman general had presented to Torismond, king of the Visigoths, as a monument of gratitude for that service which he had rendered the Roman empire<sup>p</sup> (O). Dagobert listened to his request; and, having ordered the troops he had in Burgundy, under the command of Abondantius, to join those that were already about Toulouse, under Venerand, he directed them to assist Sisenand in his irruption into Spain<sup>q</sup>. Suintila had early intelligence of this revolt; and, having put himself at the head of his army, he arrived within a few days march of Saragossa, about the time that Sisenand took possession of the place. The next morning when he was about to make the necessary dispositions for a general engagement, he was surprised to hear Sisenand proclaimed king of the Visigoths in his own camp, with the unanimous acclamations of his soldiers, and that nobody was more active therein than his brother Geilan<sup>r</sup>. He was convinced that resistance was vain; and therefore, giving his crown for lost, he withdrew as privately as possible, in order to save his life. Sisenand arrived in a few hours in the camp, where he was joyfully received; and, having regaled Abondantius and Venerand with splendid and costly presents, they repassed the Pyrenees with their forces, at the same time that he prosecuted his march to Toledo, where he made his entry in a kind of triumph, and was publicly proclaimed king, to the general satisfaction of the whole nation<sup>s</sup>.

Sisenand raised to the throne by the

SISENAND was scarce seated on the throne, before Dagobert sent Amalgarus and Venerand, as his ambassadors, to compliment him upon his accession, and to put him in mind of the gold

(N) With this great event, the learned and pious Isidore, metropolitan of Seville, concludes his history of the Goths, though he did not intirely finish and digest it in writing till the year after (2). It is very apparent, that he had a tender regard, as well as a profound respect, for king Suintilla and his family, to whom some think that he was nearly related: whether that be so or not, we have good reason to conclude, that it proceeded from this disposition in their favour, he declined recording what passed from the time of this event, since he not only survived more than ten years, but presided also in the fourth council of Toledo, and was obliged to take a share in many other public affairs during that space (3).

(O) This fountain, or bason of gold, for it is not very clear which it was, was the present of that celebrated Roman general Actius, to Torismond, king of the Visigoths, upon the signal and decisive victory gained by their assistance, and with the loss of that monarch's father, over the famous Attila and his Huns, in the neighbourhood of Metz, Anno Domini 451 (4); so that it had been above a hundred and seventy years preserved among the treasures of the Goths, and, exclusive of its intrinsic value, was looked upon as a master-piece in point of workmanship.

a fountain<sup>1</sup>. The king received them with all possible marks of honour, and gave orders that the fountain should be delivered to them agreeable to his promise; but the Goths, who saw this with inexpressible regret, surprised them in their passage home, and recovered this monument of the courage and generosity of their ancestors<sup>2</sup>. Dagobert was not slow in complaining and demanding satisfaction from Sisenand, who told them, it was not in his power to deliver them the fountain a second time: but if king Dagobert would be content with the value of it in money, he would discharge the obligation he was under with the greatest punctuality; and, this offer being accepted, the money was paid<sup>3</sup>. While this affair was upon the carpet, it created some murmuring, as is natural, amongst a free people, when they conceive the public welfare sacrificed to the particular interests of the prince; and this afforded Geilan a fresh opportunity of discovering the baseness of his disposition, by endeavouring to raise an insurrection against the prince whom he had helped to set upon the throne; but he was generally known, and as generally condemned, so that his insinuations only produced his own ruin; for, being stripped of all his employments, and his estates confiscated, he passed the remainder of his life in as low a condition as his infamous behaviour deserved, equally unassisted and unpitied<sup>4</sup>.

In the third year of his reign, Sisenand summoned the fourth council of Toledo<sup>5</sup>, in which Isidore, the metropolitan of Seville, presided, and in which sixty-nine prelates were present, either by themselves or by their vicars. In this great assembly there were seventy-five canons made, the last of which was very remarkable, for by it the people were enjoined to keep the faith they had sworn to their monarch, and to defend his authority and person to the utmost, under pain of excommunication. It was also enacted, that, upon the demise of the king, the bishops and great men should be called together, in order to proceed to a new election. The bishops also gave the king a great deal of good advice, and more especially desired that his majesty would be pleased to revise all criminal sentences himself, and not put the parties to death till their offences were thoroughly proved, and the nature of them closely examined. In reference to Suintila and his children, they were declared incapable of any public office, and all their goods and estates confiscated, except what the king should, in his private capacity, be pleased to bestow upon them for their subsistence; and the traitor Geilan was put under the like incapacities; so that, notwithstanding the silence of ancient historians, the deposing this monarch appears to be fully proved from public records. Perhaps the writers of those times were unwilling to convey the history of their troubles, and the failings of one who had been formerly so good a prince, to posterity; neither is it at all impossible that personal gratitude for favours received might in some measure impose this silence, which however cannot furnish any argument against what is preserved in the registers of the council, where it is very likely some concurred in doing what they had no inclinations succeeding times should learn in any other manner than as it is expressed in the canon<sup>6</sup> (P).

We may easily conceive, tho' nothing of that kind can appear in their proceedings, that there must have been some discordance in the sentiments of so numerous an assembly, considering more especially what important and tender affairs fell under their deliberations. But we should not have troubled the reader with any conjecture on this head, if it was not necessary to give

(P) In this fourth council of Toledo, there were several canons made in relation to the Jews, by which, on the one hand, it was provided, that they should not be compelled to embrace the Christian religion; and on the other, such as had embraced Christianity were not permitted to quit their religion, though they had embraced it by force (5). No person whatever was to give protection to the Jews in any thing, contrary to the interests of the Christian religion, on pain of excommunication. Such Jews as, after receiving baptism, apostatized, and circumcised others, were to be punished by the bishops; and those they circumcised, if they were children, to be taken from them; and to be set free, if they were slaves. All the children of Jews, boys or girls, were to be placed in monasteries, or under the care of pious persons, in order to their being brought up in the faith, and instructed in sound morals. The Christian children of apostate Jews were not to suffer by the confiscation of their parents effects, but to receive out of them such a share, as by the laws, they would have had. Converted Jews, having intercourse or communication with those of their old religion, were to suffer death. Jews married to Christian women were to be exhorted to embrace Christianity, and, if not, they were to be separated from their wives; and, in like manner, Jewish women from their husbands; the children already born of such marriages, to be brought up Christians. A Jew that apostatized was incapable of giving evidence in any court. All Jews were rendered incapable of holding any office or post of any kind. Whoever permitted or assisted them to obtain either, was to be excommunicated; and the Jew, who found any means of eluding or breaking through this canon, was to be punished with death. There were seventy-five canons made in all, and it was by the last that Suintila and his children were excommunicated, and rendered incapable of any preferment, on account, as it is expressly said, of the tyrannies exercised by him during his reign (6).

some rational account of two strange facts that are said to have happened under this short reign <sup>a</sup>. It is reported, that one Gerontius, a priest, presuming on the favour in which he stood with this king, behaved towards Justus, metropolitan of Toledo, with indecency, and even with insolence, which the good prelate bore for a long time with patience, till on a sudden the priest lost his senses, and continued in a state of idiocy till his death, which in those days was regarded as a judgment <sup>b</sup>. The other event, still more tragical, regards the same metropolitan of Toledo, who, if Mariana was rightly informed, for he has not acquainted us with his authority, was an austere morose man, and so generally disagreeable to his clergy, that they made bold to strangle him in his bed. Such transactions must be referred to the factious disturbances of the times, and the story of the first dispute ought to be regarded as a key to the second <sup>c</sup>. King Sisenand did not long survive, and, for aught that appears, died a natural death, in the month of March, and in the year of our Lord six hundred thirty-six, when he had reigned somewhat more than five years <sup>d</sup>.

Chintila becomes monarch of all Spain, and calls a council at Toledo. 636.

UPON his demise, there happened some disputes which retarded the election of his successor; however, in the ensuing months, Chintila was raised to the throne, who began his reign by calling a council at Toledo, for regulating affairs in church and state. He was present himself at the opening of this assembly, and recommended to them the taking proper measures for quieting the minds of the people, desiring also that set times of fasting and humiliation should be appointed, in order to obtain the blessing of God on his person and government <sup>e</sup>. This council did not sit long, and made but eight canons, all of which, except the first, respected the civil government. They declared, that whoever was wanting in loyalty and duty to the king, should be excommunicated: that whoever, without requisite talents for government, or being descended of the illustrious blood of the Goths, should aspire to the crown, should incur the same penalty: that all such persons as, during the life of the king, should inquire after the time of his decease, or should pray for it, in hopes of succeeding him, should be likewise excommunicated: that those should incur the same penalty who cursed the king, or practised witchcraft against him: that those on whom the king bestowed recompences of any kind, for their good and faithful services, should enjoy them peaceably, as an encouragement to others to behave in the like manner: that, in all ensuing councils, the canons made in the preceding council of Toledo, for supporting the respect due to the royal authority, should be read, that none might pretend ignorance of them; and lastly, that the king might mitigate or remit whatever sentences were passed upon criminals, if he thought proper. These laws will serve to give us a just idea of the government of the Visigoths, which was far from being arbitrary. On the first of July, in the first year of his reign, the king published an edict, directing the public days of humiliation to be strictly observed, and for enforcing the other decrees made by the council <sup>f</sup>.

The whole nation of the Jews expelled his dominions by an edict.

THE most remarkable transaction in this prince's reign was the expulsion of the Jews out of his dominions, in virtue of an edict, by which he declared, that his subjects and soldiers should be all of them Christians; but whether the Jews gave any particular cause for this severity, or whether it arose only from the general odium they lay under, and the desire the king had to render himself popular by treating them in this manner, is uncertain <sup>g</sup>. In the sixth council of Toledo, which met not long after they were driven out <sup>h</sup>, he received the complaints of that assembly upon this subject, and laws were made to support what he had done. In this, as in the former council, many points, relating purely to civil government, were settled in such a manner, that there remains no doubt of great animosities and heart-burnings that still subsisted amongst the people, and which induced an apprehension that every future vacancy of the throne would be considered as a kind of dissolution of the government, against which they provided all the remedies that human prudence could dictate (Q). At the close of the assembly, they returned

(Q) By the third canon of this sixth council of Toledo, the prelates and other members of that venerable assembly, not only approved, and rendered thanks to the king for what he had done against the Jews, but likewise enacted with his consent, and that of the nobles (a clear proof that these assemblies were really parliaments), that no monarch thereafter elected should enter upon the functions of the regal office, before he promised, under pain of excommunication, to adhere inviolably to the laws made against that nation (7). They provided, in this assembly, that persons accused of capital crimes should not be condemned till they were heard face to face with their accusers; and, for want of legal evidence, the party accused to be acquitted, except the matter charged upon him touched the king's life. Such as deserted to the enemies of the kingdom, and endeavoured to stir up war against their country, were to be excommunicated. Such as broke a turned the king thanks for his mild and just administration, recommended him to the divine protection, and made vows for his long life and prosperity<sup>1</sup>. He continued to govern with the same spirit of moderation and equity during the short remainder of his life, and deceased in the beginning of the year six hundred and forty, universally regretted by his subjects, who enjoyed uninterrupted peace at home and abroad during the time that he sat upon the throne<sup>k</sup>.

THE great reverence that was borne to the memory of the deceased king, engaged the nobility, in compliance with the unanimous voice of the people, to raise his son Tulga to the throne. Though he was very young, he inherited from his father his piety and his charity, with many other virtues<sup>l</sup>; but the tenderness of his age, and want of experience, enervated his authority, inasmuch that many, despising his youth, or presuming too much upon his indulgence and good-nature, took such liberties as were inconsistent with the respect due to government; and as bad examples are naturally contagious, so in a little time the whole kingdom was full of disorders, notwithstanding the young monarch was remarkably free from vices, and had no other failing than that want of firmness and steadiness which was incident to a good-natured youth<sup>m</sup>. The principal nobility, considering this, and being persuaded that these dangerous mischiefs would continue to increase while Tulga remained upon the throne, and might prove the ruin of the nation before he acquired the talents necessary to correct them, concluded, that, for the preservation of the state, he ought to be deposed. Having digested this scheme in their minds, they cast their eyes upon Chindasuinto, a person of great quality, much advanced in years, but who possessed, as they conceived, in a very high degree, the virtues requisite to form a great prince, as well as to put an end to those disorders that otherwise threatened an extinction of their monarchy<sup>n</sup>. These are the specious reasons assigned by some historians in support of a proceeding that otherwise is far from having a fair aspect, and upon their credit they must rest. Chindasuinto, old as he was, made no difficulty of accepting the proposal; and, with the assistance of his party, executed it with very little trouble, causing the young king to be conducted to a monastery, and to have his head shaved, which, as the reader has seen by their laws, prevented its being ever covered again with a crown<sup>o</sup>.

CHINDASUINTO was declared king in the month of May six hundred forty-two<sup>p</sup>; but Chindasuinto was very far from enjoying peaceably that dignity which he had rather seized by force than attained in a legal manner. A civil war ensued, and revolts happened in almost all parts of the kingdom<sup>q</sup>. But Chindasuinto fully justified the sentiments of those who placed him on the throne; he very quickly raised an army, and pursued those who disputed his authority with such vigour, that, before the government was tolerably settled, 200 persons of quality, and 500 of meaner rank, lost their lives; at length, however, he carried his point, and obliged all the inhabitants of Spain to own and respect him as their sovereign<sup>r</sup>. their allegiance, and afterwards fell into the king's power, were to be shut up in a monastery for life, if they made it their choice, in some measure equivalent to their claiming the benefit of the clergy with us. The highest respect and veneration was to be paid to the nobility having places at court, and about the king's person, so long as they behaved with justice, moderation, and beneficence, to their inferiors. Whatever rewards in lands, or otherwise, the king should bestow on his faithful subjects, they were to enjoy; and such as entered into conspiracies were to forfeit all they had, even though their treasons should not be discovered till after the death of their king. In consideration of the benefits conferred by king Chintila upon his subjects, the greatest respect should be preserved towards his children, and care taken to defend them in their persons and in their properties, there being nothing, says this canon, more equitable, than that the same regard should be shewn by the nation to the posterity of kings, that those kings, while upon the throne, manifested for the nation. If any, possessed either of an ecclesiastical or secular dignity, should enter into any intrigues during the life-time of the king, in order to secure the election of some other person upon his demise, he was excommunicated. When the throne was vacant, none should tyrannically usurp it, but wait the decision of a free election; and none should be capable of being elected who had taken a religious habit, and suffered his head to be shaved, or who had been shaved by force, or who should descend from slaves or strangers; but the person so elected should be one descended from the illustrious blood of the Goths, and endowed with prudence, and the necessary talents of government. Whoever should infringe this decree, incurred thereby the penalty of excommunication. All that was therefore done for the security of the life and august person of the kings of the Visigoths, was hereby confirmed; and the censure of excommunication pronounced, in the presence of God, his angels and saints, of the church, and of all the faithful, against all who should attempt the king's life, endeavour to dethrone, or assemble troops to make war against him. If any prince be slain, his successor should avenge his death, as he would do that of his father, in which he should have the assistance of all the nobility, and of persons of every rank, who would not be held and reputed infamous by the whole nation. These canons fixed the constitutions, and were regarded as the magna charta of the Visigoths in Spain, so long as their monarchy in that country subsisted (8).

rived in Spain a young adventurer from the east, whose name was Ardabasta, who was graciously received, and kindly entertained, by the king of the Visigoths, rising at length so high in his favour, that he gave him in marriage his cousin german <sup>a</sup>. We are not told by the old historians, who mention this circumstance, who this young gentleman was, whose posterity afterwards ascended the throne; but some of the ablest judges of the Spanish history have rendered it highly probable, that he was the son of Althangilde, the grandson of Hermenigilde, and the great grandson of Leovigilde <sup>c</sup>. Whoever he was, he became equally the favourite of the king and of the people, and contributed not a little to dispose the public to a more favourable construction of Chindasuinto's conduct, who, setting aside the manner in which he acquired the diadem, was very little inferior in virtue or in abilities to any who had worn it before him <sup>a</sup>.

A council at Toledo which settles the constitution in church and state.

In the sixth year of his reign he held a council at Toledo <sup>w</sup>, in which several canons were made, the first of which was in support of the king's authority, and for punishing, by excommunication for life, and forfeiture of goods, such as should procure arms or assistance from abroad, in support of their rebellion; and, if they were priests, they were to be degraded. The king's administration from this time was very peaceable, and no less honourable; for, after the severities to which he was obliged by the civil war, he did not discover any thing harsh in his disposition, but, on the contrary, shewed as much mildness as it was possible for him to do without relaxing too much; so that by degrees he became respected and beloved by all ranks of people: as a proof of which, in the seventh year of his reign, the nobility unanimously consented that his son Recesuinto should share with him, in order to lessen the weight of the regal authority <sup>a</sup>. This expedient had not hitherto been very fortunate to the monarchs who had brought it to bear; but the old king, considering that his son was of a fit age to ascend the throne, and that it would be difficult for him to be safe as a private man, upon mature deliberation, demanded and obtained this act of complaisance from the nobles; in consequence of which Recesuinto was placed with his father on the throne <sup>y</sup>, January the 22d, 649; and from that time took upon him, in a great measure, the administration of the government <sup>z</sup>.

The king, with their consent, associates his son in the administration.

THE old king, worn out with age and infirmities, was desirous of passing his last days in peace, and with a reasonable degree of leisure. He was a great statesman, understood the constitution of the Visigoths perfectly, and took pains to restore and preserve its vigour <sup>a</sup>. He was, the times in which he lived considered, a man of letters, and so great a lover of learning and learned men, that he sent one Tajus, or Tajon, bishop of Saragossa, to Rome, on purpose to bring from thence certain works of pope Gregory the great, which as yet had not been sent into Spain <sup>b</sup>. He was no less remarkable for his piety, according to the notion of those times; and is reported to have built the magnificent monastery of St. Romanus, now called the monastery of Ornisga, between Toro and Tordesillas, not far from the river Duero, where he desired that his own and his queen's corpse might be laid, as it is believed they were <sup>c</sup>. He died with great marks of sincere repentance, and after having caused very large sums to be distributed to the poor <sup>d</sup>, October the first, in the year of our Lord 652, when he was upwards of 90 years of age, and in the 11th year of his reign (R).

Recesuinto finds a spirit of discontent at his very accession.

WE have thrown together all that regarded Chindasuinto, that we might not perplex the relation of what was atchieved by Recesuinto, as well in the life-time of his father as afterwards. It is believed, upon good foundation, that, a little before his association in the throne, he married his consort Ricibergue (S), and was much assisted in compassing that point, by her

(R) Among all the monarchs of the Visigoths, Chindasuinto appeared to be most thoroughly versed in the science of government, and to have governed by true maxims of policy, instead of following the dictates of his passions. He gave a strong instance of this in the case of Theodiseles, who had been advanced to the metropolitan see of Seville, and who, not satisfied with spreading dangerous and heretical opinions, endeavoured to give a sanction to the errors he taught, by pretending that he found them in the writings of St. Isidore, his predecessor; of which the king being informed, he caused him immediately to be deprived, and even obliged him to quit his dominions; upon which he went over into Africa, where, after he had disturbed the minds of many people with his notions, he embraced, or pretended to embrace, the Mohammedan superstition; which fully justifified the king's conduct towards him, and shewed that he was not worse treated than he deserved (9).

(S) Some of the most celebrated Spanish historians have positively asserted, that queen Ricibergue was the consort of king Chindasuinto; and this is grounded upon her epitaph, written by Eugenius metropolitan of Toledo, a man of learning and piety, and so disinterested, that he fled from his residence, and took sanctuary, in order to avoid the mitre, which nevertheless, at the king's command, he was constrained to accept (1). His works in verse and prose were published by Father Sirmond, and this epitaph among the rest; the substance of which, however, shews sufficiently the mistake; for therein it is said, that she died at somewhat more than 22 years of age, after having been married seven. It is not easy to conceive, that so wise a mona her relations<sup>e</sup>. But notwithstanding all this, there were not a few malecontents who were exceedingly displeased with this measure, and inclined to pull Recesuintbo down before he was well seated on the throne. The want of free election was given out, with many other pretences, by such as were desirous of dethroning him; but the truth of the matter was, that the principal persons of the faction, who honoured his father with the crown, took it extremely ill that they were disappointed in their views, and all their hopes cut short, by this association; whereas, with them, the chief motive to the king's exaltation was his great age, which gave them a probability of surviving and succeeding him in turns<sup>f</sup>. It does not however appear, that they declared openly at the time of the election, but waited for a more proper conjuncture, when the disposition of the common people in the more distant provinces should be known; for, having been treated with severity in the beginning of the old king's reign, it was presumed that they would not be universally pleased with this measure<sup>g</sup>. Time made it appear that they were in their conjectures not at all mistaken.

AMONGST these malcontents there was one Froja, a man of great quality among the Goths, who was himself rich and powerful, and had many relations and friends<sup>h</sup>. He was the first who took up arms, and, for the better support of his party, he employed his money among the Gascons to raise an army. These people, who had been frightened into submission by Suintila, were very glad of this opportunity to find their way once more into Spain<sup>i</sup>. As soon as they had passed the Pyrenees under his command, they began to shew their old disposition, desolating the country with fire and sword, ruining edifices of all kinds, churches and monasteries not excepted, and destroying without mercy persons of all ranks, sexes, and ages. In the midst of their career, Recesuintbo fell upon them with a small but well-disciplined army; and tho' the victory was not gained without a considerable loss, yet the king pursued it with such vigour, that the rebels were intirely defeated<sup>k</sup>. Froja fled with a small party, and the Gascons suffered so much, that they repassed the Pyrenees, and thought themselves happy in recovering their own country. But, notwithstanding this blow, many cities and provinces discovered visible signs of discontent, and made preparations for their own defence, in case the new king should endeavour to reduce them with his victorious army<sup>l</sup>. But those who were not frightened with the terror of his arms, he reduced by his clemency; for having declared that he was willing, and even desirous, to redress grievances, and to grant whatever could be justly expected, they consented, upon his publishing a general amnesty, to submit, and to acknowledge him for their sovereign (T). But what became of Froja does not appear from the Spanish history<sup>m</sup>.

THINGS were in this situation when the old king died; and Recesuintbo, than whom no prince was more punctual in the performance of his promises, summoned a council at Toledo, in order to settle the affairs of the kingdom, which was opened on the 17th of December 653, at which assisted a multitude of prelates, and all the chief persons of the kingdom. The king opened this assembly of the states by a short speech, conceived only in general terms, and referring himself for farther particulars to a memorial which he left with them in writing<sup>n</sup>.

arch as Chindasuintbo would marry at fourscore and three a young lady of sixteen; but it is not at all improbable of the son. On consulting, however, the manuscript of this prelate's works, in the library of the church at Toledo, the name of Recesuintbus is found instead of Chindasuintbus, which appeared in all the printed copies (2). This princess, who, as far as we can judge, was the only wife of king Recesuintbus, died soon after the holding of the first council of Toledo in his reign, without leaving any issue; so that the brothers of the king flattered themselves thenceforward with hopes of succession, as well as the inheritance of his private fortune (3).

(T) The cities and districts in Spain that gave shelter to the rebels, without taking up arms themselves, made no scruple of declaring what they called their grievances. Some asserted, that they were so heavily taxed, that, with all their labour and industry, they could scarce procure a subsistence. Some alleged, that the privileges and immunities granted them by former kings, as a reward for their services, had been taken away upon frivolous pretences; others, that they had been fined and punished by an augmentation of taxes, without any just cause. King Recesuintbo assured them, that all imposts should be lessened; that their antient rights should be restored; that satisfaction should be made to all who had been injured, or had so much as received hard measure: and that, for the future, arbitrators should be appointed to mediate between the king and the subject upon any prosecution by the crown (4). This gave such satisfaction, that, the cities and districts submitting immediately, the rebels, that had taken shelter amongst them, were left wholly to the king's mercy, which, at the same time it was out of his power to extend without the consent of the states, the precision with which the king performed every tittle of this agreement, and his procuring the pardon of the rebels by his intercession, gained him the hearts of his subjects, who acknowledged themselves obliged to him, and him only, for all the benefits that they had received (5).

This paper contained, first, a confession of the catholic faith; next, the opinion of the assembly was demanded in respect to those who had taken up arms against the crown and the state, on account of the oath which the whole nation had entered into for excluding such offenders from all hopes of pardon; which, however, the king, in the present case, was willing to relax. In the third place, he desired, that where the subjects complained, with respect and decency of the sovereign, that arbitrators might be appointed by law to decide equally between them. He recommended it to the nobility to concur in judgment with the prelates, and to execute punctually the canons that should be made. Lastly, he desired to know their sentiments with respect to the Jews, who, after baptism, had apostatized. This august assembly not only settled these, but several other points of very high importance, to the intire satisfaction of the king and his subjects; and their canons, which were twelve in number, were signed not only by the bishops and abbots, but by the great men who were present <sup>o</sup> (U). The day after the council separated, the king published an edict, grounded upon their advice, by which he declared, that whatever estates or effects were acquired by monarchs after their accession to the throne, should be annexed to the crown, and belong to their successors; but that, with respect to their private fortunes, they should descend to their children <sup>p</sup>. In this edict he farther declared, that whereas he was in possession of his father Chindasuintbo's estates, he was ready to make satisfaction in the most ample manner to any who could make due proof of their having been oppressed or injured by that prince <sup>q</sup>.

His reign most honourable for himself, and happy for his subjects.

The reign of Recesuintbo, from this time, was perfectly calm and undisturbed <sup>r</sup>. His subjects, in general, began to understand and be perfectly sensible of their happiness in living under a prince who made that much more his study than his own <sup>s</sup>. The clergy, and with good reason, were wholly devoted to his service, and, in points of the highest consequence, had recourse to his authority, without applying themselves to the bishop of Rome <sup>t</sup> (W). The Jews, who were indeed the only people the king was disposed to treat with severity, pacified him by a memorial, in which they qualified what was called the apostacy, by declaring, in the most solemn manner, that it consisted not in any unbelief, but in a natural aversion to pork; desiring that the king would be pleased to excuse them in that respect, since it proceeded not from any repugnancy of their will, but from the imbecillity of their stomachs, which would not bear a food they from their infancy had been taught to abhor; submitting to be burnt, if, in any other respect, they behaved otherwise than as became good Christians; <sup>d</sup>

(U) Mariana, by a slight mistake, places this council in November instead of December; which we remark, to prevent this difference creating a suspicion of our negligence (6). Orontius, metropolitan of Merida, presided in this assembly, in which were present fifty-two prelates, and the flower of the Gothic nobility, more especially such as had great employments at court (7). By the second canon of this council it is declared, that the oath which does not regard the service of God, but respects only temporal interests, is not perpetually binding; and that, notwithstanding the past laws against such as took up arms, yet, for the safety and welfare of the state, the penalties inflicted by them may be, and are by this canon, remitted. By the tenth canon it is declared, that, for the future, the king shall be elected in the place where his predecessor dies, by the bishops and great lords of the court. The king shall protect the catholic faith, and shall be assiduous in preventing all dangers that might arise from the wickedness of the Jews, but shall keep within the bounds of moderation, taking at the same time all due care of the government. The new king shall succeed to whatever his predecessor held in right of his dignity; but he shall not be solemnly crowned till he has sworn to comply with this decree. By the 11th, they declare, that whoever offends against the decision of any council, shall stand excommunicated ipso facto; and by the 12th it is decreed, that, with respect to the Jews, the canons made in the council of Toledo, held by king Sisenand, shall be strictly put in force. After this follows the usual conclusion, in which the prelates return thanks to God and the king. We have mentioned the nature of the subscription in the text; and, on the whole, there can be nothing clearer than that this was an assembly of the great men, a general council or meeting of the estates of the kingdom, which was the peculiar characteristic of the Gothic policy, of which the reader can never too often be put in mind, as it is the basis of legal liberty and constitutional freedom (8).

(W) The instance hinted in the text was this. In a short time after, at a council held at Toledo, the president Orontius, metropolitan of Merida, presented his petition to the king, setting forth, that the jurisdiction of his see was very much diminished, and a great number of his suffragans taken from him; desiring that the king would be pleased to examine the matter, and restore the metropolitan see of Merida to its antient state. The true reason of this complaint was, that as fast as the kings of the Suavi made conquests in Lusitania, they subjected the diocese, of which they became masters, to the metropolitan of Braga, the chief city of their own dominions; and this regulation, though the reason ceased, had still subsisted under the kings of the Goths; but Recesuintbo, who was both a pious and an equitable prince, directed that this matter should be carefully look'd into, and the jurisdiction of the metropolitan see of Merida re-invested in its former rights; which was accordingly done, and the king's conduct afterwards approved and confirmed by a council (9). This wise and good prelate Orontius was, it seems, intirely ignorant of the prerogatives claimed by the Roman pontiffs, and thought it sufficient to apply himself to his sovereign, who also without the least scruple, and without the least dispute, did him all the justice that he could desire (10).

a with which this well-disposed monarch seems to have been contented<sup>u</sup>. Some corruptions having crept into the morals of the people, and into the discipline of the ecclesiastics, he corrected these by the advice of two councils held at Toledo; for which he was highly applauded by the nobility and prelates, who found the good effects of these frequent assemblies, which brought the kingdom in general into very good order, and took away many abuses that would have been otherwise fortified by prescription<sup>w</sup>. 655, 656.

THAT happy spirit of loyalty and general tranquility that reigned throughout the kingdom, induced the brethren and family of the king, who was now become a widower, to insinuate that this was a proper time to do something for them; but the king, it seems, was of a different opinion, either from a persuasion that his relations wanted the proper talents for government, or that he was unwilling to disoblige the whole body of the nobility, by depriving them of that privilege which they had most at heart<sup>x</sup>. He had, however, in the midst of this repose at home, a melancholy, and even an alarming prospect abroad; for the Saracens began to extend their conquests in Africa; and count Gregory, who was governor of the province of Carthage, having endeavoured to give a check to this progress with the best army it was in his power to raise, was not only defeated, with the loss of a great part of his forces, but likewise fell himself in battle<sup>y</sup>. Some carry this farther, and assert, that the infidels pushed their incursions as far as Mauritania, then in the hands of the Goths, which obliged king Recesuinto to arm in its defence; but the best writers are silent upon this subject, and therefore the fact ought to be concluded doubtful, if not false<sup>z</sup>. However, the king could not be without apprehensions from the vicinity of such neighbours, which, with the weight of his other affairs, brought him into a bad state of health; in hopes of recovering from which, he made a journey to a place called Gerticos, in the territory of Salamanca, at the distance of forty leagues from Toledo<sup>a</sup>, which was his private patrimony, and perhaps physicians, he died, September the first, 672, in the 24th year of his reign, to the great and just sorrow of his subjects<sup>b</sup>. Ends peaceably, and without any diminution of its glory.

As soon as king Recesuinto had breathed his last, the bishops and great lords of the court assembled; and being sensible how much the nation might suffer through the want of talents, if that should happen in the successor of so great and good a prince, unanimously cast their eyes upon Wamba, a nobleman whose years, whose virtues, and whose great experience in the most arduous public employments, left them nothing in that respect to fear<sup>c</sup>. A new difficulty arose, however, which they had not foreseen; for he not only laboured to decline the honour, but, when he found that this was in vain, declared positively, that he knew himself best, and therefore would not accept the crown<sup>d</sup>. This threw the assembly into much perplexity, till one of the lords laid his hand upon his sword, and, addressing himself to Wamba, told him, that in their choice of him, they were guided by no private motives, but aimed solely at the public good; that his behaviour was of a very different nature, since it shewed that he preferred his own quiet, and the pleasures of an independent life, to the welfare of his country; that he, who would not contribute, as far as in him lay, to the preservation of the state, was as guilty as he who contrived its ruin; and therefore, if he continued to prefer an indolent security to the cares of a crown, which the public interest, and the legal call of those present, required him to wear, he would sacrifice him upon the spot. The menaces of this nobleman, and the tears of all who were present, overcame the constancy of Wamba, who consented to be declared king, but desired they would remember he never sought it; that it was a dignity forced upon him, in which his ambition had no share. He farther desired that his coronation might be respited, till it should appear that their choice was the sense of the whole nation<sup>e</sup>. On his return to Toledo, he was solemnly anointed and crowned on the 19th of September, 672, in the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, with the universal acclamations of the nobility and people, and, as many historians assert, with a very miraculous instance of the divine favour<sup>f</sup>. Wamba succeeds by election to the throne of the Visigoths.

THE Gascons, according to the usual custom, made an irruption, under pretence that they were too heavily taxed; and their neighbours, the inhabitants of the country of Asturias, made an insurrection under the like pretence. The king was no sooner informed of this than he disposed every thing for the immediate reduction of the rebels; but his army was scarce in motion before he had intelligence of a more formidable revolt<sup>g</sup>. Hilderic, count of Nîmes, apprehended he had a fair opportunity of rendering himself independent, and master of all the territories the Goths possessed in France<sup>h</sup>. He was confirmed in these notions Insurrection of the Gascons and Gallic province.

by two of the most popular ecclesiastics, Guimilde bishop of Maquelone, and the abbot Ranimir, by whose assistance he soon drew over the populace, and found afterwards no great difficulty in corrupting the troops <sup>1</sup>. But, in this defection, Areges, bishop of Nîmes, remained inflexible, and gave the conspirators so much trouble, that they sent him into France, loaded with chains; and, that they might not be without a bishop, Ranimir was put in possession of that see <sup>k</sup>. The king being informed that the whole province was departed from its duty, made choice of count Paul, an old and experienced officer, and sent him at the head of the best part of his troops against these new rebels. When this general was advanced into the province of Tarragona, he consulted with duke Ranofinde and the warden Hildigise, who were intrusted with the government there, whether it would not be better for him to set up for himself, and to assume the title of king, as soon as he was master of Narbonne; in which wicked design, upon the promise of great advantages and preferment for themselves, they confirmed him by many arguments, and raised, to augment his army, the whole force of the province, under colour of the king's orders <sup>l</sup> (X).

General Paul revolts, and endeavours to make himself king.

ON his approach to Narbonne, though he kept his design as secret as possible, Argebaud, bishop of that city, had some suspicion of his intentions, and gave orders for shutting the gates against him; but these orders were not obeyed; and count Paul, after he was admitted into the place, reprimanded him for giving them very severely <sup>m</sup>. The bishop submitted, because it was not in his power to do otherwise; but gave the king privately the best account that he could of all that had happened. Count Paul acted with great subtlety and address; he represented Wamba as old, peevish, cruel, and altogether unworthy the title he assumed. He pretended to be extremely affected at the miseries that were fallen upon his country, and, in a great assembly of the officers and principal inhabitants, he gave it as his opinion, that nothing could contribute so much to restore the public tranquillity as their making choice of some proper person to be king; with which he had reason to believe that count Hilderic would be very well pleased <sup>n</sup>. Ranofinde and Hildigise, by whose advice he took this step, insinuated, in the mean time, to those who were near them, that Paul himself, on account of his birth, his wealth, and his great military experience, was the only person worthy of the crown; upon which they saluted him king, and soon after placed on his head a crown, which king Reccared the Catholic had dedicated in one of the churches <sup>o</sup>. In this strange election Hilderic thought fit to acquiesce; and the Franks, as their interest directed them, not only suffered Paul to raise what men he pleased amongst them, but promised likewise to be his faithful allies, and to furnish him with auxiliaries whenever he thought it necessary <sup>p</sup>. The inhabitants of the country of Catalonia likewise embraced his party; upon which he gave orders for fortifying several places that were important from their situation, and to occupy the chief passes of the mountains, while he laboured to assemble a regular army, capable of supporting him in his usurpation <sup>q</sup> (Y).

(X) The reader will easily discern that there is no part of this history so clearly, so circumstantially, and with so much certainty, related, as this upon which we are now entering. The reason is, that a complete narrative of this remarkable rebellion was written by the prelate mentioned in the last note, who is sometimes called in Latin, Julianus, sometimes Pomerius, who, A. D. 680, succeeded Quiricus in the metropolitan see of Toledo, and whose testimony therefore is, in this respect, beyond exception, as he was perfectly capable of treating this subject as it ought to be, and wrote of nothing but what fell under his own immediate observation (2). He is also, with great probability, supposed to be the real author of that antient Spanish chronicle, which is usually cited under the title of Vulsa, but in the manuscript is intitled Julse, which is no more than a cypher, or contracted way of writing Juliana Sancti Episcopi; that is, the chronicle of the holy bishop Julian, as the Romanists call him (3). This chronicle, which is remarkably correct in the dates, and descends only to the coronation of king Egisa, is printed in the second volume of the learned cardinal d'Aguirre's Councils held in Spain. These circumstances it is necessary the reader should know, that he may not apprehend we have bestowed more care or colouring on this than on other parts of our history; whereas, in truth, the difference arises only from our having better materials.

(Y) As count Paul had, from the very moment he was intrusted with the command of the troops, formed the project of his revolt, so he began to hold secret correspondence with Hilderic count of Nîmes, and, by the shortness and slowness of his marches, afforded him leisure to complete all that he designed. By the defection of Ranofinde duke of Tarragona, and his coadjutor, the foundation was laid of Paul's usurpation, who, besides the personal ill qualities he attributed to Wamba, pretended that he was set up only by a slender faction, who, under the shadow of an old infirm king, meant to oppress the people, more especially those in the remoter provinces, and thereby enrich themselves (4). The crown that was set upon his head had been offered by king Reccared in the church of St. Felix the Martyr at Girone, from whence it was fetched upon this laudable occasion. As soon as it encircled his brows, Paul had the insolence not only to use the regal stile in all the

a KING Wamba, on the other hand, halted on the frontiers of Navarre, and, having called a council of his chief officers, laid before them the accounts that he had received, and demanded their advice. This produced various councils; some were for proceeding with the troops; others thought it better for the king to return to Toledo, in order to assemble an army suitable to the danger, and to the great force of his enemies <sup>1</sup>. Wamba, who was an old general, had probably taken his resolution before he told them, that when he accepted the crown, he resolved to act as became a king; and that he could not think it consistent with his dignity to turn his back to traitors; that therefore he would first reduce the Gascons, and then pass the Pyrenees <sup>2</sup>. At the same time he gave orders that all the forces in the adjacent provinces should march to the posts he assigned, and directed his fleet to repair to the coast of France, in order to wait the arrival of himself and his army. When he had done this, he entered Navarre, laid the country waste on every side, and struck such terror into the inhabitants, that, abandoning all sort of defence, they threw themselves upon his clemency <sup>3</sup>. Wamba told them, that the devastation he had made was the proper recompence of rebellion; and that, since they had altered their conduct, they had nothing farther to fear from him; but that, since they were in arms, he would take them into his service. His army, thus recruited, he obliged to observe the most exact discipline, and marched with such diligence, that he appeared before Barcelona when he was little expected <sup>4</sup>. The bishop of Gironne caused the gates of that strong city also to be thrown open, and presented the king with the keys, and with a letter from Paul to himself, directing him to give possession of the city to which king appeared first; at which Wamba smiled <sup>5</sup>.

b His forces and his fleet having exactly obeyed his orders, he found himself in a condition to prosecute that war for which the rebels thought him only preparing. After three days repose, he divided his army into four bodies, and directed them to pass the Pyrenees, by three different routes, himself, at the head of the fourth division, following that which marched along the coast <sup>6</sup>. His generals executed his commands punctually and successfully, without meeting with much resistance. In one place only they found a good fort, and a strong garrison, which they attacked, and, after a vigorous defence, took it by storm, and in it duke Ranofinde and the warden Hildigise, whom they sent to the king with their hands tied behind their backs <sup>7</sup>. They advanced then to Sardonias, where Witimir, whom Paul had made general of his forces, had a numerous garrison, and every thing requisite for a good defence; but as he judged it more adviseable to retire in the night, to carry his master an account of the condition things were in, his troops presently submitted <sup>8</sup>. The king, finding his army had intirely passed the mountains, assembled all his forces, halted for two days, and having made the same division as before, directed his generals to march with the utmost diligence to Narbonne, himself following with a small guard <sup>9</sup>. They pursued his instructions, and quickly invested the place, from which Paul was retired to Nimes, leaving the command of all the troops to Witimir, who, being summoned to open the gates, returned a rude and insolent answer <sup>10</sup>. The generals of Wamba, provoked at this behaviour, and perceiving that it had irritated the army to a degree of madness, resolved to try if it was not possible to take the place by storm; and having proposed this to the army, they offered with joy to begin the attack immediately. The generals then made the necessary dispositions, and the royal army advanced on every side to the assault <sup>11</sup>.

c WITIMIR, with the rebels under his command, having no hopes left but in victory, since all expectations either of mercy or escape were equally vain, defended themselves with a degree of obstinacy that had been rarely seen, for about three hours; but at length the king's forces having burnt some of the gates, and undermined a part of the walls, entered the city on every side, and made a dreadful slaughter <sup>12</sup>. Witimir, giving all for lost, withdrew with a handful of men into a church, in which they made a desperate resistance. One of the king's soldiers having stunned him with a beam, he was at last taken alive, with most of his principal officers; and, after whipping them through the streets, the next day they were sent prisoners to the king. After the reduction of Narbonne, the king, without much difficulty, orders that he issued, but even to write with an air of saucy impertinence to Wamba himself; a step that those about him thought necessary to raise the spirits of his associates, and to countenance the stories they had already propagated among the vulgar, that he was a person of a mean extraction, and one who, from holding the plough, was by his party set to manage the helm of the state (5). All of which was notoriously false, his family being very illustrious, his private fortune considerable, and himself employed and confided in during the last three reigns. We need not wonder, these circumstances considered, that, when Paul found his forces crushed, he had so little expectation of meeting with any mercy (6).

obliged other cities and great towns to return to their obedience; those who commanded in them retiring with their garrisons to Nîmes, where the usurper Paul did every thing that an able officer could do to render the place strong, and to inspire his troops with resolution<sup>a</sup>; sometimes complimenting them on the fine appearance they made (for, in effect, he had the whole flower of the province with him); sometimes putting them in mind that the king's army was exceedingly weakened and fatigued; and sometimes assuring them, that prodigious succours were in full march to their relief from France and Germany. By these and other arts he kept up their spirits so well, that they prepared chearfully for their defence, and disposed every thing to keep the royal forces as long at a distance from the centre of the place as it was possible, at the same time that they fortified all the interior force, and more especially the arenas of the old Roman amphitheatres, with the utmost diligence. In short, their industry was such as would have deserved praise in a better cause<sup>f</sup>.

Paul disposes
all things for the defence of Nîmes, but without effect.

THE king's forces, after the repose of a few days, appeared before the place in four distinct corps, each commanded by an experienced general, making in all about 30,000 men, and, in a few hours, had completely invested the place. The besieged considered and despised them, as being themselves much more numerous, better armed, and better provided; so that they proposed marching out, and giving them battle; but Paul suspecting an ambuscade, persuaded them to act on the defensive<sup>g</sup>. The king's generals, animated by their past success, thought to carry the place by storm, in the same manner as at Narbonne, and attacked it therefore with great fury, but were repulsed with so much loss, that they sent the king intelligence, that, without an immediate supply of French troops, they must be obliged to raise the siege. Wamba, who foresaw what might happen, had provided a body of ten thousand men, ready to march on the first notice; who, as soon as they received his orders, began to move, and, continuing their route all night, arrived the next day as the army was about to renew the assault<sup>h</sup>. The centinels on the towers of the city gave notice to Paul of this reinforcement, which intimidated the garrison not a little. That usurper heard the news not only without emotion, but with a seeming air of satisfaction; and, as he passed from post to post, encouraged his adherents, by telling them, that this was Wamba's last effort; that they were now to fight with all their enemies at once, and that these being defeated, they had nothing farther to fear. Having thus revived their courage, the action began with great noise and fury. The dispute lasted long; but at length the French mercenaries in Paul's pay began to mutiny: they said, that defence was in vain; that the place once taken they should be all put to the sword; and that there was no reason so many brave men should die in the cause of a base usurper<sup>i</sup>. This created a great confusion; and the royal army laying hold of that advantage, mounted the walls with ladders, and began to enter the place on all sides: the rebels took it into their heads that they were betrayed by the Spaniards that were about Paul, whom they killed without mercy, and particularly two of the officers in whom he most confided, close by his side. In this situation Paul thought proper to lay aside his crown and his purple robe, and retired with such forces as yet remained firm into one of the antient amphitheatres, where it was impossible they should be easily forced. The night brought on a cessation of arms, and the royal army contented themselves with taking quarters in all parts of the city, where they celebrated their victory, and the anniversary of the king's accession to the throne, which happened to be the same day. Things continued in this state for two days; and, on the third, they had notice of the king's approach with the rest of the army<sup>k</sup>.

PAUL and his associates, after mature deliberation, deputed Argebaud, metropolitan of Narbonne, to implore Wamba's mercy. He met the king at some distance from the city, and executed his commission in so pathetic a manner, that the king readily pardoned the whole body of malecontents, but would not hear of extending his clemency to Paul, and the chiefs of this dangerous rebellion<sup>l</sup>. When he came in sight of the city, he found the army drawn up in order of battle, which having thanked for their services, he divided them into several corps, and ordered them to take post on the hills round the town, that they might be ready to oppose the Franks, in case they should attempt any thing in favour of their allies. But while the army were yet under arms, he ordered Paul and his companions to be summoned to come before him<sup>m</sup>. They came accordingly, but in a dismal equipage. Paul was on foot, his cloaths torn, and his feet bare; a captain of the king's troops on each side, holding a lock of his hair. As soon as he saw the king, he went and knelt at his feet, at the same time cutting the military belt he wore, inflicting on himself that mark of degradation as a traitor. Wamba ordered him and his friends to be put under a strong guard, but dismissed the Franks, and other strangers that were with him, freely and without ransom. The spoils that were taken he caused to be restored to the churches and private persons from whom they

a had been plundered, and directed also the breaches to be carefully repaired, and the dead bodies to be interred <sup>a</sup>.

THE public tranquillity being settled, the king, on the third day, ordered the whole army to be drawn out, and ranged on both sides of a tribunal, on which himself and the principal nobility of the Goths were seated; after which he commanded Paul and his adherents to be brought before him <sup>o</sup>. As soon as he appeared, the king stood up, and asked him whether he had ever given him any offence, ever done him any injury, or shewn him any mark of displeasure? To this Paul answered, that the very contrary was true; that he had always treated him with peculiar marks of favour; that he owed to his confidence the power of raising this rebellion; and that he had nothing to allege in excuse. Those who came with him said

b the same thing, and mentioned severally the obligations they were under to the king <sup>p</sup>. On this their oaths of allegiance were read, their subscriptions shewn, and then the laws against treason; lastly, the judges stood up, and pronounced sentence of death; but the king, a few minutes after, changed that sentence into their being shaved, and sent to several monasteries, where they might have time to repent of their offences <sup>q</sup>. This was the issue of a rebellion that had endangered the monarchy of the Visigoths, and which had been very probably fatal to a monarch of less prudence and less fortitude than Wamba, whom they provoked by the incursions of one Lupus, a French general, who made an irruption for the sake of plunder. Wamba contented himself with obliging them to make a precipitate retreat, and, after the miseries to which they had been already subjected, would not expose his people to the danger of a foreign war <sup>r</sup>.

c He appointed new officers and new governors throughout the whole province, put strong garrisons into all the fortresses, rewarding his soldiers amply, and recompensing the merit of every officer by preferment. With the rest of his troops he repassed the Pyrenees, and continued his march directly towards Toledo, into which he made a pompous and triumphant entry, all the soldiers being new clothed, and their arms in perfect order <sup>s</sup>. In the centre of the troops were several waggons, in which were seated Paul and his captains and counsellors, all of them close shaved, with ragged cloaths and naked feet, and their chief with a dirty leathern crown upon his head. The king closed the procession, surrounded by the nobility, from whom he was distinguished by the majesty of his appearance, his silver hair flowing on his shoulders, and his brow bound with a diadem. The whole city rang with acclamations <sup>t</sup>; and the king having returned thanks to God for having restored peace to his people, dismissed

d his troops, and applied himself to the regulation of such disorders, as time, accident, or corruption, had brought into church or state; for which he was excellently qualified, being perfectly versed in their laws, and having nothing so much at heart as the interest of the kingdom <sup>u</sup>. His first care was for the capital of his dominions; and as Toledo, since it became such, was very much increased, he ordered the old city walls to be well repaired, and circumscribed even the suburbs with a new one, which he adorned with the images of saints, and placed also certain inscriptions, which are still remembered, and are said to have been repaired and restored, out of respect to their royal founder, by king Philip II. <sup>v</sup> (Z).

e THE king summoned two councils in the year 675, one of which was held at Braga <sup>x</sup>, the other at Toledo <sup>y</sup>, in which many canons were made, chiefly with a view to restore the discipline of the church, and to repress the luxury, pride, and superstition of the clergy. At first sight this may seem a reflection upon that body; but, if duly considered, we shall find it quite the contrary; for if the bulk of them had not retained a just respect for the essential duties of their function, these laws could not have been made; for luxury would then have been stiled decent splendor, pride the support of ecclesiastical dignity, and superstitious ceremonies

(Z) In order to supply stones for this building, it was judged necessary to destroy a noble circus, which had been raised at a vast expence by the Romans, which is the reason that, in the walls of Toledo, there appear frequently large and beautiful pieces of marble, and because upon many of these the figures of a rose and a wheel are very elegantly expressed, an opinion prevails amongst the vulgar, that these were the arms of king Wamba; whereas, to a judicious eye, it is evident, from their being placed here and there, without any order or symmetry, that there is not the least colour for any such notion. It is reported that the outer wall was fortified with no less than 150 square and semicircular towers, according to the mode of those times. Upon some of these the following Latin distich was engraved (4).

*Erexit fautore Deo rex inclutus urbem
Wamba suæ celebrem protendens gentis honorem.*

On the principal towers stood the statues of several saints then most in esteem, in white marble, and on their pedestals were engraven the following Latin lines, which, in those days, it seems, were accounted poetry (5).

Vos Domini sancti quorum hic præsentia fulget, Hanc urbem & plebem solito, servate favore.

elevated devotion <sup>a</sup> (A). It is, however, worthy of our notice, that we find in neither of a these councils the least footsteps of an affair of very great importance with respect to ecclesiastical government, which was nevertheless settled at this time <sup>a</sup>. The bishops, it seems, were some of them apt to encroach upon their neighbours dioceses, which occasioned much jealousy, strife, and disturbance; an application was therefore made to the king for the remedy of this grievance, which was effected, by describing and setting out the limits of all the dioceses in Spain, which seems to have been done by a royal commission <sup>b</sup>. This sufficiently shews his attention to one essential point of government. We shall see that this did not, however, so wholly occupy his mind, as to hinder them from providing for the safety of his subjects, and supporting the glory of his crown, in another respect, of which we find little notice taken in the reign of his predecessors <sup>c</sup> (B).

A decisive victory gained by his fleet over that of the Saracens.

THE Saracens, at that time, not only disturbed the continent with their armies, but harassed likewise the whole Mediterranean with their fleets, and were particularly troublesome on the coasts of Spain <sup>d</sup>. The king, who had a good naval force, disposed of it in so judicious a manner, that the infidels found themselves very much curbed thereby, which induced them to assemble their whole force, that they might at once crush that of Spain <sup>e</sup>. When they came to make the experiment, however, they found themselves mistaken; the skill of the Goths defending them from being oppressed by superior numbers, insomuch that, after a long and obstinate engagement, the Saracens were totally defeated, and, besides a number of slaves that were taken, lost 270 vessels of all sizes <sup>f</sup>. Some have thought this number excessive; but if we consider that they had no ships of great burthen, and reflect on the great number of men they sometimes transported, we need not be surprised at hearing of fleets of several hundred sail, because, in those days, they had not ships of war, properly speaking, but employed in such expeditions almost every vessel that was fit to put to sea <sup>g</sup>. This was a point of very great consequence, and very probably delayed for some time the disorders and distress to which the people of Spain were afterwards reduced, and from which they might always have been defended, if the successors of Wamba had in any thing, except the title, resembled him <sup>h</sup>.

Deprived of his kingdom by the artifice of Erviga, or Ervigio.

WHILE the thoughts of this great monarch were intirely taken up with arduous affairs of state, there was one near him, who, not out of pity to that indefatigable prince, but purely to gratify his own ambition, was studying how to remove him out of the throne, and to seat himself in his place. This was Erviga, the son of Ardabastus, and, as is generally supposed, the great grandson of Hermenigilde <sup>i</sup>. He saw with displeasure, that, through his temperance and

(A) The first of these, which is commonly stiled the third council of Braga (6), provided, that, in the celebration of the holy mysteries, priests should not make use either of milk or raisin wine, but should use only bread and wine, mingled with a few drops of water. Priests were restrained from having any other woman than their mothers in their houses, to prevent an indecent resort of females to visit their sisters or other relations, who were hitherto permitted to reside with them. Restraint was laid on the bishops, that they should not, for the future, be carried in a chair to church by four deacons, but that they should walk to church, attended by the clergy and people. They were likewise forbid to order priests, abbots, and other ecclesiastics, to be whipped for every slight offence; and, if they did, were to be excommunicated and exiled. The latter, which is stiled the eleventh council of Toledo (7), was opened November the 7th, 675. There were made in this council fifteen canons; the first of which is very remarkable, and to this effect: Such as are members of this, or of any other council, shall behave with the utmost modesty, and speak with the greatest decency, observing at other times a perfect silence, and, by a strict attention, testify their respect to the place they are in. Whenever they are called upon to speak, they shall deliver themselves with much circumspection, without any variation from truth, without any strokes of ill-nature, without unnecessary tautologies, that create confusion, and with- out affecting to be witty, where the business was solid and grave. The rest of the canons relate to ecclesiastical discipline, and contain nothing curious, or of any great importance.

(B) The regulating exactly ecclesiastical discipline in Spain, by a distinct description of the bishopricks, and placing them under their respective metropolitans, to whom Mariana always gives the title of archbishops, was one of the most remarkable acts of Wamba's administration; and an extract of this regulation may be found in the historian before-mentioned, who compares it with another made in the time of Constantine the Great (8). It may be sufficient here to observe, that the six metropolitan sees were Toledo, Seville, Merida, Braga, Tarragona, and Narbonne, the capital of that province which the Goths still retained on the other side of the Pyrenees. What is principally to be observed in respect to this affair is, that the whole was done by the king's authority, without the least intimation to, or communication with, the pope, or even the intervention or approbation of a council of Spanish bishops; so that it is clear, in things temporal, which the limitation of episcopal jurisdiction is allowed to be, the supremacy was acknowledged in the Gothic kings in as large an extent as it hath been any-where enjoyed, since the propagation of the Christian faith has been promoted and supported by civil authority.

a constant exercise, Wamba, notwithstanding his great age, enjoyed a firm state of health; and he was not thoroughly assured, if he had patience even to his death, that, upon a full and free election, he should be chosen his successor. He framed, therefore, to carry his point, a plot very ingenious, though at the same time very base; for he gave a kind of intoxicating potion to the king, by which he was thrown into a senseless and stupefied condition, and, while he was in this state, he caused him, according to the custom of those times, to be shaved, and put into a habit of penitence<sup>k</sup>. The king, when he came to himself, dissembled his surprize, and the suspicion he entertained of the usage which he had received. He knew it was impossible, according to the laws, to resume his dignity; and, preferring the peace of his subjects to every other consideration, he recommended, by a writing under his hand, Erviga for his successor; to prevent, what he saw plainly would otherwise have happened, a civil war<sup>l</sup>. After this he retired peaceably to a monastery, where he spent several years in a life of the strictest devotion; and, after having shewn that he was not ambitious of a crown, and that none was more worthy to wear it, he left to posterity a glorious demonstration, that he could part with it likewise without losing that peace of mind which so much surpasses the regal title, and all the prerogatives annexed to it<sup>m</sup> (C).

ERVIGA was declared king in virtue of Wamba's nomination, approved by the Gothic nobility Monday, October the sixteenth, in the year six hundred and eighty, and was anointed and crowned on Sunday the twenty-second of the same month, by Julian, metropolitan of Toledo. As, thro' the care of his predecessor, he found the affairs of Spain in very good order, so his accession was in every respect more peaceable, and more generally acquiesced in, than he could well have hoped; yet either some murmurings there were of the artifice by which Wamba had been removed, or the king's suspicions made him so uneasy, that he resolved to call a council to sanctify his title, and to make some laws which he thought might be beneficial to the state<sup>n</sup>. This assembly was opened on the ninth of January in the succeeding year, and continued sitting till the twenty-fifth of the same month; in which space they made several canons or laws relative to civil as well as ecclesiastical affairs, very proper to quiet the minds of people, and to make the crown sit light on the head of the new monarch<sup>o</sup> (D). To render their endeavours still more effectual, and to remove, if possible, the heart-burnings of Wamba's family, he gave his daughter Cixilona in marriage to Egiza, his nephew and heir; but, notwithstanding all

(C) Some writers assure us, that this treason of Erviga was very far from being an hasty thought; and that, on the contrary, he had been before practising schemes less successful indeed, but not less villainous (9). In short, they ascribe to him the attempt made by the Moors, whom he solicited to come into Spain, in hopes of being put at the head of an army to oppose them, which might have facilitated his design upon the crown (1). After this miscarried, he perceived that prince Theodofred, the younger brother of the late king Receswinth, was now of a proper age to govern the kingdom, and had an interest amongst the nobility, at least equal, if not superior, to his own, which put him under insurmountable difficulties (2). It is asserted, that it was a piece of poisonous cane, soaked in the water he drank, that had this sad effect; and that Julian, metropolitan of Toledo, was made the instrument of deposing king Wamba, without being at all privy to the design; for finding him, after the administration of the sacrament, totally without sense or voice, he consented to the shaving, and dressing him in a religious habit, as thinking it impossible he should recover (3). The whole of this transaction happened on Sunday the 14th of October, and the very next day Erviga was declared king (4). Wamba recovered his senses in little more than twenty-four hours; and looking upon this as an admonition from heaven to bend his thoughts for the future to the concerns of another life, caused himself to be removed to the monastery of Pampliega, and left his successor to enjoy the splendor, and to struggle with the cares, of a crown (5).

(D) This twelfth council of Toledo was opened by a short speech made by the king, in which he told them, that his design of calling them together was, to engage them to confirm his title, and to make such other canons as they should think expedient, on the perusal of certain papers which he left with them (6). According to the king's desire, the first canon declared him the lawful monarch of the Goths, and, in support of his title, offered three reasons: The first, that king Wamba was shaved, and had taken the habit of a religious man during his sickness, so that he was incapable of resuming the crown; the second, that, in the presence of the great lords of the court, and with their consent, Wamba had declared him his successor; and, lastly, because Julian, metropolitan of Toledo, had made a strict inquiry into the legality of his election; before he proceeded to the ceremony of his coronation. By the second canon, they forbade absolving from the vow of penitence, upon any pretence whatever, those, who, during sickness, and even though deprived of their senses, had taken a religious habit; but enjoined them to satisfy precisely the vows which in that condition they had made. They suppressed the bishoprick of Aquis, which had been erected by king Wamba; they gave the metropolitan of Toledo leave to name, with the consent of the king, to the vacant bishopricks in Spain, or rather to consecrate such as were elected; they restored such as had been declared infamous, for not attending king Wamba in his expedition against the rebels in France; and they confirmed, renewed, and directed to be strictly put in force, all the laws made against the Jews, with several other canons relating to ecclesiastical discipline.

But this we know from the most authentic testimony, the positive declaration of the prelates and grandees in the next general council, that some great convulsion there was, and that the king Erviga had behaved therein with great courage and conduct, by which his subjects were again restored to peace, for which they offered him the tribute of their most grateful acknowledgements<sup>q</sup>.

As Erviga had a numerous family by his queen Luibigotona, and as he was very apprehensive of their safety in case of his demise, he laboured all that was in his power to gain the affections of his subjects. It was with this view that he meditated within himself on every thing that could give the people disquiet or satisfaction, and studied all the means possible by which the one might be removed, and the other procured; believing, that whatever dislike or prejudice they might at first have conceived against him, they must be gradually moved by this conduct, and wish well to a prince who made their happiness more his study than almost any of his predecessors; and, to carry these his good intentions into execution, he held two other general councils in the course of his reign<sup>r</sup> (E). By a steady perseverance in this laudable course, he so far carried his point, that whatever distaste some great persons might have, they were obliged to conceal them, the clergy and greatest part of the nobility and the common people in general, being well affected to his government. In his time, however, there happened a grievous famine, which was followed by an epidemic distemper that carried off great numbers of people<sup>s</sup>. The Jews also, encouraged by the lenity of this reign, began to behave with some degree of insolence, and to multiply exceedingly, so as to give the clergy great apprehensions; but the moderation of the king was so great, that it does not appear he was ever moved to treat them with any extraordinary degree of rigour<sup>t</sup>.

At length, after having worn a crown rather for the service of others than himself, and having every-where procured more tranquillity than in his own breast, the king found himself attacked by a disease that left him very little room to hope for recovery<sup>u</sup>. This induced him to set his affairs in order while there was yet time. He began with appointing Egiza, the nephew and heir of king Wamba, his successor, on the fourteenth of August six hundred eighty seven, having obliged him to swear he would do justice to all whom he might have inadvertently wronged<sup>v</sup>. This done, he sent for the nobility into his presence, released them from their oath of allegiance, ordered himself to be shaved, and dressed in a habit of penitence, by which Egiza entered into the possession of the government, and soon after Erviga breathed his last, in the eighth year of his reign<sup>w</sup>. His predecessor Wamba, being still living in his convent, and having the satisfaction of seeing this prince obliged to take for his own security that step into which he had betrayed him, and to place the crown, while he was yet living, upon the head of that very person for whom it had been designed by himself; and which was perhaps another point of happiness<sup>x</sup>, he did not live long enough to see the untoward consequences that followed from this disposition of the crown, from the implacable resentment which the new king preserved against all who had the least share in that ill usage which the old monarch had met with<sup>y</sup>. But how long he survived his successor, and whether he gave his nephew any advice

(E) In the next general council, the five first canons out of thirteen relate intirely to civil affairs (7). By the first, the accomplices in the revolt to Paul, who had been declared infamous, and deprived of their estates, are restored to both, through the king's clemency; and from the same motive the like favour is granted to all such as were punished in the time of king Chintila for the like offence. In the second, it is recited, that whereas in times past kings had deprived some great lords of the dignity of palatines, in right of which they voted at elections; had condemned them to death and perpetual infamy, without hearing their justification; the council, therefore, to prevent such crying acts of oppression, prohibited any palatine or bishop to be degraded, deprived of his goods, or condemned to be whipped, before the bishops, great lords, and wardens, shall have taken knowlege of his offence, who, in case they find him guilty, shall punish him according to law. As the people were indebted great sums to the public treasury for the arrears of taxes, in the third canon the king's remission of all that was due before his accession is confirmed. In their fourth canon, after acknowledging the great obligations they have to the king, they forbid, under pain of excommunication, any person, of what rank soever, to do any evil to his wife, his children, his sons, or daughters-in-law, in their persons, dignities, or estates. The fifth canon forbids any person to espouse the widow of the king, or to live in an infamous familiarity with her; and whoever, say the council, shall dare so to do, even though it shall be the king himself, his name shall be rased out of the book of life.

a as to the management of public affairs, though mentioned by Mariana <sup>2</sup>, is notwithstanding very uncertain. But so great was his reputation for wisdom and piety in succeeding times, that a potent Spanish monarch caused his body to be removed, and reinterred with honour (F).

We find no difficulty or disturbance made on the accession of Egiza, who without doubt Egiza ascends the throne was very acceptable to a great part of the nation, on account of the great reverence he always paid to his uncle Wamba, notwithstanding the alliance he had contracted with the family of the prince then upon the throne; but it is not at all probable, that, by the advice peaceably, in virtue of this resignation. of the old monarch, he parted with his queen as soon as he found himself settled in the regal dignity <sup>a</sup>, because there is no authentic proof of this; and because, in the canons made by the councils held in his reign, there are many circumstances which render this suggestion very improbable, to which we may add his associating the only son he ever had by her in the government <sup>b</sup>. But it is nevertheless very certain, that he was far enough from approving the measures of the last reign, and of this we have authentic evidence in the scruples he proposed to the first council which was held at Toledo after his accession to the throne, and which indeed seems to have been assembled chiefly on this account. The number of the prelates and of the great lords that sat therein was very considerable, tho' not so numerous as in some councils; but as there had been several lately held, it was not likely that many things of importance would be brought before them <sup>c</sup>.

This assembly met on the eleventh of May six hundred eighty-eight. King Egiza, at his first entrance, saluted them, and, without desiring any confirmation of his title, said, that he had some scruples upon his mind which regarded the government of the kingdom, and which he had called them together to decide <sup>d</sup>. These scruples regarded the oaths he had taken, which appeared to him contradictory. On the marriage of his queen, he had sworn, agreeable to a canon, to protect the widow of his predecessor, his children, his sons-in-law, and his daughters-in-law <sup>e</sup>. At the time of his coronation he had sworn to do justice to all his subjects; and as he was informed that the late king had degraded several of the nobility who were most attached to king Wamba, and had deprived them of their estates illegally, which he had bestowed upon his family, he was at a loss to know how far he was bound by his first oath to protect the family of the deceased king against those who, in virtue of the second, demanded justice, and the restitution of those estates that had been iniquitously taken from them. He assured them, that he was desirous of keeping both these oaths as far as it was possible, and desired their sentiments upon this head, that some rule might be established, in case any thing of the like nature happened for the future <sup>f</sup>.

After mature deliberation, the fathers in council declared, that the first oath could not oblige the king, but so far as it was not contrary to justice: that right was to be done to all the world, and that therefore Egiza was not to support his mother-in-law and his brothers-in-law against any others than those who set up ill-founded claims and unjust demands. They added, that the oath, if taken in favour of his subjects, could not oblige them any farther than justice required, and that the extent of this was to be determined by the judges <sup>g</sup>. This great point settled, the council separated; nor was there any thing of importance done, except vindicating their president Julian, metropolitan of Toledo, against the pope, who pretended to question the orthodoxy of certain expressions that had been used in explaining mysteries of a high nature; and, in doing this, the council acted very roundly, not only without shewing the least submission to him, but even with a visible air of distaste at his conduct; yet at Rome they were so far from resenting this, as in later times, that the decision of the council was received as satisfactory, and the dispute thenceforward buried in oblivion <sup>h</sup>. The good archbishop did not survive two years, and then left behind him a character for learning and piety, which has rendered a his name venerable ever since, not only amongst his own nation, but throughout the whole literary world <sup>1</sup>.

Sisebert, metropolitan of Toledo, conspires against the king and royal family.

His successor in the see of Toledo was Sisebert, who is supposed to have been a person of very high rank and quality amongst the Goths, but he was withal a man insolently proud and extravagantly ambitious, which put him, within two years after he had received this extraordinary favour, upon one of the boldest acts of ingratitude, as well as one of the rankest conspiracies that ever entered into the heart of man <sup>k</sup>. In a word, the scheme he had formed was, to cut off the king, the queen, and all their children; and his interest was so extensive, his address so great, and his intrigues so well laid, that he had gained a multitude of people of all ranks to abet even so wicked and traiterous a design <sup>l</sup>. Yet he could not manage his affairs so cunningly, but that the king had notice of his schemes, which he defeated by causing his person to be secured; and, though some of his partisans actually broke out into rebellion, yet the king, by his prudent management, and by attending in time to the suppression of their attempts, quickly restored the tranquillity of the kingdom; and then summoned a council of Toledo, to judge of the punishment proper to be inflicted on this turbulent prelate. His cause was accordingly heard; and he was deposed, for having conspired against the life of the king, the queen, and their children <sup>m</sup>; which was as far as they could go, for he was still left to the king's prosecution in the ordinary course of justice, who, out of respect to his dignity and character, was content, notwithstanding his enormous offence, to banish him out of his dominions <sup>n</sup>.

The Jews contrive an insurrection, and invite an invasion.

BEFORE the close of the year, the discovery of a new conspiracy constrained the king to assemble another council. This scheme was as deep-laid and as dangerous as the former; for the Jews, who were scattered throughout all the provinces, had concerted a general insurrection, and, in consequence of their intelligence with others of their own nation in Africa, were in hopes of being strong enough, with the help of these foreign auxiliaries, to shake off the yoke. The king, by his vigilance, prevented this rebellion from breaking out; and the council, which met on the ninth of November six hundred ninety-four, decreed, that all Jews, who, after baptism, should either return to their old religion, or conspire against the king, should be made slaves, and lose all their effects <sup>o</sup>. They farther prohibited the permitting these people for the future the public exercise of their religion; and directed their children should be taken from them at seven years of age, in order to be brought up Christians <sup>p</sup>. It is very probable that this might contribute to prevent their breaking out into rebellion; but certainly it could have no great effect towards removing their disaffection to a government that treated them with so much severity. We have not, however, any distinct account of the manner in which this law was carried into execution, or of any farther steps taken by the king to keep them in subjection; though we may naturally conclude, from the disposition of this prince, and from the circumstances of the nation, that this was not omitted <sup>q</sup>.

A war by sea with the Saracens, in which the Goths are victorious.

THE Saracens in Africa having conquered the best part of Mauritania, and having a good fleet upon the coast to attend the motions of their army on shore, Egiza thought it a point of prudence to fit out a navy for the defence of his dominions. This was accordingly done, under the command of Theodomir, who is on probable grounds believed to have been either the son or the son-in-law of this monarch, being one of the persons devoted to destruction by Sisebert's conspiracy <sup>r</sup>. The young prince had not been long at sea, before the infidels, confident of their own strength, and despising the youth and experience of the young admiral, attacked the Goths, which brought on a general engagement; and this, after an obstinate dispute, ended in a decisive victory of the latter, by which Theodomir delivered Spain from its present apprehensions, and disappointed the hopes of those who wished for a foreign invasion, to give weight to their secret conspiracies, from which Egiza, thro' the whole course of his reign, was seldom or never free; yet it was not long before the expectations of the malecontents were revived by a war that broke out with the French <sup>s</sup>.

Rupture on the the side of France likewise, which however is soon over.

It is not very clear what the motives were to this rupture, or indeed with whom it happened; for at this juncture the kings of France had so little real power, that they could not much disturb their neighbours; so that it is generally supposed, and in regard to this war we have no better light than conjectures, that the dukes of Aquitain and Gascony, having in a great measure rendered themselves independent, made an irruption into Spain, or rather into the Gallic province that belonged to Spain, which obliged Egiza to send a considerable army into those parts <sup>t</sup>. In the course of this war there were no less than three battles fought, in which a the Goths had no advantage, and the French were also no great gainers, which made both parties so weary of the war, that, as it rose, so it ceased gradually; and Egiza, by keeping good garrisons on his frontiers, discouraged those invaders from repeating their visits; with which he was so well satisfied, that it does not appear he ever acted offensively against these enemies<sup>a</sup>. It is probable, that one principal cause of his moderation was, his being being grown far into years, and the strong desire he had of seeing the tranquillity of his dominions thoroughly established before his death. With this view he proposed to the nobility associating his son Witiza with him in the government, that, amidst so many perils, the kingdom might run no unnecessary hazard by those disorders which almost constantly happened upon a vacancy of the throne. His arguments had so much weight with them, that they readily yielded to his request; and the old king thereupon sent his son into Galicia, where he kept his court in the city of Tuy, that, having the administration of a province in his own hands, he might be accustomed to business, and be more capable of ruling the Goths when he became the sole monarch of so potent a nation, and of so extensive a dominion as they at this time enjoyed<sup>b</sup>. The design was certainly worthy the wisdom of Egiza; and, if it had not all the consequences that he expected, it was no greater a disappointment than might attend whatever plan a finite understanding could devise, as being more especially impeded by accidents he could not foresee, and which he could not have prevented if he had foreseen<sup>c</sup>.

THE king, as it became a wise prince, when he perceived that his son's great abilities and many amiable qualities had gained him the affections of the people, resolved to sanctify what had been already done with the consent of the nobility by the approbation of a council, which he caused to be summoned for that purpose at Toledo, in which Felix, metropolitan of that city, preside<sup>d</sup>, but the acts of it are unfortunately lost. We should have had no memorial of this assembly at all, but for the care of some ancient historians, who have barely mentioned the place where it was held, and given us some light as to the reason the king had for holding it, which, it seems, it effectually answered; but whether any thing more of moment was done therein, or of what nature, they are silent, who could have informed us, and have put us under a necessity of being silent likewise<sup>e</sup>. This was one of the last public acts of Egiza's reign, and must in all probability have afforded him very high satisfaction, as it gave him a fair prospect of securing to his son a peaceable entrance into the government, and to his subjects the quiet enjoyment of that felicity which it had been his study to procure for them during the continuance of a long and prosperous reign<sup>f</sup>.

THE weight of years, and the load of those infirmities which accompany them, brought Egiza to his grave in a very short time after, that is to say, in the month of October in the year seven hundred<sup>g</sup>, or, as others assert, and perhaps with reason, in the preceding year<sup>h</sup>. Some, but these are for the most part modern writers, accuse this monarch of cruelty, especially at the entrance of his reign; which cannot, however, be easily reconciled to the high commendations for his clemency bestowed upon him by several councils, which, if they had been contrary to truth, must have been equally injurious to them and to him<sup>i</sup>. Besides, it is certain, that, not long after his accession, he pardoned, and restored to the rank of a lord of the palace, Theudemond, a nobleman, whom his uncle Wamba had banished and degraded<sup>j</sup>. It is also universally allowed, that he was a prince of great piety, that he lessened the weight of taxes, and that he was very strict in the administration of justice. The notion that has prevailed of his having repudiated his queen at his first coming to the crown, seems to have no other foundation than the mistaking the true sense of a canon made by one of the councils at Toledo; and, tho' it is countenanced by so great a writer as Mariana, is very justly rejected by Ferreras. Upon the whole, he was a vigilant and victorious monarch, laboured incessantly to bring things into good order, and, as far as it was possible, to provide the best remedies for those evils which he could not eradicate<sup>k</sup>. His reputation and his power preserved his kingdom in peace, and the people of Spain in such wealth and plenty, that the luxury this produced proved very soon after fatal to their safety, but ought not to prove so to his reputation. He without question hoped they would have made a better use of that abundance which they accumulated from the happy situation and rich produce of their country, and from the wisdom and lenity of his administration, which did not fall in any degree short of that of his predecessor<sup>l</sup>.

WITIZA was no sooner informed of his father's death, than, leaving Tuy, he repaired to Toledo, where he began his reign with such extraordinary acts of goodness and clemency, as gained him the affections of his subjects to a degree of adoration. He granted, in the first place, an act of general amnesty, recalled all that had been banished by his father on the score of their infidelity to Wamba, or having had a share in the conspiracy of Sisebert, metropolitan of Toledo. <sup>a</sup>

 He not only recalled them, and restored them to their estates, but likewise reversed every thing that had been done against them, which put them into full possession of their former honours <sup>b</sup>.
 He was not content with doing this, but, being desirous that all ranks and degrees of his people should feel the effects of his generous disposition, he caused all the registers and books of account, in which there were any entries of fines, impositions, or taxes, remaining due to the crown, to be thrown into the fire, and so released them all at once <sup>c</sup>. We need not wonder that such a prince as this was excessively commended; nor is it at all strange that these excessive commendations had a bad effect upon a young man of a gentle, generous, and debonair disposition. Yet we cannot imagine it happened all at once, or that, from his behaving with the greatest moderation, kindness, and tenderness, towards his people, he should immediately become <sup>b</sup> vicious and profligate in the most extreme degree <sup>k</sup>. This must certainly appear very improbable; and, as no authority is brought to support this charge, there is the greatest reason to believe that it is ill founded; and that, if Witiza became in reality such a monster as he is reported, he sunk gradually into vices and debaucheries as other men do.

The pope's supremacy rejected in the 18th council of Toledo.

IN the first year of his reign, he held a general council at Toledo <sup>1</sup>, in which Gunderic, metropolitan of that see, presided; a prelate universally extolled for his piety, and, which is still more remarkable, for his zeal and fortitude in opposing the king in his ill courses, and remonstrating to him the bad effects his vices would have in weakening his government, and corrupting his subjects <sup>m</sup>. Such a man could not be suspected of countenancing wicked actions, and much less of giving them credit by the decrees of such an assembly, the acts of which are <sup>c</sup> long ago destroyed; but if, in this council, an attempt made by the pope to settle his jurisdiction in Spain was rejected with contempt, and treated as a usurpation, we may easily find a reason why the acts of this council were either destroyed, or with-held from the light <sup>n</sup>. If, in the same assembly, any canon was made for allowing secular priests to marry, we may easily apprehend that this did not arise from any intention of indulging, but rather from a desire of repressing, the corruption of the clergy. We can likewise easily see, that, as things now stand, and have long stood, in Spain, it is by no means fit that any such canons should appear; and this will account to any unprejudiced mind, for the methods in which these facts are related in the Spanish histories <sup>o</sup>.

*Witiza becomes dissolute in the most extreme degree,
 and is generally hated.*

WE must, however, admit, if we will give credit to the unanimous voice of the Spanish <sup>d</sup> historians in these and in succeeding times, that, within a short time after the decease of his father, Witiza suffered himself to be seduced by his natural propensity to pleasure, by the base insinuations of flattering courtiers, and by that smiling prospect of prosperity that had attended his father's virtues and his own, to digress from that path which he had hitherto trod, and to make excursions unworthy of a wise man and a great prince. In short, he gradually gave way to sensual inclinations, till at last he abandoned himself wholly to women, which in him had its usual effects, that is, it increased his desire of commanding, in proportion as it weakened his understanding <sup>p</sup>. From being dissolute only, he quickly became unjust; and, having deserted his queen's bed, he invaded the beds of other men; a crime, which however common among princes, is notwithstanding the most compendious method of filling up their iniquities, and <sup>e</sup> conducts them by the very shortest cut from general esteem to universal execration. Gunderic told him this early; but Witiza was not to be restrained; he was misled by those transports of loyalty which he had beheld in his people, simply imagining they would keep their duty when he forgot his own, and that the fervour which his virtues had raised would not be extinguished even by his vices <sup>q</sup>. But in the space of a few years he found his mistake, and that a persuasion of his having lost his people's hearts encouraged some to think of arming their hands against him; which discovery, instead of convincing him of the necessity of regaining their good opinions, by taking a contrary course, prompted him to another vice, more hateful than the former, which was cruelty; a step, which, as it made him a much worse man, made him so much the more hated <sup>r</sup>. In all countries, sooner or latter, like causes will <sup>f</sup>

- a. his concubines, as the irregularity of his passions led him to cast his eyes upon them preferably to others<sup>x</sup>. By this imprudent as well as impudent procedure, he provoked those who were most able to hurt him; but having intelligence of the first conspiracies that were raised against him, he delivered himself by exiling such as he had most reason to suspect. Amongst these were some princes of the royal family, particularly Theodofred, the brother of king Recesuintbo; whom he sent to Cordova, where some say he caused his eyes to be put out, that he might be in no condition of mounting the throne, which however is not to be depended upon; with him went his son Roderic, who actually succeeded Witiza<sup>y</sup>. At this time also it is believed he banished Pelagius, who is generally held to be the son of Favila, who was likewise brother to king Recesuintbo. If we speak doubtfully of these genealogies, it is that we may avoid misleading the
- b reader; for we make no question at all that these were princes, that is, descended from crowned heads among the Visigoths, but from whom, and in what degree, is very uncertain, and so it ought to be understood. Mariana would have us believe, that, while Witiza resided at Tuy, he killed Favila, the father of Don Pelagius, with a blow of a baton, or commanding staff, at the time this prince was captain of his guard, which, as we have elsewhere observed, does by no means agree with those high and universal praises bestowed upon Witiza at his accession to the throne<sup>z</sup>.

- He is also said to have done other strange, wicked, and even wild actions, which are many of them improbable, and some of them impossible. Among the first may be reckoned a law he is said to have made, permitting his subjects to have as many wives as they pleased; and
- c another for breaking to pieces and destroying arms of every kind, under pretence that he would render them needless, by maintaining his people in constant peace; towards which, this would have been a very foolish step<sup>a</sup>. Amongst the latter, we may justly range another law, said to be of his making, for dismantling every town in his dominions, except the cities of Toledo, Tuy, and Astorga, which could not be true, because the Moors found many of them very well fortified, and were put to a great deal of trouble in reducing them. We have no intention to extenuate his vices, or apologize for his conduct; but, with the wiser and more judicious of the Spanish historians, to expose those exaggerations which are unworthy of belief. Witiza might be a wicked, and, in that sense, a weak prince, without being a madman or an idiot<sup>b</sup>. His vices grew upon him daily, more especially after the death of Gunderic, who
- d was succeeded by Sindered in the see of Toledo; a man who is said to have complied with his prince, at the expence of his conscience and his function; and it is likewise asserted, with great probability, that, misguided by the bad example of the court, the people in general became luxurious, indolent, and vicious, which, as it was very natural, lessened them in the esteem of their neighbours, and prepared the way for that ruin in which they were quickly after swallowed up. We must now turn our eyes upon those whom Providence made the scourges of a dissolute monarch and a degenerate people, and take notice of the first steps that were made towards their destruction<sup>c</sup> (G).

WALID was at this time khalif of the Saracens, and Muza was the general who commanded his forces in the maritime parts of Africa. He had already, by order of his master, Ceuta, which

(G) We are told by Mariana, and, upon his credit, by many later writers, that Sindered, metropolitan of Toledo, admitted Oppas, the brother of king Witiza, or, as some say, his son, as his colleague in that see (8); but for this there is no sufficient authority alleged; nor is it easy to discern why the king should put Sindered under such a difficulty, who is said to have been so complaisant to him as to restrain, and even to punish, such of the clergy as would have admonished him of his vices. The ancient writers speak of Oppas as metropolitan of Seville, not of Toledo (9); and it seems more agreeable to the king's interest to have his brother at the head of a large jurisdiction in one place, and his creature in another, than to crowd them both into one see. As to this Sindered, he has a very indifferent character given him on all sides, and therefore, we presume he deserved it (1). But what seems to shew him in the worst light, is his flying to Rome, when the Moors became masters of Spain, where he survived many years, for we find him, in the year seven hundred twenty-one, assisting at a council held there by pope Gregory the second (2), who no doubt considered him as archbishop of Toledo, which however was not the case in Spain; where, upon his abdicating his see, the clergy chose Urbanus to succeed him (3), which is a proof, that, to the very last moment, the Spanish church maintained her independency. It is no improbable conjecture, and we mention it barely as a conjecture, that this Sindered, who was so complaisant to Witiza in the worst part of his reign, might carry away the records of the last council at Toledo, and, out of complaisance to his new master, suffer them to be destroyed at Rome, where, from the nature of their contents, it is not to be expected they should meet with any quarter.

reduced the rest of Mauritania under his obedience, and resolved to finish his conquest by driving the Goths out of the small part of that country of which they were possessed <sup>a</sup>. It was with this view that he marched directly with a numerous army to form the siege of Ceuta, in which count Julian commanded, who is said to have espoused the sister of Oppas and of king Witiza. He was certainly a man of great quality, and an excellent officer, of which he gave a noble instance, by defending this place with such skill and intrepidity, that, after considerable loss before it, Muza was obliged to raise the siege, and, as a proof of his resentment for want of success, he ravaged and destroyed all the adjacent country without mercy <sup>c</sup>. Some time after this, bearing still in his mind the anger kindled by this defeat, he caused a powerful fleet to be fitted out, that he might try whether the Goths were as able to defend themselves at sea as on shore. Witiza had no sooner intelligence of this, <sup>b</sup> than he likewise equipped a powerful navy, under the command of prince Theodomir, who had been before victorious over this enemy, and was so fortunate as to defeat them again; which obliged Muza to consider his future attempts better, though at the same time it served to augment that indignation he had conceived against the Goths, and which was ever after implacable <sup>d</sup>.

Witiza continues in a state of dissolute insensibility.

THIS, as some judicious Spanish writers observe, ought to have opened the eyes of the monarch of the Goths, and excited in him an active and diligent zeal for putting his dominions, more especially their sea coasts, into the best state of defence possible. But when men, and more especially princes, devote themselves intirely to pleasure, it so enervates their faculties, and clouds their understandings, that they remain in a kind of dead sleep, in which destruction generally finds them <sup>e</sup>. But, besides this neglect of Witiza, to take the measures necessary in so critical a conjuncture, there was another circumstance that could not fail of retarding his progress in that respect, though he might have been so inclined; and this was, the suspicions he had of the fidelity of many of his subjects, which rendered it extremely dangerous for him to raise forces in different parts of the kingdom, who, instead of resisting foreign enemies, might have turned their arms against himself <sup>f</sup>. We may from hence discern, that the condition of Spain at this time was such as really invited the Moors, a restless and martial nation, to attempt an invasion, at the same time that it disabled the Goths from exerting themselves in a manner otherwise natural to a people who had established themselves <sup>d</sup> in Spain by conquest, and who had hitherto defended their territories by the same courage and discipline, through the exercise of which they had been acquired <sup>i</sup> (H).

A civil war at length breaks out, but followed by a total defection.

ALL the arts that Witiza could use, and all the precautions that his diffidence could inspire, proved in the end ineffectual for preventing the defection of his subjects, who, taking the advantage of the distracted state of his affairs, began to shake off all respect for his government in several distant provinces. Roderic, the son of Theodefied, availing himself of this general disposition, was quickly in such a state, as to form pretensions to the regal dignity; so that a civil war began, and confusion served, as it commonly does in all countries, as the prelude to universal destruction <sup>k</sup>. The king's thoughts, being taken off from the care of the public, were from this time intirely turned to the preservation of himself and of his family: on the other hand, the rebels and malecontents, having their own safety chiefly in view, were assiduous only in bringing that revolution to bear which might free them from all fear of punish- <sup>e</sup>

(H) There is no part of Mariana's history written with greater solidity of thought, or beauty of expression, than where he describes the strange degeneracy of the Visigoths, and that universal corruption by which they might be said to qualify themselves for destruction. By their conquest of the Suevi, by the expulsion of the Greeks, and from the confusion into which the French monarchy fell under their last kings of the first race, the Goths had no enemies left to struggle with; and this long peace producing vast riches, to which may be added the disposition of the three preceding kings to court the good-will of their subjects, by studying what might be most acceptable, absolutely turned their heads, and made them believe that they were as much superior in power to other nations as they evidently were in wealth and luxury. We may also remark (the rather, because hitherto it has escaped observation), that in these times all who had any degree of property were waited upon by slaves, than which nothing contributes so much to enervate the strength of a country; for, by a servile submission, they lose all sense of honour, and consequently all spirit and courage, at the same time that they render those they serve excessively indolent, and inspire them with an insupportable haughtiness, that renders them utterly unfit for discipline; so that, however tumultuous and seditious in time of peace, they can never be brought to undergo the hardships and fatigues of war. Witiza's great fault was, that he soothed his subjects in this manner of living, at the same time that he encouraged them in it by his own example, without ever reflecting, that, to disable a nation from making war, must inevitably deprive them of the power of maintaining peace. There is no need, therefore, of prying into the rolls of destiny, in order to account for the sudden ruin of this great people, since that settled connection, which Divine Providence has established between enormous vices and their adequate punishments, may sufficiently satisfy; and in this sense their destruction was a judgment from heaven, which they might have averted by a timely change of manners.

a ment from Witiza; so that the apprehensions of present and immediate danger on both sides; hindered either party from discerning the peril they were in of being totally overthrown by an enterprising and vigilant enemy, that kept an eye continually upon their divisions, and expected with impatience when a proper opportunity would offer for renewing their endeavours to extend that empire, which they had lately established in Africa, over the opposite country in Europe, which they knew to be rich and flourishing, and which these hungry and rapacious conquerors had a longing desire to plunder<sup>1</sup>. Of this they very speedily gave another pregnant instance, even before things were altogether ripe for making a general invasion; but by what means they were led to this expedition is not easy to determine<sup>m</sup>, though we conceive the following at least a probable account.

b THE governor of Mauritania for the khalif, Muza, after long meditation, judged the most probable means of subduing Spain was to gain a footing therein, by seizing either some strong place, or some small district that might be easily fortified; and, having this project once in his mind, it was not long before he perceived, that the peninsula fronting Africa, and within four leagues of his own province, was the fittest that he could desire for such a purpose. He made choice, therefore, of Tarick or Tarif Abuzara to command a small body of troops, which he caused to be embarked for the execution of this design, about the success of which authors differ extremely<sup>n</sup>. The Spanish writers say, that he landed with so small a force, that he was speedily repulsed, and obliged to return to Africa; whereas some of the Arabians assert, that, finding the Goths engaged in a civil war, he ravaged all the coasts, and returned to Muza with an account that his enterprize would be found a great deal more easy than himself had imagined<sup>o</sup>. Others maintain, that he went yet farther, and that he established himself here, bestowing the name of Geizira Haladra, i. e. the Green Island, afterwards contracted into Algeira, on the whole tract, and that of Gebel Tarick, which by degrees has been softened into Gibraltar, on the promontory and fortrefs which he erected there<sup>p</sup> (1). This, in the sentiment of the most judicious of the Spanish critics, is accounted the first entrance of the Moors, the step by which they prepared for a general conquest, and, from a nice and judicious comparison of facts and dates, they fixed this introductory expedition of Tarif Abuzara to the year of our Lord seven hundred and nine<sup>q</sup>; and if, in this, they have not hit the exact truth, we may be at least certain, that they come as near it as, at this distance of time, and with the few lights which

f can be derived from antient writers, it is possible; and therefore with this we must be content; for though nothing is of greater importance to the history of Spain than the fixing of this period, yet too much nicety therein would serve only to deceive us.

d WHILE Muza was contriving in what manner he could most effectually avail his master of what had been already done and discovered in Spain, the civil war went on between king Witiza and Don Roderic, till the death of the former put the latter in possession of the kingdom, but without putting an end to the war; for Evan and Sisebut, the sons of Witiza, having been accustomed to be stiled princes, could not think of being degraded into the rank of private persons with patience, and therefore took every method that could be devised to make the utmost use of their father's creatures, in order to set one of them upon the throne<sup>r</sup>. It was to compass this end, that they began to intrigue with the Saracens; and, as if the miseries of their country were not already too many, to propose to them sending an army into Spain, which, through the intrigues of count Julian, they were more than enough inclined to do<sup>s</sup>. It must appear strange to an attentive reader, that this noble personage, who but a short time before had done his country such a remarkable service, by the defence of Ceuta against this very man and this very nation, should now go over to their interests, and labour to throw his country into the most miserable condition that can possibly be conceived<sup>t</sup>. It must be imagined, e Some truth there may be, though but little, in the story of count Julian.

(1) In obedience to his master's commands, it is said, that Muza acquainted count Julian he was willing, in pursuance of his advice, to make an attempt upon Spain; but that the situation of affairs in Africa was such at this time, that it would not permit him to spare any great number of men; and on this account only one hundred horse and four hundred foot were embarked on board four trading ships, and sent over under the conduct of Tarick Ebn Nacair, an old officer, who had but one eye, yet in great esteem with his master, and held the fittest amongst all under his command to form a right judgment of what might be expected from count Julian's intrigues and interest (1). We have set down the Arabic names, as bestowed on the island and promontory, in this rather than in the next expedition, in which we differ from Ferreras (2), though we rely upon the same authority (3); because it appears much more natural that new names should be given to places at first sight, than when they become more familiar. The reader, however, being apprised of this, will decide as to him shall seem reasonable.

that he was drawn to this either by the promise of a prodigious recompence, or, which is rather <sup>a</sup> to be expected in a man of his birth or quality, by a too deep resentment of some personal injury. This last is adopted by most historians, and, in some, we find a copious and circumstantial account of the manner in which king Roderic ravished his daughter Cava, with a long train of particulars, that visibly betray the romance. Those who are more desirous of finding truth, are very far from being positive whether it was the daughter or the wife of count Julian that was thus injured; and some modern critics, after entering closely and deeply into this inquiry, instead of solving those doubts, have introduced a new and greater difficulty, with respect to the king by whom this injury was done, and who they think it very probable was not Roderic, but Witiza <sup>b</sup>. Others again, reflecting upon these uncertainties, and that none of the ancient Spanish chronicles afford the least hint of this matter, conclude the whole to be a fable, which therefore they reject intirely <sup>c</sup> (K).

By his persuasion, Muza makes a second descent upon Spain.

BUT without carrying the matter so far, we may allow the Arabian writers <sup>x</sup>, who in this respect had as good a title to be well informed as the Spanish, may be in the right as to the assistance given Muza by Don Julian, moved to this inexcusable and barbarous conduct by resenting some flagrant injury done to him at home, while he was defending the conquests of the Goths abroad, not only against the prince who committed the offence, but against his innocent subjects, and Don Julian's own countrymen <sup>y</sup>. This was no more than Witiza's sons likewise did, and their uncle Oppas, who was metropolitan of Seville, who, to preserve a precarious principality, were content to abandon a part, and thereby hazard the whole of Spain, thro' the bringing in of these infidel auxiliaries <sup>z</sup>. By the persuasion of count Julian, as their own writers say, Muza made a second and much more considerable embarkation, under the command of a new general, whose name was Tarick Abdalabi, who, with upwards of seven thousand men, accompanied by count Julian, landed near Gibraltar, and from thence made inroads into the adjacent country <sup>a</sup>. The Saracen general, being thoroughly informed of the divisions of the Goths, and how little king Roderic was in a condition to oppose them, resolved, even with so inconsiderable a force, to attempt the reduction of the whole kingdom; and, that this design of his might not be disappointed by his soldiers endeavouring to return with their spoils into Africa, he caused his fleet to be set on fire before his intentions were generally known; but it is to be supposed that he gave proper notice, as well of what he designed to do, as of what he had already done, to Muza, from whom he derived his authority <sup>b</sup>. This is considered as the second invasion of the Moors, and is by many writers confounded with the first, because the forces landed at the same place; but the best authorities place this in the year seven hundred and ten <sup>c</sup>.

King Roderic assembles with difficulty an army ready to resist them.

THE wise governor of Mauritania, who had rendered himself accountable to the khalif his master for the success of the war he had undertaken, intirely approved this measure, as thinking the force already sent over by no means proportionable to such a design, though he was at the same time very well pleased that his general was in possession of a fortress and port where,

(K) It is certainly not a little unfortunate for the credit of this story, that Isidore of Badajoz, Don Alphonso the Great, and the author of the Chronicle of Albayda, the three most ancient as well as most authentic writers concerning these times, should not mention or take the least notice of it; so that till the archbishop Don Roderic of Toledo brought it to light from the memoirs, and on the faith, of the Arabians (4), it was scarce known in Spain; yet it might for all that be very true, and the doubts raised concerning it are not so much founded in the fact, as in the circumstances with which it is related. For it is said that Roderic, king of the Goths, accidentally discovering from a window Cava, the daughter of Don Julian, who then attended upon the queen Egilona, half naked, became in love with her to such a degree, that, finding every method he could take to corrupt her virtue, vain, he at length employed force. Upon this, she wrote to her father; and Mariana has given us her letter at large, which is one of the ornaments of his history, and Don Julian's answer, who afterwards returned into Spain, and, dissembling the injury he had received, prevailed upon the king to send him ambassador to Mu-

za, and to permit him to carry his daughter with him, which opportunity he took to persuade the Saracens to undertake the conquest of Spain (5). Now most of these facts may very probably be true, if, instead of king Roderic, we substitute Witiza, in whose time, as we have already shewn, count Julian began his intrigues with the Moors. The great, indeed the only, objection to this is, that, in the succeeding part of the history, we find count Julian acting in concert with the sons of Witiza, which seems to be inconsistent with the resentment shewn against their father. The answer to this, however, is both easy and natural, since Marmol, who was an inquisitive and intelligent writer, positively assures us, that he found it recorded in an ancient history of those times, that this traitor was the brother-in-law of the king he betrayed, and we may believe the wife of count Julian was Witiza's sister (6), and, consequently, those young princes were his nephews. We may add to this, that the reign of Roderic was so short and so full of troubles, and his own personal character in other respects so fair, that nothing can be more improbable, with respect to him, than this imputation.

- a for the future, he might send reinforcements, as occasion required<sup>d</sup>. But believing it necessary, in the first place, to have a superior army in the field, he got together as many vessels as was possible, and drew out of his army twelve thousand men more, mostly natives of Mauritania, from whence the conquest of Spain is attributed to the Moors, and sent them over under the command of Tarick Abincier, whom he declared general and commander in chief, and who had instructions to extend his conquests as far as he was able, without hazarding his troops too much, by marching into the heart of the country<sup>e</sup>. We must naturally conclude, that the contrivance, providing necessaries, and carrying this scheme into execution, must have been attended with various delays, and occasioned, on the whole, a great consumption of time, insomuch that we cannot easily conceive this new general could take the field before the
- b summer of seven hundred and eleven, at which time he found king Roderic, who had already brought his affairs into some order, at the head of a small army, ready to oppose him, and at the same time to cover, as far as he was able, all the open country behind him from the incursions of the Moors, who, as they had a considerable body of horse, made where ever they came a most dreadful devastation, and exercised, by the advice of Don Julian, and with a view to strike a terror that might render resistance vain, the most inhuman cruelties, upon the unarmed and defenceless inhabitants<sup>f</sup>.

THE reader will discern that hitherto we have had but a very indistinct account of this last monarch of the Visigoths, and for this plain and short reason, that there is no better to be had. We have no authentic relation of the place or manner of Witiza's death, or of the solemn election, or at least recognition, of Roderic afterwards; for things were now in such disorder and confusion, so many evils were felt, such numberless dangers threatened, and this calamitous scene was of so long a continuance, that very few people had any inclination to put the transactions of these times into writing, till it became impossible to speak of them with that correctness and accuracy that posterity might wish or expect<sup>g</sup>. It is indeed true, that some historians afterwards stepped in, and in a good measure filled up this chasm with incongruous and superstitious stories, below the dignity of history; and which have so obscured any traces of truth that may remain amongst them, as to prevent the bringing them together in a way that might afford the reader any tolerable satisfaction; and therefore it is much better to content ourselves with a few facts that are tolerably well supported, as being

d drawn from the short chronicles of antient writers, than to have recourse to these fabulous supplements, which, though they might entertain and amuse, could not either inform or instruct<sup>h</sup> (L).

THE king of the Visigoths, perceiving plainly that this kind of defensive war would by degrees waste his army, and ruin his subjects, and being at the same time conscious that he was in no condition to act offensively, laboured with all imaginable industry to heal the divisions that had been so fatal to his country; and, with this view, made some propositions to the sons of Witiza, who had still a considerable party at their devotion. Whether these young princes repented of their past conduct, and entered into the king's reasons, or whether they

(L) The reports concerning the death of Witiza (for what we have in modern historians must be esteemed as taken from tradition, since the ancient writers before-mentioned contain nothing upon that subject) were not only various and uncertain, but at the same time inconsistent and contradictory. According to some he was killed in battle by such as adhered to Don Roderic; others, that he was not killed, but taken, sent prisoner to Cordova, and, having his eyes put out, lived there some time in a miserable condition (7). Some again affirm, that he died of sickness at Toledo, and was buried in the church of St. Leocadia, on the twentieth of December seven hundred and ten, says a certain writer, upon whose credit however we cannot rely (8). Yet in this respect he cannot be very far in the wrong; for towards the latter end of this year happened his decease, if the ablest among the Spanish critics are not mistaken in their judgments. To justify farther what is said in the text, it may not be amiss to represent succinctly a story, which Mariana tells us from an Arabian author, of Don Roderic, which, as they have placed it, must have happened early in his reign (9). There was, it is said; a certain structure in Toledo, stiled the enchanted palace, which was very carefully locked up; and the current tradition was, that, whenever this place should be opened, the monarchy of the Goths would be quickly overthrown. Don Roderic, it seems, took it into his head, that this was only a political invention of his predecessors to secure their wealth, which he fancied must be deposited in this house, under such a variety of bars and locks; all of which he caused to be broken, and, having thus forced an entrance, he found the place altogether empty, except that there was an iron chest, which he also directed to be forced open, and therein a piece of cloth, with armed men painted thereon, and an inscription; signifying, that, very soon after this should be brought to light, Spain would be subdued by men resembling those that were there painted; a piece of intelligence that made him quickly repent his ill-timed curiosity. Mariana, to excuse himself for inserting this idle tale, alleges he was unwilling his readers should be unacquainted with an event transmitted by tradition; and it is inserted here to justify our remark on the fabulous circumstances interwoven by certain writers, for want of facts worthy of history.

resolved to postpone their resentments for the present, and to resume them when a more favourable opportunity offered, is very uncertain; yet, whatever their intentions were, it is generally agreed that they altered their behaviour, accepted the terms offered them by the king, and joined his army with their forces<sup>1</sup>. The Moorish general Tarick, being informed of this, and that Roderic was putting himself at the head of all the troops he could raise, in order to act offensively, sent an exact account of every thing to Muza, demanding a reinforcement, that he might be in a condition to dispute matters with the enemy, in case, after this alteration of their affairs, it should come to his turn to act on the defensive<sup>2</sup>. Muza no sooner received this intelligence, than he caused a body of five thousand men to embark, and sent fresh instructions with this reinforcement to his general, who now thought himself in a condition to keep the field, and even to give them battle if he was forced to it<sup>3</sup>. This was indeed the only method Roderic had to take; his army was more numerous, he had the flower of his nobility about him, and he saw that things could not remain long in the situation they were in, unless it was in his power to give the Moors such a check as might oblige them to return again to Africa; he therefore disposed every thing in the best manner he was able for a general engagement, which he knew must be decisive; and omitted nothing that was in his power to inspire his troops with the hopes of victory, by reviving the ancient spirit of valour, and regard for the public welfare, which had rendered them invincible in former times<sup>4</sup>. His presence, his eloquence, and his activity, had, as might be well expected, a great influence over his army, insomuch that they received this proposition with applause. Though the season of the year was far advanced, and themselves much fatigued by their frequent endeavours to cover the country, yet they shewed themselves willing to exert their utmost power to rid themselves once for all of such dangerous and troublesome neighbours; and Roderic, upon this, without suffering their courage to cool, assigned all his generals their proper posts, and marched directly towards the forces of the Moors, to determine the fate of Spain by a single action.<sup>5</sup> (M).

The total defeat of the Spanish army, and subversion of the Gothic monarchy.

The Moors, on their side, were very far from declining the engagement, and fought only to avoid fighting with any manifest disadvantage of ground. At length the two armies met in a plain near the town of Xeres de la Frontera, on the banks of the river Guadelete, about three leagues from Arcos, in the kingdom of Andalusia, as it is now called. The Goths charged with all the fury that is commonly inspired by despair; but the Moors, who were old seasoned troops, received them with such firmness and intrepidity, as quickly diminished their fire. They made, however, several brisk efforts to penetrate through the infidels, but in vain; for the number of experienced officers amongst them kept the soldiers to their duty, and hindered them from rendering victory precarious by too early a pursuit<sup>6</sup>. At last, however, the Goths being intirely broken, the Moorish cavalry fell in amongst them, and made prodigious slaughter, rendering their victory as complete as they could desire; for the Goths flying without any order, or so much as knowing where to seek for safety, more were killed in running away than had fallen in the action; and the scattered remains dispersed in such a manner, that if their generals had attempted, it would have been very difficult to have brought even a small body of them together. We are not told what the numbers were that fell in this bloody dispute, but without question the loss on the side of the Goths must have been very great; and yet this was not their utmost misfortune; but their having no place of retreat, no other army

(M) We find in some historians a long detail of this war, in which the troops of king Roderic are said to have been commanded by a general named Sancho; but as we find nothing of this in authors of indubitable authority, we say nothing of him in the text. There seems to be as little regard due to the fine speeches of king Roderic and the Moorish general Tarick, which, it is easy enough to discern, were framed on the model of ancient historians, and may perhaps be not elegant but useful in the general history of Spain, though quite without the compass of our plan (1). We will content ourselves, therefore, with observing, that the river, on the banks of which this fatal battle was fought, received its name from this very action, and that too not in the sense that some interpret it, as if Guadelete implied Rio del Olvido, or River of Oblivion; whereas the Arabians called it Guadel Ledet, which in Spanish is Rio del Delcete, that is, the River of Delight, in honour of the glory they acquired by deciding the fate of a kingdom in a single battle (2). This method of changing and imposing names was ever customary amongst the eastern nations, as appears from several passages in the Scriptures, and, like most of their customs, continues in use to this day. This remark shews us, how expedient, and even necessary, it is, to have recourse to the Arabic writers, in order thoroughly to understand the history of Spain (3). But then it requires a very nice judgment, and very great caution, to make a right use of what assistance they offer, since their affection for the marvellous leads them frequently into such excesses, as render it extremely difficult to distinguish how much or how little there is of truth in what they write. The same humour also prevails amongst many of the Spanish authors who have published histories of those times, of which we shall frequently have occasion to take notice, in the course of our subsequent sections.

a to which they might retire, nor any person of note with them to give the least directions in so dreadful a conjuncture. Such was this fatal battle, by which the monarchy of the Goths was intirely subverted; and though there seems to be very little or no dispute about the day, which was the eleventh of November, the festival of the popish saint Martin bishop of Tours, yet it is not easy to say whether it was in the year seven hundred and eleven<sup>p</sup>, or seven hundred and twelve<sup>q</sup>; the majority of writers declaring in favour of the latter, though the former is maintained to be the true date by the most judicious of the Spanish critics<sup>r</sup>.

SOME of the Spanish historians, and even Mariana, ascribe this defeat in a great measure to the treachery of the two princes, sons to Wiliza, who, by the advice of their uncle Oppas, metropolitan of Seville, went over to the Moors in the heat of the action, and charged with them upon the flanks of their countrymen; but as this is not mentioned by any ancient author, it cannot be depended upon<sup>s</sup>. As for the king Roderic, he made his escape, and, as many writers say, retired first to a convent near Merida, and from thence, with a monk whose name was Romanus, to a hermitage not far from the city of Viseo in Portugal, where it is reported he lived some time, and then died in obscurity<sup>t</sup>. King Alphonso the Great assures us, that in his time the tomb of this unfortunate monarch was discovered in a church in that neighbourhood, but, as Ferreras justly observes, it is much more probable, that, being wounded in the battle, he fled thither with the utmost expedition, and died quickly after of fatigue, of his wounds, or of despair, because it is not easy to conceive how he should continue for any space of time, much less for two or three years, undiscovered, in a country over-run by the enemy; or that a prince, so personally brave as all historians report him to have been, should abandon his subjects to the rage of such barbarous enemies, without making the least attempt to assemble, in some distant part of his dominions, another army, that might have done something towards their deliverance<sup>u</sup>. The danger of leading that retired life was not at all less; and the glory of aiming at the relief of his subjects, whatever the consequences might have been, would have done more honour to his memory than those legendary stories that have been published of his severe penance in the place which he chose for his retreat<sup>v</sup>. As a king, it was his duty to have exposed himself for the sake of his people; and, as the fate of war is uncertain, he might at least have saved a part of his dominions, and have left the recovery of the rest to his successors; whereas, by this abdication, supposing the fact true, he deprived the nation of the Visigoths of all appearance of government, which was no less fatal in its consequences than the battle he had lost.

Various reports concerning the time and place of Roderic's demise.

THE Moorish general Taric, as soon as he perceived that he was not only master of the field of battle, and the enemy intirely defeated, but that there was not so much as the appearance of an army in the field, and that the inhabitants of all the adjacent cities and country were in the utmost distraction and consternation, resolved, like an experienced general, to leave them no time to recover their spirits, but immediately attacked and reduced Seville, Cordova, and other cities that were in no condition to make resistance. That this universal terror might not abate, he suffered his army to commit the most horrid outrages, without restriction or punishment, so that persons of all ranks, sexes, and ages, fell by the sword, unarmed, and without the least provocation; which had the effect he foresaw, and filled the people every-where with such amazement and fright, that they lost all power of resistance, and submitted to whatever terms he thought fit to prescribe<sup>x</sup>. After making the best provision he could for the security of the country he had conquered, he sent an exact account of all that had passed to Muza, under whose authority, and by whose orders, he had undertaken and executed this fortunate expedition. He shewed that general, at the same time that he informed him that the king had disappeared, that the people were so terrified as not to think of a new election; and that this, of all others, seemed the most proper time for making a complete conquest: that it was necessary for him to come over in person; that he should bring with him a competent supply of troops; and that, before the Goths had time to recollect themselves, he might then be able to penetrate even to the most distant provinces of the kingdom; whereas the troops under his command were but barely sufficient to garrison the towns, and protect the country he had already conquered, so that it was impossible for him to improve this important and decisive victory any farther<sup>y</sup> (N).

The Moors invite Muza into Spain, in order to complete their conquest.

(N) According to Mariana, and some other historians, great numbers of the flying army of the Goths took shelter in Ecija, not far from the field of battle, where they endeavoured to fortify themselves as well as they could, but were attacked before they were in any state of defence, so that they had no resource but that of their courage, or rather that of their despair, which taught them to sell their lives dear, but subjected the inhabitants

Plan laid for carrying this great design
into execution.

THERE wanted not many arguments to convince Muza of the expediency of his passage <sup>a</sup> into Spain, neither was he at all retarded in his expedition through the want of those supplies that Tarick had demanded: for, having caused a report to be spread through Afric of the immense wealth of the Spaniards, and that the plunder of every place that made the least resistance was given to the soldiers, his army was quickly completed, so that it was much more difficult to find shipping to embark them, than men who were ready to embark <sup>2</sup>. On his arrival in Spain with this multitude, which were all landed at or in the neighbourhood of Gibraltar, he held a council of war, at which Tarick and all the general officers under him assisted; and in this council it was resolved, that, as nothing more was to be apprehended from the Goths, whose intestine feuds survived their government, and prevented any stop from being put to that conflagration which it had kindled, the wisest measure that could be pursued, as they had <sup>b</sup> a competent force, was to embrace the conquest of this great country at once <sup>3</sup>. In order to this, Muza divided his forces into three armies; the first, commanded by his son Abdalahiz, had orders to conquer all the country lying on the Mediterranean; another general was charged with the like commission in respect to the provinces lying upon the ocean; but the largest of the three corps, under Muza himself, with whom Tarick went as his lieutenant-general, undertook the reducing the midland countries; and this plan of conquest, being once settled, was immediately carried into execution <sup>b</sup>; to facilitate which, it was resolved that good terms should be given, or at least promised, to every place that submitted; and that, where-ever they met with any resistance, all should be left to the discretion of the soldiers, or, in other words, the effects of the inhabitants given up to be pillaged, and their persons to slaughter <sup>c</sup> without mercy.

In what manner and in what space of time this was effected.

MUZA, with the main army under his command, advanced without any resistance as far as Merida, which being a place of some strength, the inhabitants stood upon their defence; but at length judged it best to surrender, on promise that they should be permitted the free exercise of their religion, and live under their own laws <sup>c</sup>. The general of the Moors then advanced with his victorious forces towards the capital, and in a short time after appeared before Toledo. Sindered, metropolitan of that city, had retired before this time to Rome, abandoning his flock to their misfortunes. Many of the ecclesiastics had likewise withdrawn with the treasure of their respective churches into the mountains of Leon and Old Castile, where they were covered and protected by those who preferred liberty in a desert to the finest <sup>d</sup> country where that was wanting <sup>d</sup>. The great lords of the court, who had done so little either for themselves or for their country, were desirous of making their escape before the place was invested. Oppas, metropolitan of Seville, who accompanied Muza, pursued them with a body of Moorish cavalry, and, coming up with them, cut them off, in revenge for the dislike they had shewn to his family <sup>e</sup>. The people, delivered from these incumbrances, defended themselves with great resolution, and surrendered at last upon honourable terms; in which, amongst other things, it was stipulated, that seven of their churches should remain to the use of the Christians, and that the people should be governed by their own laws. In the course of this capitulation, there was some mention made of the security the inhabitants might expect for the due performance of articles; upon which those who treated for the town <sup>e</sup> declared, that they did not expect or desire any other security than the faith of Muza; by which it is certain there were no sufferers; and from hence Ferreras thinks they were stiled Muzarabians, or Mozarabians, though as to this there are very different reasons given by some of the most learned amongst the Spanish antiquaries <sup>f</sup> (O).

What happened in the course of their over-running Portugal.

WHILE Muza was thus employed, he sent a strong detachment, under the command of a general officer, into that country which is now called Portugal, where the towns of Egitania and Osonoba, having made some resistance, were plundered and demolished; which so terrified ants to be also put to the sword, and the place, when taken, to be first plundered, and then ruined (4). Some say, that the project of making an intire conquest of Spain, by employing different armies in different provinces at once, that the consternation might be general, and the Goths no-where have leisure enough left them to recollect themselves, so as to provide for their own defence, was given to Tarick by count Julian; and that one Magued, a renegado, had a considerable post in the army, and procured several places, by means of secret intelligence and bribes, to be put into the hands of the Moors (5).

(O) These adjectives, Mozarabian and Mozarabic, occur so frequently in all the Spanish histories, that we need not wonder authors differ about their origin and signification. The derivation given in the text is from Ferreras, and as probable as any. The famous Mozarabic liturgy, said to be revised at least, if not composed in part, by St. Isidore of Seville, is so called from its having been in use among the Christians who remained at Toledo, and remains a notable proof of the true sentiments of the old Spanish church. There is also a chapel in the cathedral of that city, distinguished by the same title, and for the same reason.

a the inhabitants of Evora, Lisbon, Viseo, and Lamego, that each of them submitted upon the best capitulation that could be obtained: but the people of Coimbra, or Conimbra, making an obstinate defence, that city was almost intirely destroyed. Some Arabian historians, who are followed by many Spanish writers, place the reduction of Merida here, and enter into a long detail of the siege, which, to lessen the horrors of so melancholy a story, they have decorated with some marvellous circumstances <sup>s</sup> (P). After all these conquests, Muza thought it proper to give his troops some repose, that he might have leisure to provide for the civil government of his new subjects, of whom at present no higher tributes were demanded than they had paid to their own monarchs. But let us now say somewhat of what was performed by the other generals, who did their business as effectually <sup>n</sup>.

THE next year Muza with his army entered early into the field, and seems to have di- <sup>Muza pro-</sup> <sup>ceeds to the re-</sup> <sup>duction of the</sup> <sup>inland parts of</sup> <sup>the kingdom.</sup> <sup>vided his forces in two columns; for it appears, that, while he marched with one part of them to form the siege of Saragossa, the rest entered into Old Castile and Leon, where it is probable they met with more than ordinary resistance; since they dismantled and destroyed almost all the cities and towns in those countries, to the very foot of the mountains <sup>l</sup>. Abdalaziz, on his side, brought, partly by force, and partly by persuasion, the provinces on the coast of the Mediterranean under his subjection, as far as Tarragona, a city in those days strong, rich, and very populous, the inhabitants of which defended themselves, for some time, with great courage; but at length, perceiving that on one side they had nothing to expect but utter destruction, and that there was no kind of succour to be looked for on the other, they made their peace on the best terms possible, which left the young Moor at leisure to carry his victorious arms throughout Catalonia, to the foot of the Pyrenees. By this means the reader will perceive, that the poor remains of the Goths were shut up in the mountains of Asturias, Burgos, and Biscay, where they were not easily to be forced. As for the inhabitants of Arragon, Catalonia, and Navarre, who, in conjunction with them, might have made a considerable stand against the common enemy, they chose, for the most part, to retire into France, better pleased to enjoy quiet in a foreign country, than to live in a miserable or precarious state in their own <sup>m</sup>.</sup>

(P) Amongst the circumstances of this siege of Merida, which are recorded by some historians, the principal are these (6). There was, it seems, in the neighbourhood of this city, a very large quarry, and the roads leading to and from it were very broad and deep. Muza had intelligence that the besieged intended to make a general sally on that side, which induced him to order a very strong detachment of cavalry to take possession of these hollow roads in which they were concealed, and to charge the enemy in the rear as soon as their situation gave them an opportunity. In consequence of these instructions, this sally, though managed with great prudence, and supported with much intrepidity, proved very fatal to the besieged, who lost the best part of their bravest men. Being compelled to treat, though Muza rejected their propositions with contempt, they continued notwithstanding to make an obstinate defence, upon the report of their deputies, that the Moorish general was of a great age and very infirm, in hopes that his death might occasion the raising of the siege. But Muza, being informed of this, encouraged them to renew their negotiation, and, before he gave audience to their deputies, caused his beard and his eye-brows to be painted black: on which they reported to their fellow-citizens, that the Saracen general was grown young again, and that it was to no purpose to resist a man who had even nature at his command. At their persuasion, therefore, the inhabitants submitted, upon such terms as he thought fit to prescribe, though, amongst others, this was one; that they should deliver up to him all the gold and silver in their churches. But in all this there is such an air of fable as renders it very justly suspected, which was the reason we did not give it a place in the text.

(6) Rasis, Vargas, Mariana.

His difference with Tarick obliges them
both to quit
Spain.

As the business of war was now over, and the inhabitants of Spain had their spirits so a weakened and broke, that they seemed to have lost equally the will and the power to revolt, Muza found himself obliged to yield obedience to the khalif Walid's order, which required him to repair immediately to Damascus, to answer such demands as the emperor had to make. This was drawn upon him by the misunderstanding that arose between him and Tarick, almost as soon as he set his foot in Spain; for that general attributed all the success they had met with to his own abilities and good fortune, and could not bear with patience that Muza, with his superior title, should run away with the reward <sup>n</sup>. On the other hand, Muza having amassed, in this and in his other conquests, a prodigious treasure, and having the most considerable officers of the army at his devotion, behaved in Spain rather as a sovereign prince than as the lieutenant of the khalif, and more especially towards Tarick, with whom he professed himself displeased, b and would have made him very willingly feel the weight of his resentment. When he came to depart, he caused a vast quantity of precious stones, rich plate, and other valuable effects, together with the most beautiful slaves of both sexes, to be put on board his fleet for the khalif's use: he carried likewise Tarick with him, and prince Theodomir, that he might hinder the former from doing mischief in Spain, and procure for the latter the ratification of that treaty which he had made with his son, being extremely pleased with the noble frankness and great candour of that worthy person. On their arrival at the court of the khalif, Muza, after all his services, found but a very indifferent reception; but Theodomir obtained all that he sought, and was treated with the utmost respect and kindness by the khalif Walid as long as he lived, and had the like attention shown him after his decease by his brother Zuliman, or Soly- c man, who succeeded him in the khalifat <sup>o</sup>.

The government, upon this, devolves on Abdalaziz, son to Muza.

THE government of Spain remained all this time in the hands of Abdalaziz, whose authority was confirmed by the khalif Zuliman, and from him it is supposed that he received orders to make an actual survey of the whole kingdom, that the administration of justice might be put into a regular method, the revenue more easily collected, and the value of this important conquest be with more certainty known. At least in this all historians agree, that Abdalaziz undertook to have such a description made, and this under his own inspection, which obliged him to enter on a tour through most of the provinces of the kingdom; in which it is asserted, that if he was assiduous in doing the khalif's business, he was not negligent in his own <sup>p</sup>. He made himself, by this means, perfectly acquainted with the true state of things, and the condition the people were in, their laws, customs, and tributes, which he regulated at his pleasure; and, from whatever motive it proceeded, he was certainly very gracious and very kind to the inhabitants, to whom he made magnificent promises, and upon whom he bestowed many favours. The Moorish officers and governors of great cities had orders to cleanse and repair them, new fortresses were erected in proper places, and the necessary orders issued for restoring a free intercourse between the several provinces, that the people in general might enjoy the blessings of peace, and have reason to be pleased with his mild administration; methods that there is little reason to doubt produced, at least in a great measure, the desired effect <sup>q</sup> (Q).

He forms a design of rendering himself independent.

BUT, with all this prudence, oeconomy, and moderation, Abdalaziz had his foibles as well c as other men; he loved to acquire money, as a thing necessary to support that magnificence in which he lived; he had a strong passion for the fair sex, and was not without a tincture of ambition, which even the high post that he possessed could not satisfy to the full: with all his failings, he was a person of great abilities, and had address enough not only to cover his vices, but also to render them useful to his secret and important designs <sup>r</sup>. Amongst the ladies that were brought into his seraglio was Egilona, the widow of king Roderic, for whom he had a peculiar tenderness, and treated her with all imaginable marks of deference and respect. He fixed upon Seville for the seat of his government; and, after he returned

(Q) It must have been under this government, if what the Spanish historians write from the tradition of their ancestors be true, that count Julian met with the just reward of his treason against his country (7). For, the war being over, and his intrigues no longer of any service, his advice was treated with contempt; and, upon his shewing some resentment of what he took to be ill usage, they threw him into a dungeon, and confiscated his large estates. There he had leisure to make a true estimate of his own ill conduct, as participating in his person and fortune in that universal scene of tyrannical oppression he had been so instrumental in bringing upon his own nation, through the resentment of an injury in which that nation had not the least share. In these melancholy circumstances, with little ease of body, and less of mind, he wore out his miserable life, as much despised by the Moors, as he was hated and abhorred by the Goths.

(7) Luc. Ludens. Roderic Tolet, Vasai Chron. Marian.

a thither from the progress he had made, it is said that he espoused Egilona, and, under pretence of her former quality, caused her to be treated with all the marks of duty and submission that could have been paid her if she had still been a queen. She was a princess of exquisite beauty, majestic presence, and of a high spirit, though accompanied with an affability and easiness of deportment which gained her a great ascendancy over all who approached her. It was suspected that she inspired him with an inclination to render himself independent; and some writers go so far as to assert, that, at her persuasion, he in private assumed the diadem, and took, though with all the secrecy imaginable, the most effectual measures he was able to pave the way to absolute sovereignty <sup>s</sup>.

b This scheme, though managed with the utmost dexterity, could not be carried on without creating some suspicions. The principal officers among the Moors, who envied his greatness, and thought he kept them at too great a distance, began to have a strict eye on all the motions of Abdalaziz, and at length penetrated, or at least pretended to penetrate, into his scheme of revolting; in which, as they did not perceive that they were any-ways to find their account, they resolved to prevent him. For that purpose, they formed a project of assassinating him, as the only method that could effectually answer their intent, his credit with the army being so great, and his influence over the people being so strong, as left them nothing to hope, if their conspiracy was detected, and themselves compelled to have recourse to arms. This resolution once fixed, they only waited for a favourable opportunity to strike their blow; and it was not long before they met with an occasion every way suitable to their wish <sup>t</sup>.

*The Moors
speak this,
and enter into a conspiracy

c It was necessary for Abdalaziz, in order to preserve the affection of the Moors, to maintain a great shew of zeal for the Mohammedan religion; and therefore he went regularly at the proper hour to make his prayer at a certain mosque, which gave Ayud, an antient general, who was at the head of this plot, an opportunity of observing that he went thither one day almost alone; of which having given notice to the rest of the conspirators, they presently repaired thither, and, while he was occupied with his devotion, surrounded and dispatched him with their daggers <sup>u</sup>. They had no sooner perpetrated this fact, than they caused public proclamation to be made, that he was a traitor to the khalif, and that they had put him to death only to prevent the design he had formed of usurping Spain, to the prejudice of his master; and at the same time, to prevent the dreadful effects of anarchy in a state so lately settled, they declared Ayud governor pro interim, till the pleasure of their sovereign should be known <sup>v</sup>. This revolution was attended with little or no disorder; for the Moorish army, seeing this stroke abetted and approved by their principal officers, were silent; and as for the Goths and Spaniards, they conceived themselves very little interested in this change of masters. Ayud was a man of courage and experience, and, for the few months that he held the administration, behaved with vigilance and discretion; notwithstanding which, the Moorish governors, in many places, exercised great oppression, and acquired immense riches, in some measure at the expence of the khalif, whose revenues they embezzled, but chiefly by pillaging the Christians; being never at a loss in imputing crimes to such as, after the destruction of their country, were yet in possession of any thing that was worth taking from them <sup>x</sup>.

d THE reins of government were taken out of his hands by Alabor, upon whom the khalif bestowed that employment. He began immediately to look into the conduct of his predecessors; and having clearly distinguished the errors and iniquities that had been committed, he made the first essay of his authority in doing strict justice to the khalif and to the people. He fixed the seat of his government at Cordova, and from thence issued his orders for the principal officers to attend him. When he had them thus in his power, he laid open all their acts of fraud and oppression, caused strict restitution to be made to the Christians of what had been taken from them, and, when this was done, took what he could find towards reimbursing the khalif; and, where satisfaction could not be had, he caused the offenders to be publicly chastised with rods <sup>y</sup>. This inquisition once over, he ordered a general review of the army, and, under that pretence, assembled a great body of forces for an expedition which he had meditated for some time. He had received orders from the khalif Omar II. who succeeded his nephew Zuliman, to make himself master of all that the Goths had possessed in France; and the first intelligence the public had of this order was by his making an irruption into that country with the flower of the Moorish troops. He opened the campaign, after their usual manner, with wasting all the country before him with fire and sword, which spread such a terror amongst the inhabitants, that he reduced Elna, Carcassone, Ayde, Narbonne, Beziers, and Nimes, as soon as he came before them, and the rest of the province in the space of a few weeks <sup>a</sup>. There were two things that greatly facilitated this expedition; the first, that the people had not hitherto so far recovered of their consternation, as to vest in any of their nobility the supreme command; the second, that the Franks, who might have protected them, were so involved in their intestine disputes, that they were not at leisure to look after any body's affairs but their own <sup>a</sup>.

He completes the subversion
of the kingdom of the Visi-
goths.

As this expedition completed the conquest of the Moors, and left the Visigoths nothing of their antient monarchy but those rough and mountainous countries which nature had fortified against all invaders, the proper business of the section ends here: but, notwithstanding this, the judicious reader might very probably conclude we had handled this something imperfectly, if, after pursuing the history of the Visigoths established in Spain, from the time it became their seat of empire to the ruin of the monarchy, we should, to save ourselves the labour of a strict and troublesome enquiry, say nothing at the close, of that polity by which this glorious nation was ruled, during the space of almost 350 years that they remained in possession of such extensive dominions, and were justly respected as one of the greatest and most formidable powers in Europe <sup>b</sup>; the rather, because this enquiry will throw light upon the other Gothic constitutions, in demonstrating the means by which they conciliated dominion and liberty, secured independency in church and state, and, without weakening the power of the crown, maintained the authority and vigour of the laws, which protected the subject in the enjoyment of his property, and settled the privileges of all ranks and degrees of people, so as to hinder their clashing with each other, at least as far as could be expected from any frame of rule contrived by finite understanding. This, indeed, is a task incumbered with many difficulties; but which, from a close attention to facts, and the assistance of the candid reader's attention, we flatter ourselves, may be, in a good measure, overcome.

The religion of that nation
during their dominion in Spain.

In reference to religion, the Visigoths were Arians at the time they became masters of Spain, and so continued during the space of above 123 years; that is, till Reccared the Catholic, with the principal nobility of the nation, returned to the profession of the Christian faith at the third general council of Toledo. As the faith which they then embraced was that of the old Spanish church, which, under various difficulties and hardships, had constantly subsisted there amongst the natives in general, so it was in a great measure pure and uncorrupt, very little tinged with those innovations that had crept into other churches, and as near the primitive integrity as any that was then in being; and so it continued to the very time of its subversion, when, though the morals of the people were corrupted, yet the doctrines of their church were sound, at least if we may judge from the canons made in their councils, from their liturgy, and from the writings of those great luminaries of the Spanish church, whom they still honour with the titles of saints. It is true the Spanish ecclesiastical historians deliver, with great confidence, many things as facts, which are not very compatible with this account, and some that are directly inconsistent with it. But the reader will consider, that this is done to justify the present situation of things, and to prevent the Spanish nation from discerning, that, after the destruction of their church and state by the Moors, which constrained the poor remains of the Goths in the mountains to have closer communication with Rome than their ancestors had maintained, the doctrine and discipline of their church were gradually changed; for, notwithstanding this, even their latest and their ablest writers clearly acknowledge, that, through this whole period, the nation of the Visigoths were remarkable for their zealous attachment to the catholic faith. What that faith was we may certainly learn with much greater security from their own writers than from modern commentators; and upon this ground we maintain, that the Christian church here very much resembled that of our British ancestors before the coming of the monk Augustine from Rome, and was consequently free from all gross superstitions. A point of very high importance, and which deserves the most serious attention (R).

(R) In order to make this matter more perspicuous, it may be expedient to enter into a few particulars. The Spanish historians, for many ages past, speak very confidently of images as commonly in use in those times, and assign it as a cause why so many have been discovered or dug up in different places. But those who know what strange artifices have been practised in Spain, to give an air of antiquity to things of a very recent date, will not be much moved by this argument, which, at the very best, is conjectural only, and not conclusive

(1). On the other hand, amongst the canons made by near forty councils, the most piercing eyes of those who are patrons of image-worship, have not been able to produce a single passage that favours this opinion; and as the Spanish prelates were so ill-natured in this respect, when assembled in councils, so their antient doctors have been to the full as obstinate in their writings; and this, notwithstanding their subjects must have led them to have spoke in another stile, if their sentiments had been really such as some have represented them (2). - a As to the civil government, it was certainly an elective and limited monarchy; for though, at their first entrance into Spain, the succession seemed to be hereditary in the line of Euric, or Evoric, since the crown descended even to a child, yet this was with the assent of the nobility: so that they never quitted their right of election, which was natural and inherent to them in their military capacity, by which they became conquerors and lords of Spain<sup>c</sup>. In process of time this prerogative of election seems to have been confined to a kind of senate, or privy council of the nobility and prelates attending on the person of the king, and thence styled palatines, who might, it seems, be chosen, but could not be legally removed from that authority by the prince upon the throne<sup>d</sup>. By their assent also the king might associate another person with him in the government, who thenceforward was considered as the apparent successor, though, on the demise of a reigning prince, his title was again recognized, and sometimes, even after the solemnity of his coronation, confirmed in a general council, which was in fact an assembly of the states, where the palatines sat together with the prelates, and whose assent was necessary to the decrees or canons which were made in them<sup>e</sup> (S).

negative argument, indeed, is not of the weightiest sort; and therefore let us set it against the conjectural reason before-mentioned, which will bring the scale even. We may then urge against images the canons made against idolatry, penned in such very strong terms as would have recoiled upon themselves, if they had used images (3). This is a very persuasive argument, and must incline the negative scale not a little. To bring it quite down, let us observe, that, in one of their antient canons, we find these words, It is decreed that pictures ought not to be set up in churches; that what is worshipped and adored be not painted on walls (4). Can it be imagined, that those who were so cautious as not to admit pictures, should have a more favourable opinion of images? A candid enquirer will never believe this. It may not be amiss to add, that all the accounts of the statues set up by king Wamba are supported only by tradition; and if even that tradition were incontestable, it will not overturn what has been said; for they stood not in the church, but upon the city-walls, and are celebrated not by any canon, but by a poet. The praying to saints and angels is a doctrine under the very same circumstances, the lawfulness of which cannot be proved from the canons of the Spanish councils, or from the writings of their antient prelates. St. Isidore, bishop of Seville, in his Book of Sentences, has a chapter upon prayer, and another on the honour due to the saints; inviting topics surely to have declared his notions on this head, if they had been his notions (5). It is indeed true, that, in the printed Mozarabic liturgy, some saints are prayed to, and, among the rest, St. James; but this proves nothing, at least nothing more than this, that the prayer was not of St. Isidore's composing; because the legend of St. James of Compostella did not obtain credit in Spain till some centuries after his decease: so that though this may be an old prayer, and perhaps the first of its kind introduced into their liturgy, yet not so old as his time. Purgatory was also a doctrine unknown to this church. They did commemorate in their worship upwards of 50 saints, that is, holy men, of whose felicity in another life they had the strongest assurance; and, which is not a little strange, there is not a bishop of Rome amongst them: but they did not offer for souls departed, or intimate their belief that the prayers of the faithful could alter their condition. Yet, not to dissemble the truth, they did in some sense pray for the dead, but in a sense that clearly excludes purgatory. They believed that the souls of pious men were at rest from their labours, and had peace in the Lord; but that they could not enter into the joys of heaven till the general resurrection; and, for this reason, they prayed that God would speedily accomplish the number of his elect, that the souls of pious men departed might the sooner enter into the fruition of eternal happiness. That they gave the holy communion in both kinds, and that they styled the elements, after consecration, bread and wine, is evident from the canons of their councils, and their antient liturgies. We may affirm the like with regard to auricular confession, and several other things; but we content ourselves with referring the reader to a treatise in which these subjects are very candidly explained, and the truth of them as fully evinced (6).

(S) All the governments instituted amongst those warlike nations, by whom the dominions of the Roman empire were erected into kingdoms, had much resemblance one to another, though hardly any two of them were perfectly alike. It was impossible that a person, who had not military virtues and experience, should have the supreme command of a nation always in motion, and in the field; and, for this reason, their monarchs were elective (7). Among the Goths as well as the Franks, they at first had attention to certain great families, out of which they constantly chose their kings; which might be an act of great political prudence, as it confined the number of candidates, and did not leave that room for intrigue and faction which was afterwards found. In process of time this humour wore out in Spain, and the regal election came to have no other restriction than that the person chosen should be of the illustrious blood of the Goths (8). By degrees also this power of electing, under colour of the public good, was transferred, at least in respect to the laity, from the nobility in general to the great officers of the crown, or lords waiting upon the king in his palace. There is still an appearance of this in the empire, where it is not his dominions that constitutes an elector, but some great office in the emperor's household, which now, except upon some very particular occasion, is merely nominal, that intitles him to his lands, and to his voice in the election. In France they had their mayors of the palace, who, for a long time, set up and dethroned kings at their pleasure (9). In Poland they have the title of palatines at this day; but they have no power of excluding the rest of the nobility from the choice of a king; and the mischiefs to which such a constitution is liable are visible enough on every vacancy of the throne; which sufficiently demonstrates the wisdom of confining this great trust to a few. We have before mentioned, that, in the subscriptions still extant to the decrees of several councils, we may, in some measure, collect the offices to which this high privilege was annexed (1). Some historians also observe, that these great lords were admitted only into those councils, in which civil as well as religious concerns were to be brought under consideration; for where nothing was to be done but what regarded ecclesiastics, or ecclesiastical

The prerogative of the crown, though elective, very extensive.

THE prerogative, or royal power of the kings of the Visigoths, was very extensive and a considerable, notwithstanding they derived their title from election. They had an absolute power over the army, which they commanded in person, or intrusted with any officer of experience, as they thought proper. They called general councils, or assemblies of the states, at their pleasure; proposed, at the opening of the sessions, all points which they were to deliberate upon; and, at the close, gave a sanction to their proceedings, by subscribing their decrees. They stamped money with their own effigies, and settled its value. They bestowed all places of trust and profit; and they exercised, as we have fully proved, an ecclesiastical supremacy, which was not only submitted to by the clergy separately, but owned and acknowledged by them collectively in their provincial and general councils. They had also the power of making laws, as appears by that antient body of their laws, intituled, Fuero Juzgo, b which sometimes were revised, confirmed, and published, in their councils, or assemblies of the states <sup>f</sup>.

Of the administration of justice, and obedience paid to the laws.

THE administration of justice was provided for in every district of the kingdom, where the Conde, the bishop, and the Guardinga, or warden, seem to have had a conjunct authority, as in other Gothic governments; nay, such a reverence was paid to laws, that we see that king Recesvinto desired that judges might be appointed to decide between him and his subjects; and where princes exceeded their authority, or where, in compliance with their commands, any illegal acts were done, they were censured and declared void in the next council, and the best remedies applied that the wisdom of the nation could devise. By this a noble and generous spirit of freedom was kept up, which, without intrenching on the power of the king, a circumstance equally honourable and useful, secured the people from feeling any bad effects from it; so that as the dignity of the monarch procured duty and submission from his subjects, his sense of the importance of preserving their affections obliged him to a reciprocal reverence for the nobility and the whole nation <sup>e</sup>. This is not a notion taken up at pleasure, or from prepossession, and which we endeavour to impose upon the reader, but an observation resulting from facts, of which the reader himself must be sensible. The motive to our making this observation was to shew, that as this principle was, through the course of several reigns, the cause of happiness to the Visigoths, from that royal condescension which was the capital maxim of their wisest and best princes, yet it became, in the end, the source of their destruction. The mutual complaisance of Witiza, and the bulk of his subjects making an ill use of that amazing prosperity which a long peace, and a succession of wise administrations, d had poured upon them, and which corrupted both prince and people, and, opening the flood-gates of luxury, resolved all their wishes, and softened all their passions, into a love of ease and pleasure, were alike incompatible with the true principles of piety and public spirit, and brought along with them all those evils that are the constant attendants of a preposterous desire of being perfectly happy here, which is the never-failing prelude of extreme and universal misery <sup>h</sup>.

The great number of people, splendour, and wealth, of the Visigoths.

WE may with certainty infer, from the number of bishopricks, in the regulation settled by Wamba, from the numberless towns mentioned in the old historians, from the ruins of places of considerable extent, which yet appear, from the various other circumstances, and more especially from the concurrence of Christian and Mohammedan authors in their relations e of the state of things at the close of this period, that the Moors found Spain thoroughly peopled, excellently improved, full of cities, boroughs, and villages, and many of these adorned with fine structures, some of which, in spite of the injuries of time, and of barbarous enemies, are not wholly decayed. Now, though much might be due to the industry of the natives, to the frugality of their ancestors in former ages, and to other incidents, of which it may be we have received little notice, yet we can scarce conceive that this should be brought about without an extensive and beneficial commerce. For, first, this has rarely happened in any country; secondly, it is unnatural to believe it of this, which lay then the most convenient of any part of Europe for carrying on foreign trade; thirdly, and which is indeed the strongest argument of all, on account of the puissant naval force which f it is evident they had, and which never can be had where commerce does not flourish. This is so much the more apparent, as it is out of dispute that, even at the time they were undone, their fleet was superior to that of the Saracens, notwithstanding they found means to embark affairs, their presence was not either required or permitted. Pero como era concilio para solo cosas de la Fe, y no para negocios seglares, no intervino en el agano de los Paulatinos (2), says a very learned and judicious histo-

- a so many thousand men. It likewise merits attention, that their seamen kept up their courage to the last, which was owing to their active and hardy kind of life; so that if this had been attended to as it deserved, their enemies might have been prevented from undertaking and executing such an invasion. But their factions and domestic discontents prevented them at least from using, it may be hindered them from discerning where their remaining strength lay, and of what importance it was to their preservation. But this is clear and undeniable, that their victorious admiral Theodomir was the only nobleman in Spain that behaved in a becoming manner, and made any struggle worth recording in defence of his country; which justifies the foregoing observations, and, in the midst of this obscurity, furnishes us with a ray of light sufficient to discover, that great part of that immense wealth, which proved the bane of
- b this once warlike nation, and that so much enriched their plunderers, was derived from maritime traffick <sup>i</sup> (T).

In the writings of Isidorus Pacensis, whom some stile bishop of Beja, and others of Bada-joz, we have an ample and affecting detail of that dreadful devastation which the Moors every where committed at their first entrance into Spain, as if their business had not been to conquer and to possess, but to dissipate and destroy; so that as this section began with representing the grandeur of the monarchy, and proceeded to shew how the country was gradually improved, and its inhabitants rendered opulent, it ends with the subversion of the one, and the ruin of the other, leaving all things in a state of horror and confusion, till, out of this chaos, both the Christians and the Moors returning to their senses, began to form themselves into regular governments, and to bend all their endeavours, which succeeded, however, but slowly, to repairing and restoring what had been so suddenly and surprisngly reduced into a state of desolation, to which history scarce affords us a parallel <sup>k</sup>. The history of these changes of the revival of the Gothic power, the revolutions in the Moorish administration, the principalities established by the former, the kingdoms that grew out of the latter, their perpetual contentions, which, with various turns of fortune, sometimes flattered one nation, and sometimes the other, till, by the joint efforts of force and policy, and through the over-ruling disposition of Providence, the Christians recovered their ancient dominions, and, after a long series of years, many cruel battles, and a vast effusion of human blood, at length forced the Moors utterly to abandon Spain, will be the business of succeeding

d sections, in which it shall be our study to represent a variety of great events as clearly and as concisely as possible, and at the same time with candour and impartiality, that this part of the Modern History, than which there is none more instructive or more pleasant, may,

(T) It is an omission justly to be regretted, that the historians living in and nearest these times are so very succinct in all they say concerning the naval strength of the Goths; so that when we speak of it with any degree of confidence, many may be inclined to treat it as a mere conjecture; whereas, in reality, though we can state but very few facts; yet the deductions made from these are so plain and natural, and withal so certain, that whoever attends to the chain of reasoning cannot entertain any doubts about them. The Goths and Vandals were famous for their power at sea before they settled there. The former nation, if a Greek historian is to be believed, once covered the Mediterranean with 6000 ships, which, let them be of what size they would, was a very great naval force (3). The Vandals again had such a strength of shipping as enabled them to transport their whole nation into Africa, from whence they invaded Italy, in favour of Attilus, with a fleet of 3000 sail. These nations cannot be supposed to have lost their attention to, or their skill in, maritime affairs, in countries abounding with ports, and happily situated for the command of commerce and of the sea. On the contrary, though we seldom read of their fleets, yet whenever they are mentioned, we find them described as numerous and powerful (4). It was by being superior at sea, that the Visigoths established themselves on the coast of Mauritania, which they held long after the Saracens became powerful on that element, as well as at land, as appears from their struggles with the Greek emperors, and from the conquests they made in the Archipelago. Yet, before the conquest of Spain, we do not find that they ever defeated the Goths by sea; which is a direct testimony that they must have been very powerful on that element; and this necessarily implies their having a great number of ships and seamen in constant employ; which is a clear proof that they had a great trade, or otherwise how should they have employed them (5)? We cannot indeed suppose that their vessels were comparable, in any respect, to those now in use; but, notwithstanding this, there is good reason to believe, that the shipping of these times was far from being so despicable as some have imagined, since, in the first expedition made by the direction of Muza, we are expressly informed, that he embarked 100 horse and 400 foot on board three merchant-men, which must therefore have been ships of some burden: and it is farther observed, that he took this method of embarking them, that the Goths might conceive no umbrage upon his assembling armed vessels; which seems to imply that these were of a large size (6). That the naval power of the Goths, or rather of the Spaniards, was afterwards very inconsiderable, is no just exception to what has been said, because almost all the maritime coast of Spain was for a long time in the hands of the Moors, who kept them pent up in a mountainous inland country; by which no doubt they lost the spirit and skill of their ancestors in maritime affairs, and, as their fortunes mended, were to begin afresh in respect to things of this nature; and we very well know that all such beginnings must be weak, and the progress, generally speaking, uncertain and slow, more especially where their designs are opposed by potent neighbours.

as far as our abilities will permit, answer the reader's expectation, and shew him all the steps <sup>a</sup> by which so many kingdoms, partly by alliances, but chiefly by conquest, came to be united in the Spanish monarchy, which once threatened to extend its influence at least, if not its power, over the greatest part of Europe.

THIS period of the Spanish history, as the critics of that nation justly observe <sup>a</sup>, may, <sup>b</sup> with great reason, be styled perplexed; since, as many passages in the former sections remain, through want of proper information, not a little obscure, so in this the variation, confusion, and contradiction, visible in writers of different nations, opposite religions, flourishing in different ages, many of them plainly partial, none free from prejudices, and all of them prone to fable and superstition, account sufficiently for that embarrassment into which most who have treated this history have fallen <sup>b</sup>; and others, to avoid their misfortune, have tripped so lightly over it, that we can scarce discern any marks of their passage <sup>c</sup>. We will follow better guides, and, by separating the threads which hitherto, for the sake of conciseness, more especially in general histories, have been wrought up together, we will exhibit to the reader's view each of the Christian kingdoms in Spain, in the same order in which they <sup>c</sup> rose <sup>d</sup>; and referring whatever might perplex the narration to the notes, we hope to render our relation succinct, without prejudice to its perspicuity <sup>e</sup>.

We have, in the last section, shewn how such of the Christians in Spain, including under that general name the descendants of the ancient Spanish nations of the Romans and Suevians, as well as the Goths, who preferred liberty, and the unrestrained exercise of their religion, to the precarious possession of their properties of every kind, fled into the mountains, and, forgetting every other care, sought only to provide for their safety and freedom <sup>f</sup>. We have likewise shewn, as far as the difference of opinions would permit, who that Don Pelayo was, that, by the nobility of his birth, distinguished courage, and superior capacity, recommended himself, in this distressed state of things, to the choice of his countrymen, who, according <sup>d</sup> to their ancient constitution, elected him for their prince <sup>e</sup>; and, by that election, laid the foundation of a new government in a country so well fortified by nature, that it afforded them leisure to take those steps, which, if it had not done, the Christian power in Spain must have been absolutely suppressed, and that country have remained, perhaps, till this time in the hands of the Mohammedans. At what time, or in what manner, this election was made, the reader will easily perceive it is impossible we should fix with any degree of certainty (A). (A) There are some very learned writers who refuse the title of king to Don Pelayo (1), because they find no mention made of him by Isidore bishop of Badajoz, who is indeed the oldest and most authentic writer extant in relation to those times; but, notwithstanding this, such an exception is very unreasonable, for many reasons, but more especially because, in the first place, besides that work of the author which has been published, he wrote two others that are lost; one concerning the wars of the Mohammedans in Spain, and the other of his own times; and who can say what might be contained in them concerning this great man (2)? In the next place, he is as silent in relation to Don Favila, whose monument is still remaining in the church of Santa Cruz, and Alonso the Catholic, who succeeded him; so that if the objection taken from his silence will prove any thing, it will overturn all that the best writers in the next age have written; and we must believe that Don Alonso the Great was not acquainted with his own descent; that the Chronicle of Albayda, that of the monk of Silva, and the Annals of Compostella, hitherto regarded as unexceptionable vouchers, are full of nothing but falsehoods (3). But a certain ingenious writer, Don Joseph Pellicer, who maintains this notion, and who, with incredible learning and a great fund of good sense, had nevertheless a strange turn for paradoxes, supported another opinion still more singular; which was, that a historians, that it is highly probable this great event happened towards the close of the month of September, in the year of our Lord 718<sup>b</sup> (B)

THE news of this election was no sooner carried to Alabor, the Moorish governor-general of Spain, who, at this juncture, had taken up his winter-quarters in Gaul, than, foreseeing at once the consequences that must necessarily follow, if this new power had any time allowed for its establishment, he directed an army to be drawn out of the garrisons in Spain, and, as soon as the season would permit, caused a great part of his own to repass the mountains, giving the command of all these forces, which were very numerous, to Alchaman, a Moorish officer of great experience, and who had served in Spain from the beginning of the war<sup>i</sup>. On the other hand, Don Pelayo, perceiving clearly that the loss of a battle must be attended with the loss of all, exhorted his subjects first to address themselves to God for protection, and next to apply themselves with all imaginable precaution to defend their country against these implacable enemies to their faith and their freedom<sup>k</sup>. In order to do this more effectually, he distributed his troops, which were sufficiently numerous, every subject at man's estate being a soldier, along the sides of the precipices, with strict injunctions to conceal themselves with the greatest care, and not to give the enemy the least annoyance in their passage, but to reserve themselves for one great general effort, when he should be attacked by the Moors in his head quarters. These he placed in the cavern of Santa Maria de Cavadonga, on the side of a mountain prodigiously high, and overlooking a long valley edged with precipices on both sides, and into which there was no other passage than over the mountain Auseba<sup>l</sup>. Alchaman having provided his army with all necessaries, passed the Rio Buegna, and began to advance slowly through the vallies, taking with him the famous false prelate Don Oppas, at the head of a body of Gothic cavalry in the service of the Moors. At first they moved with great caution; but meeting with no resistance, they marched more briskly, till having traversed the mountain Auseba with some difficulty, they poured their numerous forces into the valley, where they had very soon intelligence that they were not far from Don Pelayo<sup>m</sup>. Upon this, archbishop Oppas was sent to offer him terms. We will not trouble the reader with the speeches on both sides, though nothing can be more elegant than those inserted in his history by Mariana. For our purpose it is sufficient to say, that they were rejected with contempt; and that Don Pelayo declared plainly that he and his subjects would live or die free<sup>n</sup>.

Theodomir and Pelagius, or Pelayo, were the same person, in which he has been followed by father Orleans (4). Yet whoever considers attentively the exploits performed by the one, and the great actions done by the other, the times when, and the places where, they were done, will easily perceive that this notion cannot subsist.

(B) It is a point of some importance to have a right notion of the beginnings of Don Pelayo's kingdom, which, though we can no otherwise describe than by mentioning the provinces under their present names, yet we must at the same time remember that they were not circumscribed exactly then by the same bounds that they are now. We are told in all the Spanish histories, and very truly, that Don Pelayo was first acknowledged for a sovereign in the Asturias (5). Yet we cannot imagine that he became at first master of that whole country, nor ought we to believe that in process of time, and after he had gained many victories over the Moors, his territories extended no farther; neither of which are facts. But the place where he laid the foundation of his government was the little province of Litana, which is about nine leagues in length, and four in breadth, the most inland part of the country, full of mountains of most enormous height, and, in a word, a place so fortified by nature, that its inhabitants are at all times capable of resisting almost any number of invaders (6). It was from hence that, in process of time, under the special protection of God, and by the valour of his generous subjects, for he reigned over none but those who, despising both property and ease, preferred their own freedom, and the liberty of their posterity, like wise and good men, to all other considerations. By their assistance, then, he descended into the lower and better part of the country, where he made himself master of the strong town of Gijon, seated in a peninsula, which was his first capital, and from which he borrowed his original title of king of Gijon (7). Afterwards he became master of all the Asturias, which word is a plural in the Spanish language, because it is divided into two parts, Santillane and Oviedo; but the name common to both Asturias is taken from the river Astura, which runs by the walls, and bestows an appellation likewise on the city of Astorga (8). The inhabitants of this principality, which is always the title of the heir apparent to the crown of Spain, value themselves at this day on the purity of their blood; and some of the best families in that extensive monarchy acknowledge, or rather boast, themselves to have proceeded originally from that country (9); but the dominions of Pelayo stretched themselves east as well as west, and comprehended the best part of Biscay, or the antient Cantabria, from whence came his son-in-law Alonso the Catholic, and, as the reader will perceive in the text, comprehended gradually other countries likewise, in proportion as the success of his arms made room for multitudes of distressed Christians to come and settle under his protection (1).

The glorious victory obtained by the Christians at St.
Mária de Ca-
vadonga.
719.

THE preparations for a general attack were quickly made, and the Moors began the onset with great fury ; but by a miracle, as all the Spanish historians say, perhaps through the special providence of God in bringing this important point to be decided in such a place, the darts and javelins of the Moors rebounding from the rocks fell back upon themselves, which threw them into some confusion, out of which Don Pelayo did not suffer them to recover ; but persuading his troops that God fought for them, issued from his post with such impetuous valour, that the Mohammedans, unable to sustain the charge, began to recoil ; upon which the troops placed in ambuscade on each side of the valley rolled down the fragments of the rocks upon their heads ; and the slaughter ensuing upon this victory strewed the valley, where it was gained, with the dead bodies of 124,000 infidels °. Alchaman himself fell amongst the first, and Don Oppas, being taken prisoner, met with a death which would have been cruel, if he who suffered it had not been a traitor to his country. The poor remains of this army repassed the mountain Auseba as fast as they were able, and descending likewise the narrow passages of Amofa, entered the territory of Liebaná, and, beginning to coast the river Deva, thought themselves safe from the arms of the Christians ; but here they met with a new misfortune, which might be justly stiled miraculous ; for part of the mountain overlooking that river fell down upon them, and partly overwhelming, partly stopping the chanel, raised the waters so high that the rest were drowned †.

Don Pelayo's
second victory
over the Moors in the valley of Olalles.

THE news of this dreadful defeat being carried to Mumusa, who commanded the next Moorish garrison established at Gijon, he judged that the wisest step he could take was to march out with his forces, and endeavour to recover some post of greater strength ; but before he was able to do this, Don Pelayo, with his victorious army, fell upon him in the valley of Olalles, three leagues below the place where the city of Oviedo now stands, and cut the greatest part of these troops to pieces †. By this victory, and the right use he made of it, Don Pelayo cleared the Asturias effectually from all Moors, whom he did not reduce into a state of slavery, and established such a reputation as, during the remainder of his reign, served him instead of an army. He did not, however, as too many conquerors do, become either insolent or indolent in consequence of his victories ; on the contrary, he employed the leisure they procured him to great and glorious purposes : he built some towns in convenient places ; he restored others that were almost ruined ; he repaired many that were but inclining to decay, and founded and rebuilt churches in them all †. But if these are instances of his being a good prince, we shall produce an omission that will demonstrate his refined skill in policy : he walled none of his towns, he fortified no passes, he did not erect a castle throughout his dominions ; for he knew, that, while his people were brave, their country would be safe, and he was unwilling to pave the way for the loss of virtue, by providing for their security †.

The manner in which that great prince settled and improved his dominions.

THERE was indeed another circumstance that contributed not a little to the tranquility of his territories. The Moorish governors perceived the great risk they ran in leading numerous armies into so rough a country ; and being also satisfied that there was nothing to be got if it was conquered but rocks and mountains, a few homely hamlets and paultry villages, they thought it better to employ their arms against Gaul ; which humour continued, or rather was augmented, by the repeated checks they received in those attempts ; the providing for which obliged them to levy such heavy taxes in Spain as proved the cause of frequent insurrections †, and at length of civil wars among themselves. All these contributed to leave Don Pelayo in quiet ; and he improved this season so well in the restitution of the ancient government in all its branches, that great numbers of Christians retired privately out of the Moorish provinces, in order to put themselves under his protection ; by which his new towns were quickly peopled, and this too by persons of the better sort, because they were most exposed to hardships and ill usage from the vices, caprices, and misunderstandings, of the Moorish governors, who, as they knew they were not to remain long, were always in great haste to be rich †.

His family, death, and place of interment.

Don Pelayo also discovered great prudence in the settlement of his family. He had by his queen Gaudiosa two children, the prince Favila and the princess Ormifinda †. He procured the former to be associated with him in the government by the consent of the nobility, and gave the latter in marriage to Don Alonso, the son of Pedro duke of Cantabria, descended, as the Spanish writers affirm, from king Reccared †. However that matter may be (for indeed there ought to be no great weight laid upon their genealogies in these times), he is universally allowed to have been a person of great accomplishments, and to have merited the honour done him by Don Pelayo by his services both in peace and in war. That monarch having a attained to a good old age, and having governed the remains of the Christians in Spain, with uninterrupted prosperity, for nineteen years, deceased, as the Spanish writers say, September the 18th 737, and was buried in the church of Santa Olalla de Velana <sup>y</sup>, in the territory of Cangas, which was of his own foundation, and had the satisfaction of leaving his people in as happy and flourishing a condition as, the state considered in which he found them, he had any reason to expect or desire, leaving behind him a reputation that will last at least as long as that vast monarchy, the basis of which was laid by his valour and virtues <sup>z</sup> (C).

Don Favila, who had for some time shared the administration with his father, succeeded him without the least opposition, and held the reins of government but a very little time. He has a very different character given him by the Spanish historians, particularly Mariana <sup>b</sup> and Ferreras <sup>a</sup>. The former says he was a light, indolent, and luxurious prince, having no resemblance to Don Pelayo, and who kept his dominions through the ill management and inactivity of the Moors, rather than through any prudence or other great qualities of his own. The latter assures us, that his courage was great, and his conduct equal to it; that he was the worthy successor of his noble father; that he defended his dominions gallantly against the Moors, and governed his subjects with mildness and discretion. The plain truth of the matter is, that we have no just foundation either for these or for any other character of this prince; all we know of him is, that he lies buried in the church of Santa Cruz, in the territory of Cangas, of which he was founder, and where there is an old inscription remaining that tells posterity thus much; and farther, that his wife's name was Froleva, by whom he had several children <sup>c</sup>; but either they died before him, or Mariana was mistaken in saying that he left no issue. His end was very unfortunate; for, while he was hunting, a bear rushed upon him, and gave him a mortal wound, before any of his attendants could come up to his assistance. This melancholy event happened in the year of our Lord 739 <sup>e</sup>. His corpse was interred in the church before-mentioned; and the peasants have put up a cross on, or at least near, the place where he received his wound.

THE nobility, upon his demise, made choice of Don Alonso, the brother-in-law of the deceased monarch, and the son-in-law of Don Pelayo, a prince of an heroic spirit, and born to repair the losses of his country <sup>d</sup>. In the third year of his reign, perceiving that the Moors were extremely weakened by their civil wars, which had continued long, and were not like to cease in haste, he assembled an army, and, with his brother Froila, passed the mountains, and fell into the northern part of Galicia, where finding no considerable resistance, he carried all before him till he came to Lugo, where the infidels made some defence; notwithstanding which he soon made himself master of the place, and, in this single campaign, recovered the best part of Galicia <sup>e</sup>. The next year he fell with his army into the plains of Leon and Castile; and, before the Moors could assemble a force capable of looking him in the face, he reduced Astorgas, Leon, Saldagna, Montes De Oca, Amaya Alava, and all the country at the foot of the mountains; in which expedition his army amassed a prodigious booty. The year following he was in the field again, and pushed his conquests as far as the frontiers of the country now stiled Portugal; and, in his next campaign, he ravaged all the country as far as the mountains that separate the two Castiles <sup>f</sup>. If his activity and success in war procured him justly the title of a great captain, he had an equal claim to that of a consummate politician, from the manner in which he improved his victories.

(C) This restorer of the Christian monarchy in Spain was so eminent for his virtue, wisdom, and piety, that we find him stiled a saint by some very antient writers. Mariana speaks of his will, by which the succession was limited to his son in law Don Alonso, and his daughter Ormisinda, in case his son Don Favila died without issue; but for this he cites no antient author; and as it is directly contrary to the antient constitution of the Goths, which, as it appears clearly from the current of the history, still prevailed, we ought to regard it as a fiction. The French translator of Mariana censures him, however, unjustly, for asserting positively, that Don Alonso was the son of Don Pedro duke of Cantabria, as if he had advanced this of himself, and a little inconsiderately; yet, whatever becomes of the fact, our historian deserves no blame in that respect, because we find it in the chronicle of Alonso the Great, from whom it is derived to other historians. We may, however, collect, from the manner of his coming into the service of Don Pelayo, and the respect paid him, that he had been before at the head of a body of independent Spaniards in the mountains of Biscay, and united his territory and people to those under his father-in-law, who seems also much strengthened by this accession, since we find him from that time descending into the plain, and making excursions on one side into what was afterwards called the kingdom of Leon, and into the fruitful country of Galicia on the other. It may be these excursions were chiefly made under the command of Don Favila and Don Alonso; and that Don Pelayo, being old and infirm, reserved to himself chiefly the civil administration, and the care of reviving the antient form of government; for which reason he resided chiefly in the Asturias.

He greatly extends, and considerably improves, his dominions.

HE was sensible that he wanted strength sufficient to preserve the flat country, and therefore a he ruined and destroyed it, obliging all the Christians that were settled there to retire into his dominions, into which he carried many thousands of Moors, whom he made slaves; and leaving behind him a country unpeopled and destroyed, the harvest failed, and the infidels found enough to do to defend themselves against famine at home, without attempting to follow him into his dominions. But when he had availed himself sufficiently of these maxims, and found his country thoroughly peopled, and his subjects in a condition to occupy and defend part of the flat country which he had reduced, he suffered them to extend themselves pretty far into Galicia, and also to rebuild Leon, Astorga, and some other places; so that, at the time of his demise, he left his territories much extended, and his subjects in a far better state than at his accession to the throne<sup>b</sup>. He deceased in the year 757, and was buried near his queen Ormisinda, in the monastery of Santa Maria de Cangas, leaving behind him two sons by that princess, Don Froila and Don Bimarana, and a natural son by a Moorish woman, who, for that reason, was called Mauregato. This monarch, for his great zeal in building Christian churches and destroying mosques, obtained the surname of Catholic, which, from the time of Riccared, had not been used by any of his predecessors<sup>c</sup>.

His son Don Froila succeeds, and obliges the clergy to relinquish their wives.

THE nobility held themselves so much obliged to their late king, that they made no difficulty of raising his son Don Froila to the throne, who, at the beginning of his reign, is said to have distinguished himself by his zeal for religion, though his future conduct shewed that he had less of that than any of the three princes who had reigned before him. It seems he was scandalized at the thoughts of having any to serve in his churches but married clergymen; and therefore, whether with or without the consent of the bishops does not clearly appear, he compelled those who were married to separate from their wives, and forbid their entering into the state of matrimony for the future under severe penalties. This edict, Ferreras assures us, procured him the blessings of all honest people, and the hatred of the far greater part of the clergy<sup>d</sup>. But while he was thus employed, and perhaps because he was thus employed, the inhabitants of Alava and part of Navarre, which his father had subdued, took up arms; but he quickly reduced them, and punished the ringleaders. Among the prisoners he found a young lady exquisitely beautiful, whom Mariana calls Monina, and makes her the daughter of the duke of Aquitaine, which is not very agreeable to history; but other writers content themselves with commending her person, without acquainting us of her family or name<sup>e</sup> (D). This lady, whoever she was, the king married, and had by her Don Alonso, of whom we shall have much to say. About this time the disputes that had so long disturbed the Moors were composed, or rather removed, by Abderrabman's establishing himself as an independent monarch, and fixing the seat of his government at Cordova; which event could not but prove very prejudicial to the Christians.

plete victory
over the Moors at Pontumo.

THIS prince assumed the title of Almir Anumimin, which the Spaniards commonly, though corruptly, call Miramamolin, the sense of which is, commander of the faithful: a title implying his claim to the khalifat, or Mohammed's lieutenant, by which he pretended not only to the sole and absolute dominion over all the Mohammedans in Spain, but expected a like submission from the Christians, whom he considered only as rebels, that had hitherto maintained them- e selves in a state of independency, through the divisions that reigned amongst their masters<sup>m</sup>. He caused therefore a great army to assemble in that part of Portugal which was under his obedience; and having given the command of it to Haumar, directed him to reduce Don Froila; with which view he invaded his territories that lay nearest to him<sup>n</sup>. The Christian monarch had not been a supine spectator of the great military preparations amongst the infidels; on the contrary, he had drawn together the force of his dominions, and having suffered the enemy to advance into Galicia, as far as a place called Pontumo, he there attacked them with such vigour and judgment, that he gained a complete victory, killed 54,000 men upon the spot, and, having taken their general prisoner, caused him to be put to death<sup>o</sup>.

(D) When we find so accurate and cautious a writer as Ferreras telling us, that we ought to presume the king Don Froila took the advice of the few prelates then in his dominions, before he published his edict against married priests, we may be sure that, notwithstanding his general knowledge in the antiquities and history of this country, he could find no positive authority to support it. We have therefore a right to say, that the clergy of old in Spain had the legal authority of a king and general council in favour of their marriages; whereas they were deprived of that liberty by the arbitrary act of a tyrannical prince, who, in this instance, set up his will against the common voice of his subjects, as we shall presently prove.

- a butions after the defeat, in building the city of Oviedo, which he resolved to make the capital of his dominions, in order to be in a better condition to defend the flat country, which he now determined to people <sup>p</sup> (E). He there erected also a bishop's see, and covered the place, till it was in a state of defence, with such a force as prevented the Moors from giving him any disturbance. Abderrabman, in the mean time, turned his arms against those Moorish provinces that had revolted upon the defeat which his forces had received from the Christians, and in the course of several years, not without a great effusion of blood on both sides, reduced them at length under his obedience <sup>q</sup>. After this, having a numerous and victorious army under his command, he made an irruption in person, on the side of Castile, into the territories of Don Froila, who suffered him to advance till he began to enter the rough country, and then gave him so severe a check, that Abderrabman was inclined to conclude a truce with him, being thoroughly convinced that it was to no purpose to attempt the conquest of a country fortified by nature, and defended by a numerous and martial people. Upon the first appearance of this invasion, Don Froila had summoned the Galicians, amongst the rest of his subjects, to march to his assistance, which they neglected; and having now leisure to make them feel the weight of his resentment, he directed his march into that country, defeated and dispersed the rebels, and afterwards made so many and so severe examples, as not only frightened the inhabitants of that province, but raised an universal discontent amongst his subjects; so that nothing was more visible than that they obeyed him not through reverence or affection, but merely from fear <sup>r</sup>.
- b
- c AT his return to Oviedo, Don Froila could not help perceiving to how great a degree he had lost the hearts of his people; and as this increased the natural fierceness of his temper, so he could not help seeing with regret the different conduct of his brother Don Bimarano, and the universal spirit of affection which it produced. This by degrees raised such a tempest in his bosom, that, forgetting his own dignity, the ties of nature, and the dictates of religion, he went to the palace of that young prince, and, under pretence of conferring with him upon matters of importance, stabbed him to the heart with his dagger, and left him dead upon the place <sup>s</sup>. This unnatural and brutal act alarmed the nobility to such a degree, that, believing none could be safe under a prince of such a suspicious and sanguinary temper, they resolved, for their own security, to remove him out of the way; and, having concerted this design with the utmost secrecy, it was not long before they found an opportunity of executing it. As he had stabbed his brother, so some bold assassin stabbed him at a private audience, and the people, instead of avenging their sovereign, congratulated each other upon their being delivered from a blood-thirsty tyrant. Thus fell Don Froila, in the prime of his life, when he had held the reins of government somewhat more than eleven years, and was buried in the church of Oviedo, which he founded in the year of our Lord 768 <sup>t</sup>. All the Spanish historians agree that he was a prince of invincible courage, very zealous against the Mohammedans, and endowed with many excellent qualities; but Mariana goes beyond them much in extolling his piety; in proof of which he insists chiefly upon his inflexibility with regard to the married clergy, his severity in exterminating the Moors <sup>u</sup>, as far as it lay in his power, and his many religious foundations, which, with him, sufficiently excuses all his other failings, and even that spirit of cruelty and resentment which certainly could not be pleasing in the sight of God: for it rendered him universally odious amongst men, and, as we shall see hereafter, excited such an apprehension of a like disposition in his son, as hindered that prince, though, in reality, one of the best and most amiable of any that flourished in his time, from ascending the throne so soon as otherwise he might have done. It exposed the whole nation to those losses and inconveniences which are commonly the lot of people divided into factions, and who, in reality, pursue private interest under the plausible pretence of a zealous regard for the public good. This can never be so effectually secured as by a reciprocal affection between a legal sovereign and his subjects, the one zealous only of his people's happiness, and the other regarding from thence the glory and prosperity of the crown as an advantage accruing to themselves, from a persuasion that the extension of the royal authority must contribute to augment their felicity.

(E) It is generally believed that this city was raised upon the ruins of places known in the time of the Romans by the names of Ajlurum, Lucu, and Brigacium. to be no nearer related to him than being the son of his father's brother Iroila *. Some like- a wise say that he was at the head of the conspiracy, as to which others are silent. He appears to have been a prince either naturally of a mild and sweet temper, or prudent enough to take warning from his predecessor's misfortune. His first care was to renew the peace with the Miramamolín, in which he found no great difficulty, for this measure was as necessary to that monarch's affairs as to his own; and this once done, he addressed himself with great application to regulate the interior of his dominions *. But while he was thus employed, himself and b his subjects fell suddenly into the most imminent danger, from a cause that had never provoked so much as a suspicion. The Moorish slaves, with which their victories had furnished them in great numbers, and who had been hitherto very kindly treated, revolted all at once, and assembled together in arms. This rebellion had certainly been attended with fatal consequences, if it had been delayed till the martial temper of the Christians had been a little softened through prosperity and peace; but falling out at this time, when there was a perfect understanding between the sovereign and his subjects, they were quickly defeated and subdued;
so that it proved most fatal to themselves, as they were deprived by law of those indulgencies which hitherto they had enjoyed, and which they had so ungratefully abused *. This was the only remarkable event of the reign; for Don Aurelio having no children of his own, and his brother Don Bermudo having taken deacon's orders, the chief object he had in view was to pass his days quietly; in order to which he cast his eyes upon Silo, the wealthiest and most potent of the Gothic nobility, to whom he gave his cousin Adosinda in marriage, and admitted him to a large share in the administration, which had, though that seldom happens, the desired effect, and kept him free from disturbance during the remaining part of his reign. c
He breathed his last in the year of our Lord 774, in the seventh year of his reign, and was buried in the church of St. Martin's, about fifteen miles from Oviedo, which was of his own foundation †.

Don Silo

ACCORDING to his own plan, the late king was succeeded in the throne by Don Silo, who had married his relation. This prince is thought to have descended from the Moors, because of a remark in an old chronicle, that, on the score of his mother, the peace with the king of Cordova was without difficulty renewed †. He prosecuted the same scheme of government that had been introduced by Don Aurelio; while queen Adosinda, with a laudable vigilance, superintended the education of Don Alonso, her cousin, whom she regarded as a prince that ought one day to wear the crown, and whom she therefore endeavoured to render worthy d of it, by appointing him proper masters, and by giving him very good instructions herself *.
But while all was quiet at court, the Galicians, for what cause is not recorded, took up arms; upon which Don Silo marched against them with a numerous army, and though they had taken care to entrench themselves strongly on the top of a high mountain, yet he attacked and forced their camp, dissipated their army, made them put a few of their chiefs to death, and returned in triumph to Pravia, which he had made the capital of his dominions. He passed the remainder of his days in quiet, if we except some heresies that sprung up in the church, with which, notwithstanding the bad example of some bishops, the court remained uninfected. He founded the church of St. John de Pravia, in which, after having worn the crown for nine years, he was, at his decease, interred, in the beginning of the year 783, without leav- e ing any issue † (F).

Don Maure-gato, the bastard of Alonso the first, usurps the crown from his grandson.

ON the decease of her husband, queen Adosinda, with the consent of some of the principal nobility, caused her nephew Don Alonso, now in the 18th or 19th year of his age, to be declared king. But, notwithstanding the personal good qualities of that young prince, it very soon appeared that the people in general had an aversion to him, from the dread they were under that he might one day prove of the same disposition with his father; which was so artfully heightened by his uncle Mauregato, that, with very little difficulty, he supplanted him in the throne, Don Alonso himself declaring that he would never reign over an unwilling people;

(F) What we have said in the text of his place of residence and interment, is supported by good authorities, and yet the current of historians agree, that he built the splendid church of San Salvador in Oviedo; and that his tomb stands at the entrance near the great gate, with these three words inscribed thereupon, viz. Silo Princeps fecit, in so whimsical a manner, that it may be read two hundred and seventy ways. At the bottom of this tomb stand the following capitals, H. S. E. S. S.

S. T. L. which implies, Hic situs est Silo. Sit sibi terra levis; that is, Here Silo lies; let earth lie upon him light. It seems, as he made no figure in his life-time, he was desirous of distinguishing himself at his death by this tomb and inscription; and yet it is probable he changed his mind, and directed his corpse to be buried in the church of St. John at Pravia, which was likewise of his foundation.

a and retiring to his own estate in Biscay, the populace, who had rejected him for their king, insisted that he should be left there in safety and in peace; neither does it appear that his uncle, though he was not either a good man or a good king, ever attempted any thing to his prejudice, but rather wished he might prove his successor <sup>d</sup>. The new king, in support of his title, had brought an army of Moors into his country, and lived always in such intelligence with the Miramamolín, as rendered him suspected and despised by his subjects. Some historians assert, that he became tributary to him, and yielded the Miramamolín annually one hundred beautiful virgins for his seraglio, which, as it has very much the air of a fable, so the most judicious critics are of opinion that it was really such, and had no other foundation than his encouraging marriages between Moors and Christians, of which, if we consider his own birth, b we may easily discern the spring <sup>e</sup>. How much soever they disliked, his subjects were afraid to disobey him, because of his close alliance with the Miramamolín; and therefore he remained in quiet possession of the throne to the time of his decease, which was in the month of July, in the year of our Lord seven hundred eighty-eight, in the sixth year of his reign, much less regretted than any of his predecessors <sup>f</sup>.

UPON this vacancy of the throne, the nobility, who doubted what the consequence might have been of restoring Alonso, made choice of Don Bermudo, who, though he had received deacon's orders, was married, and had children <sup>g</sup>. It is however highly probable, that this step was taken with the approbation, it may be at the desire, of Don Alonso; for, as soon as Don Burmudo was seated on the throne, he sent for that prince, brought him into his councils, c and, when he saw the distaste of the people gradually subside, intrusted him with the command of the troops. It was not long before an occasion offered to shew the virtues of that young prince in a proper point of light. Issem, king of Cordova, either prompted by ambition, or displeased at finding in the new king much less complaisance than in his predecessor, invaded his territories with a numerous army of Moors, against whom Don Bermudo marched in person, accompanied by his cousin Don Alonso. The armies met at a town called Bureba, in the neighbourhood of Burgos; and an obstinate engagement ensued, in which at length the Christians were victorious, and the Moors defeated with great slaughter <sup>h</sup>. As the prince Don Alonso distinguished himself extremely upon this occasion, he was not only complimented at his return by the nobility, who were ever well inclined to him, but received with universal d acclamations by the people; which the king no sooner perceived, than he declared his resolution to abdicate in his favour; and, the nobility having approved this measure, he publicly resigned the crown; but his successor would never permit him to leave the palace, where he lived as a private man, but in the strictest friendship with the king Don Alonso, to the time of his death <sup>i</sup>.

Don Alonso, the second of that name, who, from the great purity of his life and manners, was surnamed El Casto, or the Chaste, was declared king by election, on the voluntary abdication of his predecessor, September the fourteenth, Anno Domini seven hundred ninety-one <sup>k</sup>, and in a short time after transferred the court to Oviedo, where he repaired and beautified the church which his father had founded, applying himself with great diligence to correct the errors that had in process of time crept into the government, and labouring to the utmost of his power to make his subjects of all ranks and conditions live quietly and happily, in a manner agreeable to their station. In the third year of his reign, Issem, king of Cordova, thinking his friendship neglected, and hoping that his veteran and victorious army might enable him to recover part at least of the flat country from the Christians, ordered a numerous army to assemble in Portugal, with instructions to march at a proper season of the year into the territories of Don Alonso <sup>l</sup>. Accordingly, under the command of Macheit, an experienced general, they entered Galicia, as they thought by surprise, because they met with no Christians to oppose them. But when they had reached Lodos, and found themselves entangled in a morass, they were quickly attacked by Don Alonso and his troops, who, by their perfect f knowlege of the ground, as well as by their superior valour, gained a complete victory, in which there were sixty thousand either killed upon the field of battle, or drowned or choaked in the bogs <sup>m</sup>, which gave such a damp to the spirit of the infidels, as prevented them from giving Don Alonso any trouble for severally ears afterwards, which enabled him to finish intirely those regulations which he had so happily begun, and which contributed not a little to the welfare and prosperity of his subjects.

His victory
over the Moors, and magnificent embassy to the emperor Charlemagne.

UPON the demise of Issem, king of Cordova, a new civil war breaking out among the Moors, the succession of his son Albacan being contested by his two uncles, Don Alonso did not let slip this favourable opportunity, but employed it in repeopling the city of Braga. While those he brought to inhabit it were occupied in rebuilding it, he made an incursion with his forces into the territory of the Moors, and, having beat their forces, advanced as far as Lisbon, which he took by storm, and then returned to Braga with a very rich booty, and a great multitude of slaves <sup>a</sup>. The very same year he sent a most splendid embassy to the emperor Charlemagne with very rich presents, amongst the rest a magnificent tent, eight mules very richly harnessed and adorned, and eight slaves, who were appointed to conduct them. The ambassadors were most honourably entertained, and the presents they brought very kindly received, the emperor promising to give their master upon all occasions marks of his esteem and confidence; which assurances were so much the more welcome, as this monarch had made great conquests upon the Moors, and was at that time master of several very important fortresses in Spain <sup>b</sup>. As a farther mark of his piety and generosity, Don Alonso erected, in the great church of Oviedo, a noble cross of gold, and thereupon inscribed the date of the year, which, as it is still remaining, is considered as a venerable monument of antiquity by such learned Spaniards as are addicted to that study <sup>c</sup>. Ferreras, amongst others, assures us, that he went thither on purpose to see it, and that he found the date of the Spanish æra to be D.CCC.XXXVI. though it had been otherwise reported by Morales <sup>d</sup>.

Alonso gains
another victory notwithstanding he is deposed
and imprisoned.

AN obstinate and bloody war breaking out between Lewis, king of Aquitain, son to the emperor Charlemagne, and the Moors, in which the former attacked Barcelona, which was not only gallantly defended, but a powerful army sent to its relief by Albacan, though without effect; to repair which disgrace, those forces, passing up the Ebro by Saragossa, fell suddenly into the dominions of Don Alonso, and committed great ravages in Biscay, and in the mountains of Burgos; upon this the king marched against them with a considerable army, and, having forced the Moors to a general engagement, obtained a complete victory; but as human prosperity is ever deceitful, so this gleam of good fortune proved but the prelude to an unexpected calamity <sup>e</sup>. There still remained in his dominions a large number of malecontents, who, upon this occasion, had taken arms, and made the greater part of the king's forces: these, immediately after the victory, turned upon their sovereign, and endeavoured to seize his person, in which, by their superiority to those who were well affected, they succeeded, and, having deposed the king, carried him to the monastery of Abelia, into which they thrust him as a prisoner. This account is indeed dark and perplexed, which must be excused, since there is no better to be had, because the Spanish historians are, of all others, the least inclined to perpetuate the memory of rebellions <sup>f</sup>.

Restored to his dominions, he becomes twice victorious over
the Moors.

THIS defection, however great, was not general; and though the rebels, by managing their design with great secrecy, and being first in arms, appeared very formidable, yet when those, who were loyal to their prince, came to recollect themselves, and saw plainly, that, though the people submitted to, they took no pleasure in, this revolution, it induced them to contrive in their own minds a new change of affairs. Amongst those who were in these honest and honourable sentiments <sup>e</sup>, was one Theudis, a man of great quality, whose numerous alliances created him a general influence over his relations and neighbours. He made use of this to persuade them that it would be no difficult thing to take the king out of the monastery where the rebels had placed him, and to set him again upon the throne. As they concurred upon the first motion, the thing was executed almost as soon as concerted; and the people rising in multitudes, as soon as they appeared in arms, they brought the king <sup>a</sup> out of the monastery, and carried him in triumph to Oviedo, where he resumed the regal dignity, and, by his clemency towards the conspirators, extinguished at once a faction that might have proved very troublesome, if he had treated them with severity. The war continuing between the French and the infidels, by sea as well as land, Don Alonso took occasion from thence to execute all the designs he had before formed in their utmost extent, by which his dominions were very much improved, and the force of the monarchy rendered much greater than at the time of his accession. But a peace being at length made between the two nations before-mentioned <sup>b</sup>, Albacan took that opportunity of raising a great army, which, under the command of Almatan, passed the Duero, and fell into the territories of Don Alonso, whose policy now suffered some alteration; for he no longer permitted the Moors to ravage a country which he had been at so much pains to people, but gave them battle as soon as possible, in which he gained a glorious and most important victory <sup>c</sup>. The very next year another army, under a the command of Omar, again entered his dominions, and were again beaten; upon which a truce ensued, which gave Don Alonso leisure to pursue his wife and pious designs for the securing his dominions, and gaining new advantages, to his subjects.

THE true design of this cessation, on the part of the infidels, was only to gain an opportunity of surprising the Christians, as appeared plainly by an irruption of theirs under the command of Abdalcari, in the year ensuing. After wasting the adjacent country, he formed the siege of Calborra, a place of great consequence, and of which he was in hopes of becoming master, before Don Alonso was in a condition to give him any disturbance; but in this he found himself mistaken; for the place made a vigorous defence, which gave the king sufficient time to march to its relief; and, upon this, Abdalcari, not caring to trust the issue of a battle, raised the siege and retired. All these repeated disappointments discouraged Albacan, king of Cordova, so much, that he remained quiet for several years. At length he resumed his design of recovering at least some part of the countries which had been taken from him. To facilitate this design, he divided his forces into two considerable armies, one under the command of Alabez, the other under that of Melic, both his near relations<sup>a</sup>. They entered Galicia by different routes, destroying the country without mercy. These disorders, however, did not last long, for the king, at the head of one army, and his cousin Don Ramiro, at the head of another, quickly gave a check to the infidels, and gained two signal victories<sup>b</sup> on the same day, which soon delivered that province from the fury of the infidels, and left the king at liberty to proceed in his care of civil and ecclesiastical concerns, and to provide for the cultivation and settlement of those districts which he had so gallantly and successfully defended.

A NEW civil war broke out amongst the Moors upon the death of Albacan, king of Cordova, and, amongst others who revolted from his son Abderrahman the second, was Mahamut<sup>c</sup>, governor of Merida, an officer of great valour and experience, who, having a numerous garrison, believed it possible for him to render himself independent. Abderrahman, either moved by the importance of the place, or desirous of making a particular example of Mahamut, marched against him immediately with a very formidable army, and, though he defended himself with great skill and courage, and sometimes also with considerable advantage, yet, perceiving his troops gradually diminish, and knowing that he had no resource if the place was once invested, he threw himself with all his adherents into the dominions of Don Alonso, and demanded his protection<sup>d</sup>; which that monarch, knowing him to be a brave man and an able officer, readily granted him, and appointed him and his troops to defend the frontiers of Portugal<sup>e</sup>, without taking any umbrage at their remaining Mohammedans. After he had acquitted himself with great honour for near seven years in the discharge of this trust, Mahamut set on foot some intrigues for reconciling himself to Abderrahman; suggesting, that, if he would furnish him with a sufficient number of troops, he would infallibly put into his hands the whole province of Galicia<sup>f</sup>. This proposal was too advantageous to be rejected; and the troops being furnished that he desired, Mahamut put himself at the head of them as well as his own, and marched directly to the castle of St. Christina, which is within a very small distance of Lugo, by which all the adjacent country was put under contribution.

A. D. 824.

ON the first news of so extraordinary an event, the king dispatched his orders to the prince Don Ramiro<sup>g</sup> to throw himself immediately into Lugo with all the troops under his command, which he accordingly performed. The king soon after this joined him with a much more considerable body of men; and, immediately after this junction was made, they marched with their whole army against the infidels<sup>h</sup>. Mahamut was much superior in number, made a fine disposition of his troops, and received the Christians with great firmness and intrepidity: but being slain<sup>i</sup> in the very beginning of the action, and his head presented on the point of a lance to the king, the infidels soon fell into confusion, so that in the battle, and in the pursuit, they lost fifty thousand men. The castle also was immediately surrendered, in which they found spoils to an immense value. The king was also victorious in some other engagements, which effectually quelled the spirit of the infidels. Don Alonso, finding himself weak and infirm through age, and the great fatigues he had endured, summoned an assembly of the states<sup>k</sup>, to whom he recommended his cousin Don Ramiro for his successor, and, upon his election, resigned to him the administration, when he had reigned, after his last accession to the throne, near forty-four years. He survived, after this, to the year of our Lord eight hundred forty two, and then expired<sup>l</sup>, at the age of seventy-seven, universally regretted by his subjects, and with the highest reputation of any monarch of his time.

Don Ramiro succeeds, in spite of an insurrection in favour of Nepotian.

A. D. 843.

At the time of the old monarch's decease, Don Ramiro was in the country of Alava, which afforded an opportunity to count Nepotian, an artful and ambitious nobleman<sup>m</sup>, to persuade several persons of high distinction, to whom he made large promises, that, with their assistance, he could maintain himself upon the throne, and thereby defeat the former election of Don Ramiro, and the late disposition in his favour by king Alonso. They, being seduced by his fair speeches, gave him the title of king, and raised an army with an intention to support his title; but Don Ramiro, as soon as he had intelligence of this defection, hastened into Galicia, and assembled a good body of forces at Lugo, and from thence marched towards the frontiers of the Asturias<sup>n</sup>. Count Nepotian, having, partly by money, partly by violence, drawn together a great number of troops in the neighbourhood of Oviedo, began to move very readily, in order to give the king battle, at as great a distance as might be from the capital. When the two armies were in sight, he quickly discerned how much he had deceived himself with respect to his interest in the army; for the troops deserted to Don Ramiro<sup>o</sup> in such numbers, that, seeing himself on the point of being abandoned, he placed all his hopes of safety in his flight; on which two of the great lords, who had been deepest in his treason, pursued, made him prisoner<sup>p</sup>, and brought him in that condition to the king, who ordered that, his eyes being first put out, he should be confined for life in a monastery; and thus, the rebellion being intirely crushed, Don Ramiro entered in triumph into Oviedo.

The Normans make a descent in the neighbourhood of Corunna, and are repulsed.

Don Ramiro found himself obliged to begin his reign<sup>q</sup> with some necessary acts of severity; for, on the one hand, the roads were disturbed by robbers, and, on the other, many in the villages, through an excessive superstition, abandoned themselves to sorcery. As to the former, as fast as they could be taken, he condemned them to lose their eyes; and the latter, as they fell into the hands of justice, were committed to the flames. These intestine troubles were succeeded by an unexpected foreign invasion. The Normans, who at that time infested all the maritime provinces of Europe, made a descent at Corunna, and began, according to their usual custom, to waste all the adjacent country with fire and sword. But Don Ramiro<sup>r</sup>, marching against them with a potent army, took his measures with so much prudence, that he routed these barbarous invaders with a prodigious slaughter, took great numbers of them prisoners, and burnt the best part of their fleet; which reception so frightened these barbarians, that, though they long troubled those parts of Spain that were under the dominion of the Moors, they never ventured to make any descent on the territories of Don Ramiro, which gained him great reputation and respect amongst his neighbours; yet this could not secure him quiet at home, where two great lords<sup>s</sup>, honoured with employments of high importance, and who had daily access to the king's person, formed a conspiracy against him, and, upon its being discovered, broke out into an open revolt. However, through the courage and conduct of the king, they were quickly reduced, the former being punished with the loss of his sight, and the latter, with his seven sons, all suffered death, not by the sole will and pleasure of the king, but by the solemn judgment of the states<sup>t</sup>.

845.

A glorious victory obtained over the Moors, concerning which there are many fables.

ABDERRAHMAN the second, king of Cordova, believing, or pretending to believe, that Don Ramiro had excited the Normans to those frequent descents on his dominions, having intelligence of the troubles that had broke out in the Asturias, invaded the dominions of Don Ramiro with his whole force<sup>u</sup>. The king, who had just vanquished his rebels, and had a numerous body of forces in the field, would not allow the enemy much time to make conquests, but, marching directly towards them, engaged and defeated them with prodigious effusion of blood. In this glorious action his brother Don Garcias, and his son Don Ordogno, were present, and distinguished themselves exceedingly, which gave the king an opportunity of recommending the latter<sup>v</sup> to the favour of the nobility, who, to reward his courage, and to give the king the highest proof of their affection and esteem, elected that young prince his coadjutor and successor. Ferreras<sup>x</sup> places the conspiracy of count Piniolo after this election, which he supposes to have been his chief motive; and, if this be admitted, it will account for that difference in punishment which this unhappy man and his family sustained, inasmuch as the king's clemency was now quite worn out. It was not long after this that Abderrahman<sup>y</sup> made another irruption into the territories of Don Ramiro, in which war that illustrious monarch gained the most signal victory in his whole reign, and this, as some modern historians<sup>z</sup> assert, in the plains of Clavijo, with the assistance of St. James, the great patron of Spain, who not only encouraged the king in a dream before the fight, but was also present on a white horse; and they likewise pretend, that the king made a vow upon this occasion, by which he charged all the lands in Spain with an annual tribute to the church of that apostle at Compostella; but wiser writers<sup>a</sup> of a that nation have not scrupled to acknowledge, that all this is mere romance, and that it may be proved so from those very charters and records to which the patrons of this tale refer us for the most authentic proofs of its veracity. The reader will excuse our omitting passages of this sort sometimes; but this was so remarkable, and has occasioned so many and so high disputes, that it would not have been pardonable to have passed it over in silence.

THE king, now far advanced in years, was attentive chiefly to his domestic concerns, establishing ecclesiastical and charitable foundations, conciliating thereby the affections of the clergy, nobility, and people, in order to pave the way for Don Ordogno's quiet possession of the kingdom, when, in the midst of these labours, death relieved him from his fatigues<sup>c</sup>, on the first of February, in the year of our Lord eight hundred and fifty. His body was interred in the church of Santa Maria in Oviedo, together with those of his queen Paterna and Urraca, and his brother Don Garcias, after having governed with great glory to himself, and no less advantage to his subjects, seven years complete, leaving them in a state of perfect tranquillity, as well as in a condition that left them little or nothing to fear from any of their neighbours. He had therefore just reason to expect, that, in gratitude for these services, as well as out of respect to his son's merit and their own late act, they would admit him to the peaceable enjoyment of the kingdom, though, from what had passed in his own reign, he was fully sensible that there was a very strong party who disliked hereditary succession, though it took place in consequence of an election, and who waited only for a favourable opportunity to set it aside, by placing one of their own faction upon the throne, in hopes such an example might bring in a new regulation.

Don Ordogno continued the administration of the regal dignity<sup>d</sup> after his father's death, in his own right, and the nobility seemed to be very well satisfied with his accession; some of them, however, excited the Gascons in the province of Alava to take up arms, and, which was still worse, to call in the Moors to their assistance. The king was no sooner informed that they were in motion, than he marched against them<sup>e</sup> with a small body of choice troops, and arriving sooner than they expected, easily defeated them. But when he was upon his march back to his capital, he had intelligence that the Moors, who had promised them their assistance, had entered the province, and were about to take possession of it; upon which he marched back with so much swiftness and secrecy, that, surprising them in their camp, he cut off great numbers, and forced the remainder to make a precipitate retreat<sup>f</sup>. At his return to Oviedo, he found that a new civil war was broke out in the kingdom of Cordova; and that Muza, an officer of great courage and experience, but of still greater ambition, had revolted, and was endeavouring to make himself an independent prince<sup>g</sup>. As this war was favourable to his interests, he, as a politician, took care to keep it alive, and sent also a considerable body of troops to the assistance of the people of Toledo, who had likewise taken up arms against Mahamut, king of Cordova, who, by a stratagem, drew them out of their city, and not only beat their forces, but also those sent by Don Ordogno, of whom there were eight thousand killed, and twelve thousand of the people of Toledo, which enabled the conqueror to raise several pillars of heads, as a triumphant though barbarous manner of celebrating his victory<sup>h</sup>; a cruel and indecent custom, practised long before amongst these people, and which in Africa is still in use.

THIS misfortune did not hinder Don Ordogno from continuing his assistance to the people of Toledo, who still persisted in their revolt; and while, by this method, he provided full employment for the Moors, he fortified the chief cities in his own dominions. He particularly walled those of Leon<sup>i</sup> and Astorga; and established an episcopal see in each. But while he was thus occupied in these cares, he received information that Athaulfo, bishop of Compostella, was guilty of a most heinous sin, equally contrary to his nature as a man, and to his duty as a Christian; and, without considering that this was charged on him only by slaves, he suffered his passion to rise so high on that prelate's appearing in his presence, that he turned loose upon him a bull which happened to be then baiting; but the beast, instead of destroying Athaulfo, approached him gently, and without doing him any hurt, which the king and the nobility about him looked upon as a certain proof of his innocence<sup>k</sup>. The bishop, however, took this imputation so heavily, that he quitted his charge, and spent the remaining part of a long life in a hermitage, as if, after such an escape, he thought it safer to pass his days amongst beasts than men. Soon after the king received intelligence, that Muza, whom we have before mentioned, who, though descended from the Goths, professed the Mohammedan religion, and had chosen Sargossa for his capital, had begun to fortify the town of Albayda<sup>l</sup>, upon the frontiers of king Ordogno's territories, with a view to cover himself from any incursions on that side;

but the king, who had given him no occasion for this precaution, took it in another light, believing that he meant thereby to have a door open to make incursions at his pleasure into the adjacent country. Don Ordogno, therefore, resolved to demolish this new fortress, and marched with a numerous army for that purpose; of which as soon as Muza had intelligence, he put himself in motion with all his forces, in order to cover the place<sup>m</sup>. This brought on a battle, which was obstinately fought; but in the end the king gained a complete victory, Garcia, the son-in-law of Muza, with ten thousand men, being killed upon the place, and Muza himself, being much wounded, narrowly escaped being made prisoner, to die of those wounds a few days after in Saragossa<sup>n</sup>. As for the fortress of Albayda, it submitted to the king, who dismantled it as he intended; but, for all these advantages, he saw, when it was too late, that the king of Cordova, without sharing at all in the danger, had gained more by the defeat of Muza than himself, most of the places which that rebel held having submitted to that king upon his death.

Gains several great advantages over the Moors, and acquires various conquests.

MAHAMUT king of Cordova, being thus delivered by one enemy from another, raised a formidable army, in order to reduce Toledo; and, notwithstanding they received some succours from Don Ordogno, yet, in consequence of a long blockade, they were forced to submit upon the best terms they could obtain, after Abenlope, who was at the head of the revolt, had deserted the place, with such as followed his fortunes<sup>o</sup>. In all probability Don Ordogno was hindered from supporting him, as he intended, by the appearance of the Normans upon the coasts of his dominions, which obliged him to send most of his forces to Don Pedro, who commanded in Galicia, and who was thereby enabled to defeat those plunderers, and to burn a part of their fleet<sup>p</sup>. Yet such was the resentment of the king of Cordova for the share his neighbour had taken in the defence of Toledo, that he sent one of his sons with a numerous army to invade his dominions, which however turned more to his prejudice than to that of the Christians, since Don Ordogno obliged them to retire with great loss<sup>q</sup>. The inhabitants of Toledo were no sooner informed of this, than they recalled Abenlope, and revolted again, with a settled resolution to shake off the yoke of the Moors; and, on the other side, Don Ordogno gave them repeated assurances of affording them better assistance than he had done heretofore<sup>r</sup>. He likewise intended to have succoured Merida, which, after the example of Toledo, had revolted against Mohammed; but that monarch was too quick for them, and, having reduced the place, built a citadel to restrain the inhabitants within the bounds of their duty in time to come. However, Don Ordogno took Salamanca and Coria, the former by storm, which he demolished, the latter by composition, and then returned into his own dominions with a prodigious booty, and a large number of slaves, which procured him a joyful reception by his subjects of all ranks<sup>s</sup>.

A. D. 862.

Takes this opportunity of procuring his son's election, and soon after dies.

THE king took advantage of this disposition in his people, and proposed the association of his son Don Alonso<sup>t</sup>, who had distinguished himself highly in these wars, and they came into it with a very good grace. It was not long before he had a farther opportunity of raising the prince's credit and his own; for the king of Cordova making an effort with the whole force of his dominions for the reduction of Toledo, Don Ordogno disappointed that design; and when, in revenge of this opposition, he invaded his dominions on the side of Portugal, he also defeated the forces of Mahamut in several actions, so that this war ended highly to his advantage<sup>u</sup>; and though some writers tell us, that a great fleet, equipped by the Moors, in order to make a descent upon Galicia, was dissipated and destroyed by tempests, yet an ancient chronicle<sup>v</sup>, written in those times, asserts, that they were beaten by the Christians; and therefore we have reason to believe that Don Ordogno not only extended his dominions upon the continent, but raised a maritime power likewise, which never had been attempted by his predecessors. Thus, covered with glory, and somewhat advanced in years, Don Ordogno, to the universal regret of his subjects, died of the gout<sup>w</sup>, with which he was much afflicted, May the seventeenth, in the year of our Lord eight hundred sixty six, and was buried in the royal sepulchre of the kings of Oviedo. With his reign ends the chronicle of his son Don Alonso, or, as he is commonly called, Don Alphonso the Great, a work which, in point of facts and of dates, we have hitherto chiefly followed, as that which in all respects deserved the greatest credit.

Don Alonso III surnamed the Great, succeeds, and is dethroned by Don Froila.

THE nobility, who had sworn allegiance to the prince Don Alonso, at the age of fourteen, received him now in his eighteenth year for their sovereign<sup>x</sup> with great alacrity; and the young monarch, who had not the least doubt of their fidelity, gave most of them personal marks of esteem and affection, so that all things seemed to wear the face of the most perfect harmony;

a yet on a sudden they had intelligence at Oviedo of the march of Don Froila, who was at the head of the army in Galicia, towards that capital, with an intent to dethrone the king. Some of the lords<sup>a</sup>, who were nearest his person, advised him to retire into Castile, as he had no troops about him to oppose the usurper, and offered, as an indubitable proof of their loyalty, to share in his disgrace. The young prince yielded to this, and it had a good effect; for the usurper, irritated at the cold reception he met with, began to act the tyrant, and behaved so ill towards those with whom he had been formerly familiar, that, by a conspiracy suddenly formed against him, he was assassinated in his palace, almost as soon as he had seated himself on the throne<sup>b</sup>. A. D. 862.

Don Alonso, as soon as he received the news of this event, returned with his friends to Oviedo, and was received with the general acclamations even of the usurper's army<sup>c</sup>. His first care was to put his dominions into a proper state of defence, and, with this view, he built, in the neighbourhood of the city of Leon, the castle of Sublancia, which is the place now called Sollanco, in order to cover the Asturias from the irruption of any enemies; at the same time he peopled the town of Cea, and built there a very strong citadel with the very same view<sup>d</sup>. While he was thus employed, he was informed of the revolt of count Eylon, in the province of Alava; upon which he marched thither with a numerous army; but, upon his approach, the rebels laid down their arms, threw the fault upon their chief, whom they brought prisoner to the king, who, granting them a general pardon, returned with his forces to Oviedo<sup>e</sup>; yet he was scarce arrived in his capital, before he received intelligence that they were in arms again; which obliged him to march into that province a second time, where having easily reduced these mutinous people, he was, notwithstanding the natural clemency of his nature, in a manner compelled to make some examples<sup>f</sup>, to prevent future disturbances, and that he might have leisure to pursue those important designs he had formed for the benefit of his subjects. He also, at his return to Oviedo, made a present of a noble shrine of silver to the cathedral church, for the more convenient holding of their relics, which is still preserved, and, by an inscription thereon, the time of his accession to the throne is clearly asserted<sup>g</sup>. 868.

As soon as Mahamut, king of Cordova, had intelligence of the great assiduity with which Don Alonso fortified the chief places on his frontier, and the methods he employed for keeping up a regular militia in every part of his territories, even in the time of peace, he concluded, that, as soon as these designs were achieved, he might be in danger from so active and so potent a neighbour, and therefore he held it policy to begin first, and to endeavour, while part of the country was still open, to make some impression upon the Christians. He had at that time a very numerous army on foot, to which notwithstanding he added some new levies; and, having divided the whole into two bodies<sup>h</sup>, gave the command of one to his brother Abulmundar, and the other to an officer of great reputation, whose name was Alcanatel, with instructions to penetrate into the dominions of Don Alonso at the same time, one on the side of Leon, and the other thro' Galicia<sup>i</sup>. The news of this double invasion reached the king's ears while he lay at no great distance from Leon, with a small army, but composed chiefly of troops that had served long under his father. He took his measures directly, and, marching with the utmost expedition to Leon, he attacked Abulmundar unexpectedly, and, after a short though very bloody dispute, defeated his forces<sup>k</sup> with great slaughter. He marched next against Alcanatel, over whom he obtained a more complete victory, the far greater part of his troops being killed on the field of battle or in the pursuit, his camp taken and plundered, and the poor remains of his army so thoroughly dissipated, that Don Alonso ravaged the provinces of Tierra de Campos, and the districts of Simencas, Toro, and Zamora, in all which he left not a Mohammedan, but carried into slavery all that he found there<sup>l</sup>. 869.

The very same year he espoused the celebrated Ximene, Ximena, or Chimene<sup>m</sup>, descended from the illustrious house of Navarre, and, in consequence of that marriage, entered into a league offensive and defensive against the Moors, which, as soon as the rejoicings for the marriage were over, was followed by another campaign, in which he wasted the territories of the infidels through a vast extent, brought away an incredible multitude of slaves, and a booty of immense value<sup>n</sup>. The winter he spent in his own territories, and in examining how far the designs which he had proposed for the benefit of his subjects were carried into execution. At the return of the spring he was again in motion: and, having passed the Duero, he advanced as far as Lamego and Viseo, and, finding them still in the same situation they had been left in by his predecessor Alonso the Catholic, continued his progress to Coimbra, which he took and dismantled. His victorious army having as much plunder as

D. 871. they were able to transport, and as many slaves as it was possible for them to bring away with safety, he returned to Oviedo, where he gave audience to the ambassadors of the king of Cordova, and granted them a truce<sup>o</sup> upon very advantageous terms. His next care was to restore and repopulate the cities of Aurensa in Galicia, and of Braga and Porto between the Duero and the Minho, dividing all the adjacent lands amongst those whom he sent thither. The following year he repaired Lamego and Viseo in the same manner; and upon this occasion it was that the tomb, in which lay the remains of Don Roderic, the last king of the Goths, was discovered. He caused likewise Coimbra, or Conimbra, to be re-edified in the same manner, directing it to be strongly fortified, as intending to make it his frontier on that side<sup>p</sup>. By this prudent method he secured the interior of his territory from the ravages of the infidels.

Defeats the Moorish armies employed to prevent his executing this design.

THE king of Cordova, as soon as the term for which he had concluded the truce was expired, renewed his hostilities, with an intent to disturb Don Alonso in his project of repopulating the flat country which he had subdued. But this was attended with no better success than in his former war, Don Alonso being constantly victorious in every action, and carrying his arms as far as the city of Merida<sup>q</sup>. The king of Cordova, having recruited his forces, and obtained some supplies from the most distant parts of his dominions, assembled a much better army than he had the year before, under the command of Abubalet, a very gallant officer, and of established reputation; but though it was in the power of this monarch to change his captains, it was not within the reach either of him or them to change the fortune of the war; for, coming to an engagement, on the frontiers, with some of Don Alonso's generals, who commanded his army in his absence, the Moors were defeated; and Abubalet, being taken prisoner, was sent to the king at Oviedo, who agreed with him for his ransom, and consented to take one of his sons, two brothers, and a nephew, as hostages for the payment of it<sup>r</sup>. This last defeat served only to enrage the king of Cordova, who, withdrawing most of the forces he had in Andalusia, and having promised great privileges to those districts who had furnished him with men, assembled early in the spring a greater army than he had the year before, which he put under the command of his son Almundar, joining, with him one of his oldest generals, whose name was Ybengamin, promising them great supplies, which should join them on their march<sup>s</sup>. These forces, having advanced into the neighbourhood of Leon, began to think it necessary to wait there for the reinforcements that were promised: but Don Alonso, having likewise intelligence of the march of those succours by the river Orbigo, marched with a strong detachment from his own army, and took possession of an eminence which overlooked the narrow country between the rivers Orbigo and Ezla, and, as soon as the succours, which consisted of about fourteen thousand men, had passed Polvoroso, he attacked them in front and on the flank with such success, that the greatest part of them were killed upon the spot, or drowned in the rivers, and the rest took the best measures they could to reach home in safety<sup>t</sup>. The victorious monarch, desiring to add one conquest to another, marched with all possible expedition to attack Almundar; but the young prince, having intelligence of his friend's defeat, decamped in the night, and with much speed and silence recovered his father's dominions, from whence he sent a polite message to Don Alonso to desire a truce, which, at his request, the king granted for three years<sup>u</sup>. At his return from this campaign, he set up a cross of gold, as the monument of his victory, in the cathedral church of Oviedo, as, the year before, he had sent a cross of the same metal to the church at Compostella, that his piety might not seem inferior to his courage<sup>v</sup>.

Supports the revolt of Abenlope Abdalla against the king of Cordova.

WHILE the truce subsisted, Abenlope Abdalla, the son of Muza, revolted from the king of Cordova, and found means to make himself master of Saragossa, in which his father had given that monarch so much trouble before, not without the participation of Don Alonso, who, as soon as the truce was expired, made an irruption into the territories of Mahamut, passed the Tagus, and afterwards the river Ana, not far from which he defeated the Moorish army, and killed, some say five, some say ten, others fifteen thousand men<sup>x</sup>. While he was thus employed abroad, the city of Oviedo, by his order, was walled and fortified, and a palace built for his reception at home, to which, after his glorious campaign, he returned in triumph. The next year the war continued hot between Mahamut and Abdalla. The latter had once broke his faith to Don Alonso, and attempted to reconcile himself to his old master; from whom he revolted again, and laboured to conclude a new treaty with Don Alonso, who was unwilling to trust him any more, and who, notwithstanding the Moorish prince Almundar had made an incursion into his country, sent Dulcidius, a priest, at the request of king Mahamut, to Cordova, where he negotiated a truce for six years<sup>y</sup>, upon terms equally honourable and advantageous for his master.

<sup>a</sup> THE king, now grown in years, was inclined to repose, and to spend the remainder of his days in embellishing and improving his dominions. With this view he sent instructions to Don Diego, count of Castile, to repair and fortify Burgos, which he performed so effectually, that it afterwards became the capital of that country <sup>2</sup>. The next object of Don Alonso's attention was to restore the sees of Braga, Porto, Lamego, Viseo, and Coimbra, in Portugal, and those of Orensa and Mundognedo in Galicia. He was not less provident with respect to the civil government, which he reduced into so good order, and gave the common people such marks of his attention and affection, as highly disoblige some of the nobility, who could by no means digest the limitation of that authority which hitherto they had executed without controul; and this seems to be the most probable cause of those seditions which disturbed and distressed the remaining part of this great monarch's reign, notwithstanding all that he had done, and all that he was willing to do, for the common benefit of his subjects <sup>3</sup>.

A. D. 884.

<sup>b</sup> THE first that broke out were in Galicia, where a great lord, whose name was Ano, had entered into some dark designs; which being discovered, he was punished by the confiscation of his estate <sup>4</sup>. Another nobleman, whose name was Hermegilde, by the assistance of his wife Iberia, a woman of an active and intriguing temper, raised great disturbances in the neighbourhood of Corunna; but the king, sending a formidable army into those parts, quickly dispersed them and their adherents; and the chiefs, being soon after taken, were put to death, and part of their estates given to the church of St. James <sup>5</sup>. The king, having now some respite from foreign wars and domestic disorders, completed his pious and charitable foundations, and particularly the pompous church of Saint James, which he caused to be consecrated with great solemnity <sup>6</sup>. Soon after a new rebellion broke out in Galicia, under one Witiza, more formidable than any of the former; which however was quickly suppressed, and that traitor sent prisoner to the king. This was followed by another, to which an end was put in the same manner; but of these there is no notice to be found in any history of those times; and they would have been totally unknown to posterity, but for the records of the convictions and confiscations that attended them, which records, however, ascertain the facts, and the times in which they happened, and may be of very great use, in case any more of the chronicles in cathedrals or convents should be made public.

<sup>c</sup> ALL the seditions and revolts that had hitherto happened in Galicia, were but trivial in comparison of that raised by Froila and his brethren, Nugnez, Veremond, and Odoair, whom Mariana <sup>7</sup> will have to be brothers also to the king; which is directly contrary to what is asserted by a contemporary historian <sup>8</sup>, who assures us, that Don Alphonso was the only son of Don Ordogno. However, it was quickly suppressed, and Froila and his brother fled towards Castile, but were overtaken by some of the king's troops, and brought back prisoners to Oviedo, where they were condemned to have their eyes put out, and to remain in a dungeon for life <sup>9</sup>. Veremond, however, soon after made his escape, took shelter in Astorga, and not only raised all that part of the country in his favour, but obtained also a body of troops from Abdalla, the grandson of Mahamut, king of Cordova. Don Alphonso pursued him in person, and invested the city of Astorga, which he defended obstinately, in hopes of being succoured by an army that king Abdalla sent to his relief; upon the approach of which he boldly marched out to join them, and, in conjunction with the infidels, offered his master battle <sup>10</sup>. Don Alphonso, grown old in arms, and followed by troops that had been ever victorious under his command, attacked the rebels and their infidel allies with such vigour in the plain of Graja de Ribera, which is watered by the river Ezla, that they were quickly routed, and the greatest part of them slain or drowned, the few that remained fled with blind Veremond into the dominions of the king of Cordova, who soon after sent an embassy to Don Alonso, to persuade him to renew the truce, which with some difficulty was granted <sup>11</sup>.

<sup>d</sup> THE public tranquillity thus restored, the king returned, as usual, to the cares of domestic government, and more especially to works of piety, and such as might contribute to the glory of his kingdom, and the honour and happiness of his subjects. It was with this view that he summoned a general council of his clergy, and a great assembly of the states at Oviedo, with the consent, as the generality of the Spanish writers say, of the pope <sup>12</sup>; but however, their best critics <sup>13</sup> allow, that the acts of this assembly, as they are published in the general assembly of the Spanish councils by cardinal Aguirre, are forgeries: and, if we take our notions of what passed here from the historians nearest the time, we shall find it not to have differed much from the like assemblies in the times of the Gothic kings <sup>14</sup>. In a word, the monarch opened to the members of this venerable assembly the motives upon which they had been called together, in consequence of which they elected the bishop of Oviedo <sup>a</sup>, as the court bishop, metropolitan, ordered the ancient canons to be strictly observed, and for the greater ease of holding regular synods at Oviedo, each of the bishops had certain rents or revenues assigned him there, sufficient to defray his expences, while he attended to discharge the duties of his sacred function <sup>b</sup>. This (though many others have been assigned) seems to be the true reason why this was called the city of bishops.

Defeats the Moors, tho' supported by assistance from the Mohammedans in Afric.

As the king saw with pleasure the good effects that had already followed from rebuilding and fortifying such places of consequence as he had recovered from the Moors, and was determined to adhere steadily to that salutary maxim, he undertook to preside in person at the reparation of Zamora, anciently called Scientica, while the care of rebuilding Toro was committed to his son Don Garcias, and that of restoring Simencas and Duenas to two great lords of the court, with a view that the river Duero might, by the help of these strong places, be rendered an impenetrable barrier against the infidels <sup>c</sup>. Abdalla, king of Cordova, was so much disturbed at the news of these proceedings, foreseeing that these new cities would be all soon peopled at his cost, that he sent over several ministers to solicit the princes of his religion in Africa for succours, representing the interests of the Mohammedans in Spain to be in danger from the designs of Don Alonso; by which he obtained such large supplies, as enabled him to march a numerous army directly towards Zamora, and, with the general who commanded it, he sent Alcaman, a plausible enthusiast, who endeavoured to raise the courage of the soldiers by his vehement harangues. But Don Alonso, who covered the works he was about with a considerable army, did not suffer them to approach near enough to disturb him; but, having made a proper choice of the ground, advanced, attacked, and defeated them, with prodigious loss, and amongst the slain was their preacher, who had promised them such mighty things in the name of his prophet <sup>d</sup>. This blow kept the infidels quiet for two years. Then Don Alonso, having intelligence that they began to be in motion, marched with a numerous army into the kingdom of Toledo, and, fetching a compass under the mountains that divide the two kingdoms of Castile, burnt and demolished some of the best towns, and having taken and dismantled a fortress which the Moors had built to cover their territories, he returned in triumph to his own with immense riches. It was at the end of this campaign that a new conspiracy was detected, into which one Adalphin and his sons had entered, for which they were justly punished with death <sup>e</sup>.

A. D. 904.

Oppressed by disturbances in his own family, he resigns the crown to his son Don Garcias.

THE next year, after gaining so much fame abroad, and being delivered from such danger at home, the good old monarch found himself in a situation so much the more unfortunate, as it was both unnatural and unexpected. His son Don Garcias, who had married the daughter of Nugnez Fernandez, one of the greatest noblemen in his dominions, formed the cruel design of deposing his father <sup>f</sup>, and seating himself upon the throne; which however could not be carried so secretly, but that it came to the old king's ears, who, marching with a strong detachment of forces to Zamora, seized upon his son's person, and sent him prisoner to the castle of Gecuzon. How just, how necessary soever this step might be, Don Alonso found that it gave great offence to those to whom it ought only to have given sorrow. In short, the queen Chimene, who was excessively fond of her son, forgetting the cause of his confinement, spoke of it as an act of excessive severity, and solicited the king for his release, which he in plain terms refused; then the father-in-law of the young prince became first importunate, and then undutiful <sup>g</sup>. However, Don Alonso was not to be moved either by persuasions or threats; at length, in the third year of the prince's confinement, his brother Don Ordogno, governor of Galicia, joining with the queen and Nugnez Fernandez, began to dispose the minds of the people every-where to revolt, alleging, that while the king gave them fair words, and promised to consider their petitions, the prince was growing old in a prison. The wise and brave old king perceiving that a civil war was on the point of breaking out, summoned an assembly of the states, which was held in the year of our Lord nine hundred and ten, in which the majority endeavoured to engage the king to set his son at liberty, as a step necessary to his own safety, and which would be highly obliging to his subjects <sup>h</sup>. The king thereupon summoned all the grandees to his country palace at Bordes, now called Bedes, in Asturias, and, having produced both his sons before them, he made a short speech, in which he observed, that having studied through a long life, and a long reign, to do always what might be best for his people, he would not alter his conduct at the end of it; and was therefore content to gratify their wishes, by resigning the crown to Don Garcias <sup>i</sup>, and the province of Galicia to Don Ordogno. The two princes, who were far from expecting such a resolution, threw themselves on their knees at their father's feet, and intreated his pardon for what was

<sup>a</sup> past, which he readily granted; and immediately after, by the consent of the states, Don Garcias was declared king <sup>y</sup> (G). This transaction, as far as can be collected from the best historians happened in the month of December, in the year before mentioned.

THE new king was solicitous to begin his administration with certain actions that might appear both popular and praiseworthy; and accordingly he first founded and endowed a monastery, and then assembled a numerous army, in order to march against the Moors, who had been free from incursions during the last three years. The king of Cordova, having intelligence of his motions, made the best provision he could for his reception, and put at the head of his forces Ayola, an officer of great repute for conduct as well as courage. He seems, however, to have acted this campaign upon the defensive, and to have aimed only at preventing Don Garcias from penetrating into Castile; but the king, who was eager and active, as well as personally brave, forced the Moors to a battle, in which he not only gained a complete victory <sup>z</sup>, but also took their general Ayola prisoner, who, in the return of the army into Asturias, had the good fortune to make his escape. This victory, and the vast riches which the soldiers obtained, raised the character of Don Garcias extremely with his subjects. Don Garcias opens his reign with an expedition against the Moors. A. D. 911.

At his return from this expedition, his father <sup>a</sup> met him at Astorga, where they conferred together on the operations of the next year; and Don Alonso took a great deal of pains to shew him, that incursions and conquests signified little, if they were made with no other view than to enrich the soldiers, and to gain applause. He therefore advised him to assemble a numerous army the next year, of which he would himself take the command <sup>b</sup>, at least of the vanguard; and that in the mean time due care should be taken to repair and repeople the places that yet lay open and in ruins along the river Duero, particularly Rueda, Osma, Corunna, and Cocca. Don Garcias thanked his father for his advice, and promised to follow it exactly. Accordingly, having charged two of his principal nobility with the care of restoring the places before-mentioned, he assembled his army in the spring, of which Don Alonso taking the command, swept all the country beyond the Duero; and, having made a glorious campaign, with very little resistance on the part of the Moors, he returned, with his army laden with spoils, in the winter, to Zamora <sup>c</sup>. The old king, with the consent of his son, makes the next campaign with much reputation. 912.

In a short time after he came to that city, he found himself much indisposed, and, perceiving that his end drew on, he sent for his old friend the bishop of Astorga to assist him in his last moments. Having bestowed all the money he had, which Ferreras <sup>d</sup> says amounted to about five hundred pistoles, on the church of St. James, he breathed his last, December the twentieth, in the year of our Lord nine hundred and twelve, two year after his abdication, forty-nine years from the time of his being associated in the government with his father, and when he was about the age of sixty-three <sup>e</sup>. In recording the principal events of his reign we have sufficiently drawn the character of this excellent prince, than whom none of those who bore it better deserved the title of Great. He was not only unaffectedly pious, and a great patron of learning, but, for the times in which he lived, a prince of great learning himself; for, having been intreated by Sebastian, bishop of Orensa, who had been either his chaplain or his preceptor, to consider of some means for preserving the memorials of times past, of which, from the reign of king Wamba, there were scarce any records worth reading, he undertook Death of Don Alonso, his legacy to the church of Compostella; some account of his chronicle.

(G) We have some circumstances, relating to the abdication of Don Alonso the Great, from Mariana, that deserve the reader's notice. He assures us, that, in order to execute his projected scheme of adorning the chief places in his dominions with public structures, rebuilding decayed towns, and fortifying his frontiers, he found himself under a necessity of imposing new taxes upon his subjects, which, as he observes, is always to be avoided as much as possible, because it never fails, unless the necessity be very glaring, to make those who are to pay them uneasy. In the present case, it seems, it had that effect to a great degree, notwithstanding the many glorious actions this monarch had performed; and though it was evident, that what he took from his subjects was expended for their service, and not in the gratification of any passion of his, unless his zeal for their welfare could be so called. The same historian adds farther, that queen Ximena began to grow weary of a husband old and infirm, and therefore suggested to the prince Don Garcias, that it was time for him to reign, and that he ought to take advantage of the popular discontent. But, as great a mistress as she thought herself in politics, it seems she had not considered the affection of the army, which interposed, and prevented the revolution which would otherwise have happened. But, after her son's imprisonment, she consulted with the count of Castile the means of repairing this mistake, and encouraged him to raise a civil war, which lasted two years: it was this circumstance that determined the old king to a resignation. He abhorred, or rather he disdained, reigning by force; he could not bear to see the effusion of Christian blood in such a quarrel; and, above all, he was unwilling to have that great scheme of government he had formed, defeated and subverted by this unlucky dispute. He chose, therefore, to place the crown upon his son's head; and having, by that means, regained his affections, he soon made him comprehend so clearly the nature and importance of his plan, that Don Garcias heartily embraced it; and, if Providence had spared him a longer life, would in all probability have shewn, that, except the short interval in which he was misled by feminine and factious counsels, he was not the unworthy son of one of the best and wisest princes.

and composed that chronicle <sup>f</sup> which has been mentioned more than once, beginning at the death of king Recesuinto, and ending with that of Don Ordogno, his own father, which, after having been long covered with dust and oblivion, was published to the world under the name of the bishop at whose request it was composed; but the most learned and judicious of the Spanish critics <sup>g</sup> have long ago declared themselves satisfied that it belonged to the king himself; and indeed this is evident from the performance, though very incorrectly published by Sandoval, and not so perfect as could be wished in the later editions.

His son survives him but for a small time, and then dies very little regretted.

THE same year, but some months before Don Alonso, died another Spanish monarch, viz. Abdallah <sup>h</sup>, king of Cordova, and was succeeded by Abderrahman III. the son of king Mohammed, against whom Don Garcias prepared to act vigorously; but this expedition was retarded by some sinister designs that he formed against his brother Don Ordogno, as being not at all well pleased that he should hold in his own right so considerable a province as that of Galicia, of which therefore he was inclined to deprive him <sup>i</sup>; but as his brother was a very brave prince, much beloved by his soldiers, and who prepared to meet him with a gallant army, Don Garcias was content to admit of the interposition of the queen his mother, and some of the nobility, by whose endeavours their quarrel was composed, and they acted jointly, and with great cordiality, in their expedition against the Moors, which was begun and ended with all the success they could desire <sup>k</sup>. While they were in the field, Donna, Ximena, or Chimene <sup>l</sup>, ended her days, and, according to her desire, was interred at Astorga by her husband. At the close of the campaign, Don Garcias repaired to Leon, in order to enjoy some recess after his fatigue, and to confer with his nobility: and, before the winter was ended, he fell into a disease that proved fatal to him, when he had worn the crown, which he took from his father's head, somewhat less than three years <sup>m</sup>, the less regretted by his subjects, upon account of a certain sternness in his disposition, so much the more remarkable, as it was the very reverse of the affability of Don Alonso, and of the open and chearful temper of his brother, who was generally beloved and esteemed.

Don Ordogno II. his brother, succeeds, and gains the battle of Talavera against the Moors.

DON Ordogno was in his own province at the time of his brother's decease; of which however he was no sooner informed, than he repaired with all the expedition possible to Leon, from whence the body of his brother had been transported to Oviedo, where it was interred in the tomb with his predecessors. The bishops and nobles made no scruple of admitting him to the throne, and, in consequence of their election, he was declared king in the month of February nine hundred and fourteen <sup>n</sup>. His first care was to imitate his predecessors, in making an expedition against the infidels. Having accordingly made an incursion into the territories of the king of Cordova, he found his progress stopped by the town of Talavera de la Reyna, the governor of which, contrary to his expectations, absolutely refused to surrender, upon which he invested the place <sup>o</sup>, and made several vigorous attacks: but it was so well fortified, and the Moor who commanded therein defended himself with such spirit and resolution, that, notwithstanding the bravery of his troops, and his own presence, he made but a slow progress in the siege. While he was thus employed, Abderrahman, who was very desirous of giving a check to this martial monarch at the beginning of his reign, sent a good corps of troops, under the command of one of his most renowned officers, to the relief of the place <sup>p</sup>. Don Ordogno was no sooner informed of this, than, leaving a small corps before Talavera, he marched with the rest of his army, and gave battle to the enemy, who defended themselves gallantly till their general was killed, and then fled <sup>q</sup>. After this victory, he took Talavera by storm, put the garrison to the sword, and, having dismantled the place, returned in triumph to Leon. There he found the bishop of Astorga, who had been prevented by the late king from paying Don Alonso's legacy, who informed him, that he was then going with it to Compostella. It seems that, at these times, was so considerable a sum, as to be worthy even of a monarch's notice; and therefore Don Ordogno proposed to the bishop of Astorga, and to the bishop of Compostella, that they should give him the money; instead of which, he offered to grant to the church of St. James the town of Cornelina, on the river Lima; which was accepted, and it is from this concession, which is still preserved, that the date of this monarch's accession is put out of all doubt <sup>r</sup>.

Carries on the war vigorously, and with amazing success.

THE very next spring we find Don Ordogno again in the field, and again victorious over the infidels, whom he routed with great slaughter near the castle of Albanges, which place he took by storm, and put the garrison to the sword; which induced many of the neighbouring towns to surrender, and others to ransom themselves at the expence of very large sums, so a that this campaign was equally glorious and gainful to the Christians<sup>1</sup>. But these losses sunk so deep into the breast of the king of Cordova, that he had again recourse to the princes in Africa of his own religion. He represented the distress he was in, and the ambitious views of Don Ordogno in so strong a light, that they cheerfully contributed, according to the respective force of their dominions, to send him a great supply; and Mohammed Almotaraf, then lord of Ceuta, went in person to his assistance<sup>2</sup>. Abderrahman assembled also as good an army as he was able, and received succours likewise from the Moorish prince of Saragossa, under the command of Ablapaz. This united army of the infidels amounted in the whole to eighty thousand men, and, marching directly towards the frontier of Don Ordogno's territories, began to make dispositions for passing the river Duero, being already arrived within sight of St. Stephen de Gormaz. There Don Ordogno stopped their career, and, though his army was inferior in number, he made no scruple of engaging the enemy, and, after a most obstinate and bloody action, defeated them, their generals Ablapaz and Mohammed being both killed upon the spot<sup>3</sup>. After this glorious victory, he returned with prodigious spoils to Leon, where he built a noble cathedral, as a monument of his piety and gratitude for the divine favour; and having thus made it a bishop's see, he next, in regard to the beauty and convenient situation of the place, made choice of it for the capital of his dominions, and, as his predecessors had been stiled first kings of Asturias, then of Oviedo, so himself and his successors took from this time the title of kings of Leon<sup>4</sup>. A. D. 917.

THE war was still carried on between the Moors and Christians with equal eagerness and obstinacy on both sides, but with less inequality than before; for, in the next engagement, Don Ordogno was glad to continue the battle till it was dark, and then to make a retreat without boasting of victory<sup>5</sup>; soon after which he concluded a truce with the king of Cordova, who still meditated revenge against the Christians. In order to effect this, he, not without great difficulty, assembled a more numerous army than he had hitherto brought into the field, composed in a great measure of new supplies from Africa, which he sent under the command of one of his generals into the territories of the king of Navarre<sup>6</sup>. Don Sanchez, who then governed that country, demanded the assistance of his nephew Don Ordogno, who, with a body of choice troops, marched to his relief. Having joined his army under the command of prince Garcias, the allied army engaged the Moors in the valley of Junquera, where, after a long and bloody dispute, they were beaten<sup>7</sup>, and Don Ordogno returned with the remainder of his forces, not without some difficulty, to Leon. The Moors, elevated with this victory, and the conquest that attended it, committed an unaccountable act of indiscretion, and, instead of prosecuting their advantages as they might have done, made an irruption into France, where they were able to do nothing. In the mean time Don Ordogno, having recovered his spirits, and recruited his army, made several successful incursions into the dominions of the king of Cordova<sup>8</sup>. 921.

AT his return from this campaign, the king received the news of the death of his queen Donna Elvira, whose body he caused to be interred in the royal sepulchre at Oviedo<sup>9</sup>, and the year following espoused Argonta, who was descended from one of the principal families in Galicia; but soon after, moved by some wicked calumny, or ill-grounded suspicion, he repudiated his new queen, who retired to a monastery, and there spent the remainder of her days in devotion<sup>10</sup>; and the king too, being convinced of his fault, is said to have become sincerely penitent. At this juncture, having some suspicion of the fidelity of the counts of Castile, he went thither slenderly attended, and summoned them to meet him, which they neglecting, he returned without seeming to take any offence, and, having raised a very powerful army, went once more into Castile, and summoned them a second time, when, through fear of his destroying their country, they appeared; upon which the king seized and carried them to Leon, where some time after he caused them to be strangled in prison<sup>11</sup>. We find this act represented by most historians as a piece of injustice and cruelty; whereas others affirm, that these lords had been in rebellion, and suffered no more than they deserved; but this is an event which we shall be obliged to mention more than once in the course of the history (H). 922.

THE king of Navarre and his son Don Garcias having demanded the assistance of Don a Ordogno, in order to recover some places that were yet in the hands of the Moors, he marched accordingly into their dominions with his forces, did for them what they desired, and, at the close of the expedition, married Donna Santiva, the daughter of Don Garcias, and the granddaughter of the king, with whom he returned into his own territories, where he died <sup>f</sup> very soon after, and was buried in the cathedral of Leon, leaving by his first queen, two sons, Don Alonso and Don Ramiro, after he had reigned seventeen years and some months, and was not exceedingly regretted by his subjects. As for his new-married queen, she returned again into Navarre. The princes his sons, being too young to form any pretensions to the crown in an elective monarchy, his brother Don Froila repaired immediately to Leon, and, by the consent of the bishops and great lords, was without difficulty received as his successor in the b throne <sup>g</sup>.

Don Froila the second, king of Oviedo and Leon, is represented as a prince of great fierce-ness and cruelty. He understood that the sons of one Olmund, a great lord, had endeavoured to hinder his election; and the crown was hardly placed upon his head before he put them to death <sup>h</sup>; his brother Fronimo, bishop of Leon, having intimated, that, notwithstanding his youth, Don Alphonso, the eldest son of the deceased king, might be enabled to govern with the assistance of a regency, he caused him to be banished <sup>i</sup>; which alarmed his subjects to the highest degree; and in all probability his reign would have been attended with continual troubles, as it opened so unhappily, if, in the judgment of the writers of those times, Providence had not interposed; a thing indeed not rashly to be credited. However, in this they all c agree, that, being struck with a leprosy, he in the space of a few months was brought with much sorrow and pain to his grave, when he had borne the title of king <sup>k</sup> only a year and one month. His body was interred in the cathedral church of Leon, near that of his brother Don Ordogno the second <sup>l</sup>. It has been generally believed, that the people of Castile, provoked by Don Ordogno's cutting off their counts, and being apprehensive of still worse usage from a prince of Don Froila the second's temper, revolted in his time from their obedience to the crown of Leon; and appointed two judges, one of whom they intrusted with the administration of the civil government, and the other was to have the command of their forces. But this, as will be shewn in another place, seems to be very uncertain at least, and improbable, if not altogether groundless. However, it must be acknowledged, that in so short a space as twenty d years, from the resignation of Don Alonso the Great, his dominions had very much altered their aspect, and his subjects had just reason to regret their impatience and ingratitude to that wise and prudent monarch, who, they now plainly saw, was much better acquainted with the disposition of his children than those who were so desirous to raise them to the throne in his life-time; the nobility also, remembering the proposition that had been made by the bishop of Leon, upon the last vacancy of the throne, resolved to embrace his scheme, and rather trust the public affairs in the hands of a young prince, of a mild temper, and virtuous disposition, than run the hazard of placing upon the throne a prince of the same disposition with him they had lately lost, or rather from whom they were so happily delivered.

Don Alonso, or Don Alphonso, the son of Don Ordogno the second <sup>m</sup>, succeeded his uncle e upon the principles before mentioned, and, immediately after his accession, recalled Fronimo, bishop of Leon, by whose advice he was chiefly directed during the short time he sat upon the throne. He was, as we observed before, a prince of a sweet and moderate temper, which, it must however be acknowledged, did not so well qualify him for a throne; and, therefore, on the demise of his queen Donna Urraca, he formed a resolution of abdicating in favour of his brother Don Ramiro, who at that time commanded on the frontiers of Portugal, and was a pudiation of his wife as an act of scandalous injustice; and yet, with respect to the counts of Castile, he vindicates him clearly, and says, they were punished as rebels. We shall have occasion in another place to mention this matter again; but it may not be amiss to observe here, that though Mariana takes this opportunity of entering into the history of Castile, that he may the better apprise the reader of the true nature of this transaction, yet his deduction does not by any means agree with his conclusion; for he makes it plainly appear, that the counts of Castile were feudatories to the kings of Leon, and certainly owed their power and greatness to the protection of those princes; and therefore, till such time as they were released from this homage, they were bound to fulfil the obligations they were under from it. It is not consequently a thing so evident as he would make it, that these noblemen were unjustly put to death; and the only circumstance favourable to his censure is, that no mention is made of their being condemned by the states; which however they might be, for any thing we know to the contrary, since no good account can be otherwise given why the king brought them to Leon, and kept them prisoners there for some time, since, if he had been such a tyrant as Mariana makes him, and had put them to death only from reasons of state, he might have done that with a better grace when he first seized them.

- a young prince of great spirit and capacity; which resolution has been thought the more extraordinary in Don Alonso, as he had a son living by his beloved queen, whose name was Ordogno<sup>n</sup>. However, he was either so much inclined to a private life, or so sensible of his want of talents for the right administration of civil and military affairs, that, persisting in his resolution, he sent for his brother from Viseo to Zamora, where he then was, and, in the presence of the principal nobility, having made a full and sensible oration on the qualities requisite in a great and good king, and freely acknowledging that some of these were wanting to him from nature, he voluntarily resigned his crown<sup>o</sup>, and advised them to place it on the head of his brother. This happened, according to the chronology of Ferreras<sup>p</sup>, in the year of our Lord nine hundred twenty-seven, though some historians place it four years later.
- b Don Ramiro the second was no sooner placed upon the throne<sup>q</sup>, than he resolved to signalize his courage by an expedition against the Moors<sup>r</sup>, which was what his brother seemed last to have intended, and to have appointed with that view the nobility to have met him at Zamora, upon the frontiers. But while he was busy in his military preparations, he was strangely alarmed with the news that his brother Don Alphonso had quitted his monastery, returned to the city of Leon, and resumed the state and functions of a king<sup>s</sup>, to which it seems he was excited by those who were better pleased with a king who left the government to them, than with him by whom they saw plainly they must be governed. The nobility, however, that were about Don Ramiro, having given him positive assurances of their fidelity, he marched immediately with the army that should have been employed against the Moors to invest the city of Leon, and being unwilling to have recourse to extremities, laboured to engage his brother, and those who adhered to him, in a negotiation; but Don Alphonso refused to listen to any terms, and shewed, now he was in the wrong, and when it was to no purpose, a degree of spirit and prudence, that, if it had been exerted in time, might have prevented those calamities which his unsteady and fluctuating temper had brought upon his people as well as himself<sup>t</sup>.
- But while Don Ramiro was engaged in the siege of Leon, and in reduction of some places that had declared for his brother, he had intelligence that Don Alphonso, Don Ramiro, and Don Ordogno, the sons of king Froila, had taken up arms in Asturias, and that the eldest had assumed the title of king<sup>u</sup>. This put it out of his power to proceed in the slow manner he had hitherto done; and yet, being unwilling to reduce the capital of his dominions by storm, he turned the siege into a close blockade; and the inhabitants of Leon, soon finding themselves pressed by famine, signified to Don Alphonso, that they were unable to support him any longer, and that therefore he must endeavour to accommodate matters with his brother as well as he could. In this situation he resolved, having indeed no other measure to take, to throw himself<sup>v</sup> on the clemency of Don Ramiro; and, upon his going out and submitting himself, that monarch entered the city of Leon, and granted a general pardon to all who had hitherto taken part with his brother; by which this political schism was extinguished, and Don Ramiro left at liberty to pursue the measures necessary for the reduction of the Asturias. But the people of this country, as soon as they were acquainted with the issue of the siege of Leon, sent to inform Don Ramiro, that, if he would come thither with a small train, they would deliver up the sons<sup>w</sup> of the late king Froila, and acknowledge him for their sovereign, to prevent the continuance of a civil war, and the effusion of Christian blood; a proposition plausible in itself, but not acceptable to the king, who suspected their sincerity.
- He chose therefore to march towards the Asturias with his victorious army, as the best argument of his right to subjects that were in arms; and yet, halting on the frontiers, he sent them a message, that he expected they should perform their promise. This had the desired effect; and, whatever their first intention might be, they found themselves obliged to act as if it had been sincere; and accordingly, having seized the three princes before-mentioned, they delivered them up to the king, who sent them and his brother to a place of strength, where they were kept close prisoners, and deprived of their eyesight<sup>x</sup>; but the king being some time after informed, that those who were about these unhappy princes treated them with great indignity, he caused them to be removed to the monastery of St. Julian de Ruisorco, which he had lately built, where, by his express direction, they were used with all possible lenity, as well as with all the respect due to their high birth<sup>y</sup>. About this time died queen Urraca, the consort of Don Ramiro, and by whom he had a son Don Ordogno, which it becomes necessary to mark, that the reader may not confound them with the queen and two successful incursions upon the Moors.

A. D. 932.

As soon as Don Ramiro found himself in peaceable possession of his dominions, he executed with great spirit and vigour that expedition which he had so long meditated against the Moors, penetrated as far as Madrid, which was then fortified, and, after taking it by storm, proceeded to insult Toledo, one of the strongest and greatest cities in the hands of the Moors; after which he returned in triumph with his army loaded with spoils, and bringing with them a multitude of slaves <sup>b</sup>. At his return, he found his brother Don Alphonso the fourth, surnamed, from his misfortunes, the Monk and the Blind, dead in the monastery of St. Julian, to whose remains he caused all those honours to be paid that were due to his dignity <sup>c</sup>. The king, however, had very little leisure to repose; for Abderrahman, king of Cordova, incensed at the incursion he had made into his dominions, raised forces in every province of his kingdom, and sent to Aben Abaya, who governed in Saragossa, but was his vassal, to march with all the forces that he could raise, and to take the command. These preparations being known to Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, count of Castile, he gave immediate notice of them to the king, who kept his army together in the neighbourhood of Leon, and, as the season of the year advanced, caused them to be reinforced with several corps of fresh troops, and, as soon as he had intelligence that the enemy were in motion, marched directly towards his frontiers. He found the Moors encamped in good order within sight of Osma, on a spacious plain, which gave them an opportunity of ranging themselves to the best advantage. Don Ramiro, tho' inferior in numbers, charged them with great vigour and resolution, and, notwithstanding they behaved with great courage, and rallied several times, yet in the end they were totally defeated with a prodigious slaughter <sup>d</sup>. At his return from this victory, the king was welcomed by the universal acclamations of all his subjects, and, as a mark of his piety, confirmed the privileges and donations granted by his predecessors to the church of St. James of Compostella <sup>e</sup> (K).

(I) There are several circumstances, relating to this prince and his family, that, as far as our authorities will permit, ought to be explained. Mariana informs us, that the learned bishop of Tuy makes this king to be the son of his predecessor Froila; yet whoever consults that author will find that Mariana was mistaken. Several Spanish historians, however, have been of that opinion; but what clearly refutes it is, that, amongst the children of that prince, whose eyes were put out by Don Ramiro, one of them was named Alonso or Alphonso, so that the mistake arose partly from Don Froila's having a son of the same name, and partly from his children taking the side of Don Alonso the fourth. In the next place, many writers call the consort of Don Alonso the fourth Ximena; but Ferreras assures us, that her name was Urraca, and that it was grief for her death which induced Don Alonso to think of abdicating. It was by her that he had his son Don Ordogno, surnamed the Wicked. As for the queen of Don Ramiro, her name was likewise Donna Urraca; and she died, as appears by her epitaph, printed at large by Morales, June the 24th, Anno Domini nine hundred thirty-one, and was buried at Oviedo, in the chapel of Don Alonso the Clafte, by whom he had his son and successor Don Ordogno the third, and the princess Donna Elvira, who became a nun. It may not be amiss to add here, that both these Ordognos married a princess named Urraca, indeed the same woman; for, as the reader will see in the text, she was the daughter of the count of Castile, married Don Ordogno, the son of Don Ramiro, in the life-time of his father, by whom, after his accession to the throne, she was repudiated, and, after his decease, espoused Don Ordogno the Wicked, when he usurped the kingdom of Leon from her first husband's brother, Don Sanchez the Grays.

(K) It is very strange that Mariana should conceive, that, upon the score of the assistance given him by the king of Leon, Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, count of Castile, paid him extraordinary submissions, who but a little before had triumphed over and killed in battle Don Sanchez Abarta, king of Navarre; and it is still more strange that Father Charenton, who translated his book into French, should think of correcting his author, by saying, that very probably the counts of Castile, from this time, became feudatories to the kings of Leon; all which is apparently false, and irreconcilable to true history. As for Mariana's tale of the grandeur of Don Ferdinand at this time, it is a mere dream, as we shall shew in its proper place. With respect to his translator's remarks, Don Ferdinand Gonzalez was indeed feudatory to the king of Leon in virtue of the lands he held in Castile; but he was so far from being the first of those counts who became so, that he was in reality the last who continued so. He projected and attempted a revolt in the reign of this very monarch, who humbled and made him prisoner. He took up arms against king Ordogno, the son of this king, though he had married his own daughter; but was reduced to a state of penitence and humility, which lasted only till he had an opportunity of breaking out again, and completing his project, under the reign of Don Sanchez, though not without incurring much danger and disgrace before it could be effected. It was after this glorious victory at Osma that Don Ramiro confirmed the privileges granted by his predecessors to the church of Saint James at Compostella; and, from this time, it is said that he manifested a particular respect and devotion to this holy apostle.

a had been in his predecessors<sup>f</sup>. At the rising of this assembly, the king formed a considerable army, with which he made an irruption into Aragon, in order to punish Aben Abaya for the share he had in the last campaign, and, by the rapid progress he made in the conquest of that country, alarmed him to such a degree, that he offered to become his feudatory also, and to pay him the same tribute that he did to Abderrabman, which he readily accepted; and some strong places having revolted, in resentment of this submission, he reduced them, and, together with those he had before conquered, restored to his new vassal<sup>g</sup>. Before his return from this expedition, he concluded a marriage with Donna Theresa, sister to Don Garcia king of Navarre, and returning into his own dominions, passed the next year with his new queen in quiet<sup>h</sup>. The year following, Aben Abaya sent deputies to Abderrabman, king of Cordova, b to inform him that he had submitted to the Christians only through fear; and that if he would assemble a new army, sufficient to deliver him from any future apprehensions of Don Ramiro, he would join it with all his forces; to which the king of Cordova readily assented; and having drawn together a sufficient body of troops, made an irruption on the territories of Leon, and reduced the town of Sotocuevas, supposed to be that now called Covarrubias, where he made a great slaughter of the Christians<sup>i</sup>; but whether this was in consequence of any victory gained does not appear, though, from what follows, it may seem more than probable, since we hear nothing of Don Ramiro's being in the field; and yet we can hardly suppose that he was a tame spectator of his subjects sufferings.

A. D. 934.

THE king of Cordova was very far from being satisfied with this small advantage; but,
c having made use of all the reputation it gave him, increased the number of his forces, and having procured considerable supplies from Africa, and given Aben Abaya notice to join him likewise with all that he could raise, he drew together an army of 150,000 men<sup>k</sup>. Don Ramiro, perceiving that his enemy had no less in view than the conquest of the kingdoms of Leon and Oviedo, and driving him back to the Asturias, assembled all the forces that he could collect in his own dominions, or procure from his allies; but as this required time, and the Moors were in the field in the month of May, they had time to reduce all the country beyond the Duero, since it was the beginning of August before the Christian army was in a condition to look them in the face. At length the king, having first made a vow at the altar of St. James of Compostella<sup>l</sup>, put himself at the head of his forces, and marched directly against the d enemy, whom he found encamped in the plains of Simancas, at the confluence of the Pisuerga and the Duero. In this situation he attacked them on the 6th of August, notwithstanding they received him with great courage, and made a most obstinate resistance, yet they were defeated early in the afternoon, and the king continued the pursuit with vast slaughter, till it was quite dark, and, as all the historians agree, the infidels lost in this defeat no fewer than fourscore thousand men<sup>m</sup>. After this glorious victory, by which his army was prodigiously enriched, the king was on the point of returning to his own dominions, when he was informed that Abderrabman had begun to collect the remains of his broken army, and had established his head quarters a little beyond Salamanca; upon which he marched with great celerity, and attacked the Moors so unexpectedly, that he gained another victory as complete as the former, e and at a much cheaper rate<sup>n</sup>. At his return to Leon, he caused the traitor Aben Abaya, who had been taken in the first battle, to be shut up in a tower, and threatened to punish him as a rebel; and, as soon as he had refreshed his troops, disposed them into quarters in the country beyond the Duero, having taken a resolution to extend his dominions as far as that chain of mountains which divides the two Castiles, intending to form a double frontier, one along the territories still possessed by the Moors, and the other of the great towns situated upon the Duero<sup>o</sup>.

THE principal source of that constant prosperity which hitherto had attended these monarchs was, in a great measure, derived from their great abilities, as well in the cabinet as in the field, and their steady pursuit of the true interests of their subjects. But notwithstanding f this was rewarded with repeated victories, and in a manner attended with perpetual success, yet the indefatigable disposition of these princes, and that vigilance and activity with which they acted in times of peace as well as war, as the motives of their conduct were not explained, proved by no means agreeable to many of their subjects. Thus when the king, in order to form the interior barrier before-mentioned, sent his orders<sup>p</sup> to some of the principal nobility, such as count Nuno Nunez, to repair Osma, count Ferdinand Gonzales to restore Sepulveda, Don Gonzales Fernandez to put Clunia, now Corognaim, in a state of defence, as also St. Stephen de Gormaz and Riaza, all of which seem to have been ruined by Abderrabman, perhaps in the beginning of the last campaign, they performed these orders indeed, but they did it with regret. When, therefore, fresh orders came from that monarch <sup>a</sup> to these lords to raise their respective forces, and to be ready to take the field with him against the Moors, they declined that service <sup>1</sup>; by which, for the present, the king's intentions were defeated; which he took so ill, that, with the army he had assembled to act against the common enemy, he fell upon them, and, having easily subdued, brought count Ferdinand Gonfalez and count Diego Nunez prisoners to Leon, and from thence sent the former to the castle of Gordon, and the other to that of Luna <sup>2</sup>.

The true motives of this monarch's conduct in peace and in war.

It appears very evidently from hence, that however potent these counts might be, yet they were not hitherto independent of the crown of Leon, and served with Don Ramiro in his expedition as allies, and not as subjects <sup>3</sup>, as Mariana, and most of the Spanish historians, would persuade us; but, at the same time, it must be confessed, that from hence it is no less <sup>b</sup> apparent they were inclined so to be. We cannot omit observing in this place, in order to the reader's forming a true notion of the policy of Don Ramiro, and of other princes of his spirit, that, exclusive of their notions of piety in making war upon the infidels, or of their ambition to extend their dominions, they had very just motives to act as they did; which is the reason that we commend their behaviour, and condemn the conduct of those who opposed them. For if we consider attentively the situation they were in, and the great power of the Moors, we cannot help perceiving, that, notwithstanding all their victories, and in spite of all their success, the possession of their dominions remained still precarious, and it was simply impossible for them to render their subjects secure by any other methods than those they employed. As they were now masters of a flat and fruitful country, those maxims that were <sup>c</sup> highly reasonable, and very conducive to their interests, while their subjects were confined to a mountainous and inaccessible country, were intirely superseded, and walling and fortifying the great towns they had recovered was become as necessary, and to the full as requisite, as, in respect to the hamlets and villages in the Asturias, it would have been needless. On the other hand, there was no trusting to a peace with the Moors, which was what the king of Cordova sought, and to which those counts of Castile before-mentioned were inclined; for that, as experience shewed, was only giving them time to compose their differences, to form alliances, to procure succours from Africa, and to put the very being of the Christian principalities, that were now established, to the risk of a single battle, whenever they were in a condition to break, as they never failed to do when they were in a condition, these insidious <sup>d</sup> truces, and to march with such prodigious armies, as, by these methods, they had time given them to collect, in order, by one decisive blow, to bring the Christians in Spain into the same wretched state in which they found themselves after the defeat of Don Roderic. Whereas, by employing part of their subjects in fortifying their frontiers, while the king was at the head of an army in the enemy's country, these mischiefs were evidently avoided; and however tiresome and fatiguing this plan of power might be, it was sensible, it was prudent, because it was the only method practicable for their preservation against the common enemy.

He sets the two counts at liberty, and marries his son to one of their daughters.

THE reader, it is very likely, will consider this as a long digression from the proper business of this history; and yet it is highly probable that it is, in fact, the prosecution of it; <sup>e</sup> for though the succinct chronicles of these times leave no traces of such discourses, yet nothing can have more the appearance of truth than supposing that, during their confinement, the king caused remonstrances of this sort to be made to these noblemen; and, upon their acquiescing in his reasons, and promising obedience for the future to his commands, set them at liberty, and, which is more, restored them to his favour. That he did this is very certain, from a general concurrence of great authorities <sup>4</sup>, and very soon after married his son Don Ordogno to Donna Urraca <sup>5</sup>, the daughter of count Ferdinand Gonfalez by Donna Sancha infanta of Navarre; than which there could not be a more convincing testimony that all former disputes were absolutely buried in oblivion. It is also probable that the king consented to a truce <sup>6</sup> with the Moors for seven years, during which time he caused several monasteries <sup>f</sup> to be erected, repaired the fortifications of most of the great towns in his dominions, and held a general council <sup>7</sup> of the clergy at Astorga, for reforming disorders that were crept into the discipline of the church, which was opened on the first of September, in year of our Lord 946; at which he assisted in person; but the acts of which are long since lost.

Invades the territories of the Moors, gains a great victory, and then dies.

As soon as the truce was expired, the king, with the concurrence, in all probability, of his nobility, immediately entered the dominions of the Moors, and, having passed the mountains of Avila, advanced as far as Talavera, near which he met with a numerous army sent against him by the king of Cordova; upon which a very warm action ensued, and the king, though not without some difficulty, at length obtained a complete victory, 12,000 a Moors being killed upon the spot, and 7000 taken prisoners, with whom, and a vast booty, he returned with his army to Leon<sup>a</sup>. There he reposed himself for some days, and then went to Oviedo, where, finding himself indisposed, he returned presently to Leon, and there, perceiving that his end approached, he resigned his crown<sup>a</sup>, and soon after expired<sup>b</sup>, universally regretted, January the 5th, in the year of our Lord 950, after he had reigned 19 years and very near three months, leaving by his first queen the prince Don Ordogno, and the princess Donna Elvira, and, by his second, the prince Don Sanchez. His body was interred in a monastery of his own foundation, and where the princess Elvira was a nun.

Don Ordogno III. succeeded his father<sup>c</sup> by the unanimous consent of the nobility, and appears to have been, in every respect, a prince of great fortitude of mind, and of consummate prudence, which, as they displayed themselves in the first acts of his reign, so they were equally conspicuous in the last actions of his life. He was no sooner seated on the throne than his brother Don Sanchez made a very unreasonable request<sup>d</sup>. He pretended that they were joint heirs of their father, and that therefore he ought to have some part of his dominions assigned him: to which Don Ordogno would not agree; concluding that, as the consent of the nobility was necessary to his election, he could have no right to divide dominions that were confided to him entire for the common benefit of his subjects. Don Sanchez, however, was supported by the king of Navarre, his uncle, who had a desire to set a crown upon his head; and, which was very extraordinary, by count Ferdinand Gonzales, whose daughter the king had married, and who, notwithstanding, desired to see his power lessened, that he might be more on a level with him, and in less danger upon a revolt. Don Ordogno having no regard either to plausible arguments or to menaces, Don Sanchez retired to his uncle; and his protectors having levied a great army<sup>e</sup>, resolved to execute the scheme they had formed by force; but, upon approaching the territories of Don Ordogno, they found his frontiers so well secured, and his forces so judiciously disposed, that, being unwilling to risk their own countries by an unsuccessful attempt, they very wisely thought proper to retire<sup>f</sup>, without committing any hostilities at all; and thus the excellence of his father's maxims, and the rectitude of his own conduct in pursuing them, appeared to his new subjects in their true light. Yet, as the very best kings are still but men, this success was followed by an action that spoke more resentment than one could have expected should reside in the breast of so wise and so magnanimous a prince.

The confederates had no sooner withdrawn their troops from the frontiers of his dominions, and, as some writers<sup>g</sup> say, in consequence of their inglorious campaign, fallen out amongst themselves, than king Ordogno<sup>h</sup> repudiated his wife Donna Urraca, the daughter of count Ferdinand Gonzales, and sent her back to him; adding another circumstance to this affront, still more provoking, which was, that he immediately married<sup>i</sup> Donna Elvira, the daughter of some man of great quality in Galicia, by whom, the year following, he became the father of a prince whom he called Don Bermudo<sup>k</sup>. As his divorce was the sequel of a foreign, so his new marriage was the cause of a civil war; the relations of the new queen presuming so much upon that honour, as to behave in such a manner to their neighbours, that it produced an insurrection. Don Ordogno laboured all he could to pacify his revolted subjects by fair means; but finding these endeavours unsuccessful, he<sup>l</sup> advanced to the frontiers of Galicia with a considerable body of troops; but, before he proceeded to action, proclaimed a free pardon, and promised to redress all their grievances: upon which, those who were in arms, immediately marched towards him in order of battle, and their chiefs having first waited upon the king, who received them very graciously, ranged themselves under the royal standard, and entering the territories of the Moors, penetrated as far as Lisbon, which they took and demolished, and then returned with immense riches, and a prodigious multitude of slaves<sup>m</sup>.

At the very time that Don Ordogno threw himself into the enemy's country, count Ferdinand Gonzales, with the forces of Castile, made a like irruption into the kingdom of Cordova on the other side, which, with respect to the event of the war, had the same effect as if he had done it by the king's command<sup>n</sup>. However, on his return into his own dominions, Don Ordogno, at the head of his victorious forces, marched towards the frontiers of Castile; but count Ferdinand Gonzales prevented things from coming to extremities, by presenting himself before the king, intreating his pardon<sup>o</sup> for what was past, insisting upon his late service, and assuring Don Ordogno that the Moors were preparing to invade Castile. The king was so well satisfied with this submission, that he not only laid aside all his rancour against that nobleman, but likewise promised him supplies, in case the king of Cordova persisted in his intentions; and it was with their assistance that count Ferdinand Gonsales acquired soon after a glorious victory <sup>p</sup> over the common enemy. About the middle of the summer, the king making a journey from Leon to Zamora, found himself very much indisposed, and shortly after died <sup>q</sup>, about the middle of the year 955, when he had discharged the regal function with universal applause for five years and near a half. Upon his demise, the queen <sup>r</sup> and her young son retired to some of her relations in Galicia, being sensible that she had no interest amongst the nobility capable of raising her infant to the throne.

Dies.

Don Sanchez succeeds his brother, and by the intrigues of the count of Castile, is expelled.

DON Sanchez, quitting his retreat at the court of Navarre, hastened immediately to Leon, on the news of his brother's death; and notwithstanding his long absence, and the circumstances that attended it, the nobility foreseeing less inconvenience from that than from any other step they could take, proclaimed him king <sup>s</sup>. He is commonly called Sanchez the Gross by some, and by others, though very improperly, Sanchez the Fat; this surname being given him on the score of a dropsy. He was a prince of no great parts, and of less activity; however, he might probably have ruled quietly enough, if some sinister methods had not been taken to disturb the peace of his government, which were intirely owing to the artifices of count Ferdinand Gonsalez, who, still aiming at independency, took his measures so secretly and so effectually for inflaming the disputes between the king and his subjects, that at length he raised them so high, as frightened Don Sanchez into a second retreat to the court of his uncle the king of Navarre, by which the kingdom of Leon was left in a kind of anarchy, and consequently count Ferdinand Gonsalez without a master, which, in some measure, answered his purpose. But, however, this did not satisfy his ambition; for, not content with being released from vassalage, he now aimed at nothing less than becoming protector of the kingdom of Leon, by substituting a new king in the room of Don Sanchez.

A. D. 956.

The count of Castile sets up Don Ordogno, and makes his daughter queen of Leon.

957.

THE prince upon whom he fixed his eyes was Don Ordogno <sup>t</sup>, the son of Don Alphonso IV. surnamed the Monk, or the Blind; and, as the price of promoting his election, he obliged him to marry Donna Urraca his daughter, who, by this means, had a second time the title of queen of Leon <sup>v</sup>. The nobility were by no means willing to venture upon a measure, the ill consequences of which were so apparent; and though by his interest it was at last accomplished, yet it was not with a good grace; and the new king began in a little time to act in a manner so inconsistent with his dignity, that they fixed upon him the surname of Don Ordogno the Wicked <sup>z</sup>. As for Don Sanchez, finding himself grow worse and worse with the dropsy, he resolved, by the advice of his uncle the king of Navarre, to go to Cordova, in hopes of receiving that relief from the Moorish physicians, which the most skilful in the court of Navarre were unable to afford. Thither accordingly he went. Abderrahman, proud as he well might be of seeing a king of Leon take shelter under his protection, received him with great kindness, and the Mohammedan doctors, whether by skill or by lucky chance, freed him from his malady intirely <sup>a</sup>. As instances of good or ill fortune seldom come alone, so he was scarce recovered from his disease, before it was insinuated to him by some emissaries from Leon, that his subjects were heartily tired of the tyranny of Don Ordogno; and that if he could appear with but a small force on the frontier, he might be assured he would meet with no resistance. Don Sanchez, relying on the generosity of his protector, communicated this news to Abderrahman <sup>b</sup>, who very kindly offered him his assistance, but at the same time advised him to demand that likewise of his uncle the king of Navarre; and this he no sooner did than it was promised him whenever he should have occasion for it <sup>c</sup>.

Don Sanchez restored by the assistance of the kings of Navarre and Cordova.

THE proper measures being concerted between the two courts, the Moorish army, under the command of Don Sanchez, marched towards the frontiers of Leon, at the same time that the king of Navarre, with the whole force of his dominions, approached those of Castile. As for Don Ordogno, finding himself forsaken by all his subjects, who reviled him for his cruelties, he fled into the remotest parts of the Asturias <sup>d</sup>, so that Don Sanchez was restored <sup>e</sup> without any difficulty; and, having gratified the chief officers of the Moorish army, dismissed them perfectly satisfied. On the other hand, Don Garcia, king of Navarre, having defeated count Ferdinand Gonsalez, and made him prisoner, carried him with him into his own dominions. Ordogno, understanding that the people of Asturias intended to seize and deliver him up, fled from thence to Burgos with his queen, where that princess was received with all imaginable respect, but they would have nothing to do with Ordogno; who thereupon retired to the Moors in Arragon, where, despised by the infidels, and hated

- a by the Christians, he soon after died in a miserable manner <sup>f</sup>. Don Sanchez, thus delivered from apprehensions, as well as enemies, thought proper to marry, and very wisely made choice of Donna Teresa <sup>g</sup>, the daughter of one of the most considerable of his own nobility, which gave his subjects in general great satisfaction. The rejoicings for this marriage were hardly over, when the king received some mortifying intelligence from Galicia, where the Normans had landed unexpectedly, ravaged the country, and carried many of the inhabitants into slavery (L). This gave a pretence to Sisenand, bishop of Compostella, to desire leave to wall and fortify that city, for the security of the cathedral, which, for those times, was already become exceedingly rich; and this permission, which was readily granted, he quickly abused, by levying large sums upon the people for the expence of these works, and various other acts of oppression and extortion, of which complaint was made to the king <sup>h</sup>.

Descent of the Normans.
A. D. 961.

- ALL things being now in a tolerable state of quiet, the king of Navarre released count Ferdinand Gonzalez, at the intreaty of his wife, who was that monarch's sister <sup>i</sup>. About this time also died Abderrahman king of Cordova, and was succeeded by his son Albacan, to whom Don Sanchez immediately sent ambassadors, to congratulate him upon his succession, and to renew the treaties of peace subsisting between the two kingdoms <sup>k</sup>. He then made a tour into Galicia, to inquire into the conduct of bishop Sisenand, which came in very good time; for that prelate, offended with a message that the king had sent him, was meditating a rebellion; but upon the approach of Don Sanchez, the people every where rose to execute the royal commands; so that the bishop being made prisoner, the king deposed him, and placed one Rosemundo at the head of that church, who, when the Normans made another descent in that neighbourhood, put himself at the head of his people, and, falling upon these pirates sword in hand, made such a slaughter, that they visited the coasts of Galicia no more in his time. This prelate, for his virtue and his valour, has been since his death revered as a saint <sup>l</sup>. Count Gonzalez, who was nearly related to bishop Sisenand, being intrusted with the government of the frontiers, basely betrayed his trust, and revolted against his sovereign; upon which, Don Sanchez marched towards him with an army, and the rebel, finding himself abandoned, came and threw himself at his feet; upon which the king pardoned him, and the traitor soon after took an opportunity to poison him, of which he died the third day after <sup>m</sup>, extremely regretted by the better part of his subjects for his mildness, moderation, and clemency (M).

(L) The whole of this reign of Don Sanchez is related but very confusedly in Mariana. It is true he complains of want of lights; but it is also true that he has not made the best use he might have done of those that were in his power. Don Ferdinand Gonzalez was his hero, and he finds nothing but what is commendable in his behaviour towards Don Sanchez. It falls out in consequence of this, that he ascribes to him the taking away of Donna Urracca from Don Ordogns the Wicked, and obliging him to take shelter among the Moors, at the same time that he says not a single word of the king of Navarre's assisting his nephew in the recovery of their dominions, of his defeating the count of Castile, or of his carrying him prisoner to Pampeluna, which was the true reason that the Castilians would not receive the tyrant of Leon, but obliged him to seek a retreat among the infidels. He gives us the strange story of the horse and the hawk, by which Don Ferdinand bought off the homage of Castile from Don Sanchez; which is indeed to be found in some antient writers, and is steadily adhered to by most of the moderns, though there can be nothing more impertinent, more incredible, or more absurd. It is, however, a proof that the count of Castile, after a long and hard struggle, carried the great point of his independency in this reign, which was the only reason we mentioned it here. As to the manner in which it was obtained, we shall have occasion to give the reader some farther account of it in another place.

(M) In these early ages very great regard was paid to the appearance and behaviour, as well as to the temper and administration of princes. As Don Sanchez had the misfortune to be dropsical, it made him, in the former part of his reign, indolent and inactive, which induced his subjects in general to conceive a mean opinion of him; insomuch that they derided his person, and despised his understanding. But finding the prince who supplanted him active only in mischief, and making no other use of his power than to torment those who were subject to it, they rejoiced at Don Sanchez's return, who, though now free from the dropsy, and in a condition to take the field whenever occasion required, was still the same humane, affable, debonnaire prince, which rendered him infinitely beloved. Yet, from a foible incident to all men of that character, he was too easy to be reconciled, and wanted that degree of suspicion, which is useful to every man, and which is necessary to princes. Gonzalez had been his favourite, and, out of a personal esteem, he raised him to the government of Portugal. Provoked at this rebellion, he marched with an army to reduce him; but he no sooner saw him at his feet than he forgave him, which was great, but he restored him likewise to his former familiarity, which was not becoming a wise prince. It was this that gave that perfidious man an opportunity of presenting him some fine fruit, amongst which was a poisoned apple, which the king, who thought gratitude must be the effects of mercy, eat without fear, and paid for it with his life: having probably never heard that wise observation, that, though religion enjoins us to forgive our enemies, it does not require us to trust them.

Don Ramiro

years old.

THE nobility were no sooner informed of the king's death, than they assembled in order <sup>a</sup> to a new election, and, after mature deliberation, they declared his son Don Ramiro III. <sup>a</sup> king, though but five years old, and appointed his mother the queen dowager, and his aunt Donna Elvira, regents <sup>o</sup>, who immediately dispatched instructions to the ambassador then resident at the court of Cordova, to renew the treaty of peace with Albacan, in which he met with no difficulty <sup>p</sup>. Sisenand, the deposed bishop of Compostella, finding means to make his escape out of the tower in which he was confined, returned to that city, and, by force of arms, reinstated himself in the bishoprick; Rosenindo, who had fought so bravely against the Normans, declining any resistance in his own cause. But not long after, those barbarous invaders, having intelligence on the coast of what had happened, landed in great numbers, and marched directly to Compostella. Sisenand, confiding in the numbers that he <sup>b</sup> had about him, and desirous of equalling his predecessor in reputation, drew out the inhabitants to give them battle <sup>r</sup>; but, being killed in the beginning of the action, his people were so dispirited, that they were quickly routed, and cut to pieces. The Normans, elated by their victory, ravaged all the country as far as the mountains of Castile; and having by this means amassed immense wealth, began to retire towards their fleet; but, in their passage, were met by Don Gonsalez Sanchez, whom the regents had sent with a considerable body of troops to repel these bold invaders. The dispute was very obstinate and bloody, but at length Don Gonsalez gained a complete victory <sup>r</sup>; upon which the people rose every where in the neighbourhood, and killed or made slaves of all that were left, while Don Gonsalez, by a stratagem, burnt their fleet.

A. D. 970.

Upon his marriage becomes odious to his subjects.

WHEN Don Ramiro entered his 17th year, he married <sup>s</sup>, with the consent of the regents, a lady of a great family, whose name was Donna Urraca, and soon after assumed the reins of government. This young prince, in a short time, became so uxorious, that, slighting the advice of his mother and his aunt, he confided entirely in the relations of his new queen, which highly disoblighed the nobility, and particularly those of Galicia; who, lying farthest from the seat of government, were, in all probability, the worst treated. The consequence was, that, on conferring amongst themselves, and observing that the prince Don Bermudo, son to king Ordogno III. who had been bred up amongst them, had all the qualities requisite to form a great and good prince, they unanimously declared him king <sup>t</sup>. This was so well received by the people in general, that they found no difficulty in raising an army numerous <sup>d</sup> enough to support their choice; neither did they shew themselves dispirited at all upon the approach of Don Ramiro, who came with a great army to reduce them. Their forces met upon the frontiers, and the dispute was so obstinate and bloody, that more were lost in this battle <sup>u</sup> than in any against the Moors; and yet they were parted by the night; so that neither side claimed the victory. However, Don Ramiro thought it best to return to Leon, in order to recruit his forces; and, while he was thus employed, he died <sup>w</sup> suddenly, in the latter end of the year 982, in the 15th year of his reign, and when he was about twenty years of age. He was buried near his grandfather Don Ramiro II. From whence, by the command of Don Ferdinand II. he was removed to Astorga.

Don Bermudo II. on his victory, is acknowledged king of Oviedo and Leon.

DON Bermudo II. was immediately acknowledged <sup>x</sup> upon the decease of his competitor, and began his reign with very favourable circumstances. He observed that all ranks and degrees of his subjects were extremely degenerated; that the nobility were luxurious, haughty, and oppressive; that the common people copied their betters; and that the clergy, instead of reproofing the vices of the laity, were become equally vicious themselves. He began his reformation with them, because he found that several of the bishops were men of strict morals, and wanted only to be supported by authority in correcting their inferiors, and because he saw that this was acceptable to the people, as the laity, however vicious, have an abhorrence for all excesses among the clergy; and besides he made no doubt that a thorough reformation in the church would have a great effect upon the morals of the people in general. But while he was thus occupied, the Moors, who considered themselves as disengaged from all treaties by the death of Don Ramiro, under the command of Mohammed Almanzor, Albagib, or prime minister, to Hissam king of Cordova, made an irruption into his dominions, and formed the siege of Simencas, a place well fortified; the inhabitants of which made a gallant defence, which might have preserved it, if the king had been in any condition to relieve them; but so many had fallen in the fatal battle at his accession, that he found it absolutely impossible to bring a an army into the field; so that, after a long siege, the Moors became masters of Simencas <sup>r</sup>, and carried all the people who were left therein into slavery, and acquired also a prodigious booty.

THERE is no doubt but the king must have been grievously afflicted with the consideration of a disgrace beyond any that had happened to his predecessors; but as the Moors turned their arms against other Christian principalities, without prosecuting the war against him, he contented himself with the pursuit of his former measures, labouring as much as in him lay to make his subjects comprehend the necessity of resuming the frugal and industrious manner of life for which their ancestors had been distinguished. He took care likewise to second his exhortations by his example, and was always more indulgent to the meaner than the better sort of people. Don Pelayo, who was of the same faction with Don Sisenand, and who succeeded him in the bishoprick of Compostella, having slighted the king's admonitions to relinquish his vices, and to behave with more moderation to the people, Don Bermudo went thither in person, and deposed <sup>2</sup> him; upon which that false prelate, with many of his adherents, retired to the Moors, who had a little before taken the city of Zamora <sup>a</sup>, and treated the inhabitants with as little mercy as they had done those of Simencas. If the king had not been a prince of true piety, and of the most steady resolution, these misfortunes must have induced an alteration in his conduct; for the Moors were continually victorious, himself in no condition to oppose them, and the numbers of his subjects, who preferred ease and a dissolute life to all considerations of honour and religion, daily deserted him, and sought protection from the infidels.

c MOHAMMED ALMANZOR, perceiving that the frontiers of Leon lay now open, assembled a very numerous army, took the field early, with a settled intention to penetrate into the heart of the country. Don Bermudo foresaw this, and had prepared in the best manner he was able for his reception. His army, however, was much inferior to that of the infidels; but the king confiding in providence and the courage of his troops, ventured to give them battle on the banks of the river Ezla, and, after a brisk dispute, put them to flight <sup>b</sup>. But Mohammed Almanzor, when he saw his army in confusion, dismounted from his horse, sat himself down in the field, threw his turban upon the ground, and, laying his arms across his breast, declared he would remain there, since he was abandoned by his troops. This had the effect he expected; his forces returned to their charge, and the Christians, being disordered in their pursuit, were in their turn beat <sup>c</sup>. But the victory, if it was one, cost the Moors so dear, that it put it out of their power to do any thing more that campaign; so that Mohammed Almanzor satisfied himself with swearing, that, the next year, he would not fail to come and plunder Leon. The king, knowing the temper of the man, and the superiority of his forces, ordered whatever was valuable either in the city or in the churches to be removed. He likewise caused the bodies of the kings to be transported into Asturias; and having repaired the fortifications, and placed a strong garrison in Leon, he retired with his family, and most of the prelates and nobility, into the same country <sup>d</sup>.

e MOHAMMED ALMANZOR, in the beginning of the spring, invested Leon with a more numerous army than the Moors had ever brought into the field; and, having carried on the siege in form till a large breach was made, he caused it to be attacked and carried by assault; after which, he demolished it so effectually, that, except a tower which he left to mark the place where it stood, there did not remain one stone upon another <sup>e</sup>. He proceeded next to Astorga, which immediately capitulated. Supposing he should have the same good fortune where-ever he came, he entered the Asturias, and attacked the castles of Gordon and Luna; but as they were well fortified, and had good garrisons, he was repulsed with loss; upon which he returned to Cordova <sup>f</sup>. The next year he entered Portugal, made himself master of Coimbra, Viseo, and Lamego; into which he put good garrisons, and from thence proceeded to Braga, which, making some resistance, he demolished, after it fell into his hands, and sent the people into slavery. He pushed this torrent of success so far as to ravage Galicia also; and, by the assistance of that perfidious prelate Don Pelayo, and his father count Roderiques Velasquez, he entered into Compostella <sup>g</sup>, which he likewise destroyed; and would have proceeded still farther, if the flux had not prevailed among his troops, which obliged him to retreat. The king Don Bermudo ordered his generals to follow him, who made a dreadful slaughter amongst his people, which provoked him to such a degree <sup>h</sup>, that, with dreadful blasphemies and imprecations, he threatened to come the next year, and complete the ruin of Galicia (N). (N) According to Mariana's manner of relating this history, the several irruptions into the territories of the Christians by Mohammed Almanzor happened in the life of Don Ramiro, and while Don Bermudo was possessed to this, he not only drew together the whole forces of his master's kingdom, but procured a likewise great supplies from Africa; and as all this could not be done without the knowledge of the Christians, so the very terror that he took so much pains to spread, was that which turned most to their advantage; for Don Bermudo, coming in person into Galicia, laboured all he could to revive the spirits of his subjects, at the same time that he sent some of the most venerable prelates in his kingdom to solicit Don Garcias king of Navarre, and the Castilians, notwithstanding they had thrown off all allegiance to the crown of Leon, not to desert the common cause of the Christian faith, at a time when it was in such apparent danger; and these negotiations were happily conducted with as much success as he could wish, and very probably with more than he expected <sup>1</sup>.

Don Bermudo, assisted by the king of Navarre and count of Castile, gains the battle of Osma.

THIS triple alliance <sup>2</sup> thus concluded, all the princes used their utmost efforts to render their troops as complete as possible, and resolved, as the only effectual means to make any resistance against so formidable an enemy, to unite and bring but one army into the field, and this upon the frontiers of Castile, where the count Don Garcias Fernandez encamped first with his troops, and was speedily joined by the king Don Bermudo, though he was so infirm that he was carried into the field in a chair. Don Garcias, king of Navarre, brought a considerable army to the assistance of his allies <sup>3</sup>; and their troops were scarce united, before the Moors, under Mohammed Almanzor, advanced towards them, and took post in the neighbourhood of Osma <sup>4</sup>. The confederate princes reviewed their troops, and, after putting up solemn prayers to God, made no scruple of acquainting them with the true situation of things, and that the being of their respective governments, the freedom of the Christians in Spain, and, in short, all that was dear to them, either in regard to honour or to their faith, depended on their valour. The reason of this declaration was to discern the temper of the troops, and from thence to determine on the measures that were to be taken. After a short silence, the army unanimously demanded to be led to battle; and the princes, who had made the necessary dispositions, instantly began their march <sup>5</sup>. They encamped within sight of the enemy, and Mohammed Almanzor, presenting himself next day in order of battle, the Christians gallantly received, and vigorously returned the charge. The dispute lasted the whole day with such resolution, that both armies seemed invincible; but, as night came on, the Moors retired to their camp <sup>6</sup>; but the confederates remained in the field in the midst of dead and dying men, their princes using their utmost endeavours to collect and dispose the remains of their troops (for they were, in comparison of what they had been, but very few), in the best order possible; and then recommending themselves to Providence, and beseeching God either to render them his instruments in the protection of the Christian faith, or to grant them mercy for the sake of their endeavours <sup>7</sup>. As the day began to break, they were amazed to see nothing of the Moors; and, having ordered some squadrons to reconnoitre their camp, they were still more amazed that all things were as silent there. After remaining some time in suspense, they advanced in good order, and found it totally abandoned; for, upon his fessed only of the kingdom of Galicia; and, which is still more extraordinary, he places also within this period the devastation of Compostella; and, to complete all, not only ascribes to the apostle St. James the fluxes and other distempers with which the Moorish army was afflicted after the spoiling of the church dedicated to his memory, but likewise the death of that famous infidel the general himself. He therefore believes, or at least would make his readers believe, that Mohammed, who afterwards commanded the army of Cordova, and who took his defeat so heavily, that he died of hunger, rage, and despair, at Medina Celi, was not Mohammed Almanzor, but another Mohammed, who succeeded him in the post of Albagib at Cordova. Where or how he collected this, is difficult to know; for here he plainly deserts his old guide archbishop Roderic, who states these matters briefly, but pretty much in the same manner that we do; and this variation is made for no other reason, that we can discern, than purely to ascribe the death of that fatal and implacable enemy of the Christian name in a special manner to the indignation of St. James; which, how consistent it is with common sense, with the principles of the Christian religion, or the rest and peace ascribed to the saints, who have departed this life, is left to the decision of the reader. But certainly the clearness and consistency of the whole current of events, as they are stated in the text from the authority of several antient writers, and the concurring judgment of Ferreras, makes it probable that they are digested in their right order, since it is the nature of truth to be easy, perspicuous, and uniform, as, upon a close inspection, our dates will be found; whereas they lie in such a manner in the history of Mariana, that the year in which any particular fact happened cannot be certainly distinguished; which seems to imply that this great man himself was not satisfied as to the manner in which he ranged these important events; and as he does not cite the authorities upon the credit of which he related them in the manner he has done, we are constrained, though unwillingly, to lay the blame wholly upon himself; and this the rather, because he seems to have been convinced of his own mistake, and, to cover it, introduces a second destruction of Compostella by the Moors, under the command of this other Mohammed, of whom he gives a very high character, and, among other circumstances, mentions this, that he governed the kingdom of Cordova for twenty-five years. If so, how could Mohammed Almanzor have the supreme command in the same kingdom at the same time? or, rather, how is it possible to doubt that this very character belongs to Mohammed Almanzor?

<sup>a</sup> retreat, Almanzor found his loss so great, that he ordered those who were left to shift for themselves, and, retiring himself to Medina Celi, obstinately refused food, and died for want of sustenance<sup>1</sup>; which, considering his implacable enmity to the Christians, was a consequence as favourable as the victory.

THIS victory, however, was as glorious as it was decisive. It is affirmed, how incredible soever it may appear, that the infidels lost an hundred thousand men<sup>2</sup> upon the spot; the plunder of their camp enriched all the christian armies; and, separating soon after, they returned to their respective counties<sup>3</sup>. Don Bermudo being in a very precarious state of health, a great nobleman in the Asturias, flattering himself with vain hopes, endeavoured to murder the infant Don Alphonso, this monarch's only son; for which he was punished as he deserved, and his estate given to the church of Oviedo; which grant<sup>4</sup> is the sole memorial of this extraordinary fact. A very short time after, Don Bermudo, who, from his being grievously afflicted with that distemper, was surnamed the Gouty, departed this life<sup>5</sup>, in the year of our Lord 999, in Galicia, and was buried at a place called Valbuena. Don Pelayo, bishop of Oviedo, who flourished in the twelfth century, and wrote a history of his reign, has extremely blackened his character, with what view it is impossible to discover; but that this is the fact, appears by the comparison of his writings with those authors who were contemporaries with this monarch, as well as from certain circumstances he relates, and which cannot possibly be true; and yet from this chronicle many things have been inadvertently borrowed by other historians.

<sup>c</sup> THERE have been few instances of a regency better conducted than this, during the minority of Don Alphonso V. of Leon, who was educated with such care, that he became one of the wisest and best princes of his time; and, as a proof of his gratitude to Don Melendo Gonzales, his governor, he married, with the consent of the queen his mother, and of the principal nobility, his daughter Donna Elvira<sup>10</sup>, a princess whose great virtues, and more especially her humility, made her universally beloved. Upon her son's marriage, the queen dowager retired, with her two daughters, into the monastery of St. Pelayo, at Oviedo; and Ferreras<sup>11</sup> has very clearly proved, that the strange story told by Pelagius bishop of Oviedo, whom we have before mentioned, of Don Alphonso's forcing his sister Donna Theresa to espouse, against her will, a Moorish prince of Toledo, is an absolute falshood, notwithstanding the credit given to it by many eminent writers. From the time of his marriage the king governed his dominions without assistance, and gave such encouragement for rebuilding the towns that had been destroyed, and repeopling the country that had been abandoned, as had all the effect he could desire, at the same time that it prompted the nobility to follow his example, and procured him the esteem and affection of all his subjects. It is true, that the civil wars amongst the Moors afforded him the leisure to do all this; and the flight of the Christians out of their dominions, who, in such times of confusion, were plundered by all parties, furnished him with the means (Z).

(Z) We find in Mariana the story mentioned in the text, of Don Alphonso's forcing his sister the Infanta Donna Teresa to marry Abdalla the Moorish king of Toledo, with the pathetic speech made by that princess at the time that Abdalla would have consummated his marriage, in which she exhorted him to become a Christian, and threatened

At length his dominions having, in a great measure, changed their appearance, the king <sup>a</sup> solicited his nobility <sup>b</sup> to assist him in the rebuilding of Leon, which they readily promised, and as cheerfully accomplished, the king in person presiding over that important work. When it was in some measure finished, the king summoned an assembly of the states <sup>c</sup>, which was opened on the first of August 1020; at which time the cathedral church was consecrated, and many new regulations made for restoring the discipline of the church, and for promoting industry and frugality among the people. Four years afterwards he caused the city of Zamora <sup>d</sup> to be repaired; to which he also gave particular attention, on account of his design to render it the strongest place on his frontiers; and when he once saw it in a state of defence, he thought it time to accustom his subjects to make incursions into the territories of the infidels. The next year he passed the Duero with a considerable army, and marched to Viseo, where, <sup>e</sup> the Moors having a good garrison, the place made some defence; so that he was constrained to besiege it in form. The weather being very hot, the king rode without his cuirass, in order to determine the place where a breach should be made, and, by this imprudence, he was mortally wounded by an arrow from the walls, and died <sup>f</sup> in his tent, May the 5th, 1027, in the 28th year of his reign, and the 34th of his life. His body being removed to Leon, was interred in the church of St. John the Baptist, sincerely regretted by his subjects, by whom, for his piety, liberality, and courage, he was universally beloved. He left by his queen two children, the prince Don Bermudo, and the infanta Donna Sancha.

Don Bermudo
III. succeeds
his father under a regency.

THE nobility made no scruple of declaring Don Bermudo king <sup>m</sup>, in the room of his father; and the disturbances continuing, and even increasing, among the Moors, afforded the queen <sup>e</sup> dowager, and the principal lords intrusted with the regency, time to establish the tranquility of the kingdom, not a little disturbed by the unexpected death of the late monarch. The king of Navarre <sup>n</sup>, who had the principal care of Don Garcias count of Castile, gave the clearest assurances to the young king of Leon of his esteem and respect, as well as of his resolution to perform punctually the engagement into which he had entered with the king his father; all which gave great satisfaction to the nobility, who likewise saw with pleasure a sedateness and an activity in their young monarch, not to be expected at his years. Don Sanchez king of Navarre, conceiving it high time to marry his ward, applied himself to the court of Leon, and represented the great advantages that would result to the common cause of the Christians in Spain, and to the kingdom of Leon in particular, by the marriage of the young count Don <sup>d</sup> Garcias of Castile with the infanta Donna Sancha; which being indeed apparent, the king, the queen-mother, and the nobility, were equally ready in embracing the proposal <sup>o</sup>. A little before the time prefixed for this marriage, some affairs of importance obliged Don Bermudo to repair into the Asturias; but he promised to return to Leon against the day appointed for their marriage.

At this juncture, Roderic, Diego, and Inigo, the sons of the count de la Vela, were meditating, from a principle of revenge, the death of the innocent Don Garcias count of Castile; and, concluding that the absence of Don Bermudo might facilitate this, they resolved to put their wicked design in execution at Leon. Accordingly having conveyed themselves into that city, the very night that Don Garcias arrived, they took an opportunity, as he went next day <sup>e</sup> to church, to stab him <sup>p</sup> in the street; and though they were immediately attacked by the nobility of Castile and Leon, who were about him, yet, being well attended and well provided with arms, they carried their point in making their escape <sup>q</sup>. They found means afterwards to surprise the town of Moncon, in the neighbourhood of Palentia, where they doubted not but to be able to defend themselves till they could be relieved by the Moors. But in this they threatened him with the divine vengeance, in case he persisted in his design of gratifying his passion. But whereas Don Pelayo asserts, that this monarch violated the princess by force, and fell soon after into a mortal disease, upon which he sent back the infanta with prodigious rich presents, who retired immediately into a monastery, where she past the remainder of her days; Mariana suggests that he recovered, because he found that this Abdalla, king of Toledo, was taken prisoner, and put to death, by Hiffem king of Cordova. However, a little attention to the facts mentioned in the paragraph above, will put it beyond all doubt, that this story is not true in any particular circumstance, but in the whole a groundless fiction, because Abdalla was taken and killed, Anno Domini one thousand and thirteen; whereas don Alphonso did not assume the government of his dominions till the year after. There is the more reason to correct this error, because, as Mariana followed the bishop of Oviedo in his strange tale, so a celebrated French writer has made no scruple of following Mariana; so that, unless it be prevented by the timely exposition of so base and injurious a falsehood, it may, out of deference to such authorities, be transcribed and propagated through other nations, as has been the case of other fabulous narrations.

a were mistaken; for Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, followed them with such expedition, and prosecuted the siege with such vigour, that the place was very quickly taken by storm, and all the garrison put to the sword, except the three assassins, who, by order of the king, were deservedly burnt alive<sup>r</sup>.

THIS monarch was become now exceeding powerful, as having added many fair provinces to his hereditary kingdom of Navarre, to which he now annexed the county of Castile<sup>s</sup>. Don Bermudo therefore applied himself to this great king, in order to obtain the daughter of count Sanchez of Castile, whose name was Donna Urraca Theresa. That monarch, desirous of uniting him to his interests, yielded very readily to his request, and the marriage was solemnized<sup>t</sup> towards the close of the year with great splendor and magnificence. The next year there happened some stir in Galicia; and the queen was delivered of a son<sup>u</sup>, baptized by the name of Alonso, who did not live many days. The commotions in Galicia being again renewed, and the malecontents under another chief, having broke out into open rebellion, Don Bermudo, who was a prince of great vivacity, marched thither so speedily with a body of forces, that these plunderers abandoned their country, to prevent falling into the king's hands, who confiscated their estates<sup>w</sup>, and gave them to the church of St. James at Compostella. About the same time, he deposed and imprisoned the bishop of that see for his bad behaviour and immoral life<sup>x</sup>; a clear proof, not only of the virtue and spirit of this young prince, but likewise of his preserving that prerogative which had been exercised by his predecessors the antient kings of the Goths<sup>y</sup>; for, notwithstanding the popes before this time had begun to extend their authority over the clergy in Spain, yet it is plain they had not begun to question the royal power in reforming ecclesiastical as well as temporal abuses, because, in all probability, they had not hitherto a fair opportunity.

Don Sanchez king of Navarre, having given orders for repairing the cathedral and city of Palentia, which he considered as a place belonging to his country of Castile, Don Bermudo expressed great resentment thereat, asserting that it belonged to his kingdom of Leon; and, notwithstanding all the reasons that could be offered to dissuade him from it, declared war against him; upon which Don Sanchez, at the head of a numerous army, made an irruption into his dominions, and in a short time became master of all the countries between the rivers of Pisuerga and Cea, and, before the close of the campaign, besieged and took the city of Astorga<sup>z</sup>. Don Bermudo saw this with grief and resentment, as not having an army sufficient to hinder it; and therefore retiring into Galicia, he spent the winter in recruiting his forces, and, in the spring, marched with a numerous army to recover what he had lost<sup>a</sup>. But Don Sanchez, being determined to preserve his conquest, had likewise assembled the forces of Castile, and prepared to give him battle, which was prevented by the interposition of the prelates who attended them both. These represented the consequences of this dispute in so strong a light, that a peace<sup>b</sup> was at length concluded; by which Don Bermudo made a cession of the country between the two rivers, as the portion of his sister Donna Sancha, and the king of Navarre gave Castile to his second son Don Ferdinand, who, it was agreed, upon espousing the infanta, should assume the title of king<sup>c</sup>. This marriage was accordingly celebrated at the time pre-fixed at Leon; and Don Bermudo, to shew the sincerity of this reconciliation, or rather to dis-semble the insincerity of it, put himself to such an expence as in those days amazed all the beholders, and in that respect very probably answered his purpose<sup>d</sup>.

THIS conjunction of interests was equally acceptable to the people of Navarre, Castile, and Leon, who saw themselves from thence protected against all apprehensions of the Moors, who were at this juncture involved in numberless quarrels among themselves, and split into so many principalities, that they were far less terrible to the Christians than in times past. One would have imagined that, having this example before his eyes, and being, as he really was, a very wise and penetrating, as well as great and good king, Don Sanchez would not have been guilty of the same error, or have taken, at the end of his days, a resolution of putting, as far as was in his power, the Christians on a level with the Moors in this respect; but his paternal affection for his four sons overcame all other considerations; so that, at his decease, which happened in the succeeding year, that is, in 1035<sup>e</sup>, he divided his extensive dominions amongst them, and so made them all kings. Don Garcias had Navarre, Biscay, and the province of Rioja<sup>f</sup>; Don Ferdinand kept the kingdom of Castile, which had been bestowed upon him in his father's life-time; Don Gonfales had the counties of Sobrarva and Ribargorze, with the title of king<sup>h</sup>;

and Don Ramiro, Arragon<sup>1</sup>. This power, which had been so formidable in the hands of a one, became far less so by this division; and as at first sight the consequence might be apprehended by reason, so it was immediately afterwards justified from experience, in many instances, of which we shall have occasion to speak in their turns; but at present our business lies only with the first, the consequences of which were very considerable.

Don Bermudo invades Castile, and recovers all he had formerly yielded.

DON Bermudo had yielded very unwillingly a considerable district, for the sake of peace, and because he found his subjects were not inclined to support him in a war against the king of Navarre; and though at last he seemed to come into this with a good grace, by that magnificence with which he celebrated his sister's wedding, yet he retained the resentment of this disgrace, and the desire of wiping it away, whenever a favourable opportunity offered; so that we need not at all wonder that he took the advantage of Don Sanchez's death, and the division he had made of his territories, to recover the country he had lost. It is certain that he used but little ceremony on this occasion; for marching immediately with a considerable body of troops into the territories of his brother-in-law, he besieged and took the city of Palencia, which had given rise to the first dispute. As the inhabitants of the adjacent places were willing to return to their old master, and as Don Ferdinand did not think fit to take the field in their defence, the king of Leon did his business in a single campaign, and then returned in triumph to his capital<sup>k</sup>, without attempting any thing farther; and it might be with an opinion that a negotiation might secure what by force of arms had been acquired; yet in this, as it often happens to princes of greater experience than Don Bermudo, he found himself absolutely mistaken, and that the measures which he had ascribed to timidity, or a sense of former injustice, were in reality the effects of policy and a superior understanding (A).

Is slain at the battle of Carrion, through his own rashness and indiscretion.

DON Ferdinand had raised a considerable force, in order to cover his country, if the king of Leon had attempted to push his conquests any farther; but, instead of sending to intreat a peace, as was expected, he applied himself to his brother Don Garcias, and demanded supplies from him, upon a presumption that Don Bermudo meant to annex his kingdom to his own. Don Garcias, either out of fraternal affection, or from a just apprehension that Don Bermudo would become too formidable a neighbour if he should re-annex Castile to Leon, marched with a strong body of his father's veteran troops to join those of Don Ferdinand that were encamped in the neighbourhood of Burgos<sup>l</sup>. The king of Leon had no sooner intelligence of the motions of the two brothers, than he drew together the force of his three kingdoms, Asturias, Leon, and Galicia, and, with an army far superior to that of the kings of Navarre and Castile, entered into the last-mentioned kingdom, and advanced as far as the valley of Tamara, near Fromista<sup>m</sup>. The two brothers, seeing that nothing was to be expected but from force, put their troops likewise in motion, which brought on a decisive battle near

(A) We find in Mariana a great disposition to represent this last monarch of Oviedo and Leon as a prince of a very mild and pacific disposition; one whom the misfortunes of his father, killed at a siege, made extremely cautious, and who was therefore oppressed and ill-treated by Don Sanchez the Great, 'through the invasion of his country unexpectedly, and without cause. This, however, from a comparison of what is said by our old historians, seems a little remote from the real temper of that young prince, and from the nature of the facts. Don Bermudo was very far from being either a weak or a tame prince: he knew very well when his just rights were invaded, and had spirit enough to resent such an injury. But Don Sanchez believed, or pretended to believe, that Palencia belonged to Castile, and consequently devolved to him with the rest of that country. He apprehended that his great interest with the clergy would be of high use to him upon this occasion; and he judged that a district of country would be to the full as useful as the possession of the city he was now about to rebuild. Don Bermudo seems to have understood this perfectly well, and to have acted with all the spirit and caution that so critical a conjuncture demanded. But when he came to act, the clergy, who had also a great influence over the nobility, restrained him from going to extremities, and projected a peace upon very plausible, if not very equal terms. For tho' king Bermudo did not recover what he judged to be taken from him, yet his right seems to have been acknowledged by its being accepted as the portion of his sister. We may also, without difficulty, perceive, that such as invented this expedient might very possibly have a good intention, and believe that they did none of these princes wrong. As for Don Sanchez, he was an old threwd politician, and a very potent king; so that it might be esteemed a point of right policy rather to gratify his ambition for the present, than to divert the infidels with so sad a spectacle as Christians destroying Christians, in a quarrel about little or nothing, if compared with the consequences resulting from such a war. In the next place, it restored the equality of these princes, and, in that light, might serve to take away the apprehensions that Don Bermudo might be under from the rapid growth of his neighbour's power; and, lastly, it was well contrived to unite the three crowns against the common enemy. Upon these principles the prelates and nobility acted a part consistent with their characters, inasmuch as they seemed to prefer the general interest to the personal quarrels of princes. We may add to all this, that, according to their constitution of government, if they were disposed to make such a cession for the sake of peace, the king had no right to oppose it; and it is very far from being improbable that he submitted to these reasons, though there is nothing clearer than that he submitted against his will, and with a view only to gain time; which is another mark that he was by no means of so gentle and compliant a temper as Mariana represents him: but whether this detracts from or raises his character, we shall not decide; all we aim at is to give the reader a thorough and complete view of a transaction, upon which it is indisputable that the fate of this king and kingdom depended.

a Carriou. The great impetuosity of Bermudo's temper engaged him to charge with the cavalry that were about his person into the very centre of the enemy's troops, where, while he looked about for either of the two kings, he was thrust into the breast by a spear, and immediately sunk down from his horse<sup>n</sup>. Such as attended him, believing he was wounded, fought desperately on all sides, that they might have room to remount and carry him off; but when they came to take him up, they perceived that he was dead; and this sunk their spirits so much that they became an easy prey to the enemy<sup>o</sup>.

THE knowlege of this event was no sooner spread through the army than every thing fell into confusion, and that martial spirit, for which they had been so long famous, deserted them at once; so that, in all probability, a dreadful carnage had been made amongst people so astonished, that they wanted presence of mind to defend themselves; but Don Ferdinand, who was a prince of deep penetration and magnanimity, interposed, and, with some peril to himself, put an end to the dispute<sup>p</sup>. He then ordered the body of the king his brother-in-law to be taken up, and sent back to Leon, with orders that it should be interred with all imaginable marks of esteem and deference<sup>q</sup>, which had a good effect upon the minds of the people, and disposed them to afford him a quiet, if not a cheerful reception. For, as soon as that melancholy solemnity was over, Don Ferdinand made his public entry into Leon; and representing to the nobility, that the male line of Reccared the Catholic, by Don Pedro duke of Cantabria, was extinct in their late sovereign, and putting them in mind that he had married his sister, they readily acknowledged him for their king<sup>r</sup>, and he was accordingly crowned on the 22d day of June 1037, in the cathedral, by the then bishop of Leon. The subjects of that monarchy in general acquiesced under this revolution, the Galicians only excepted, who began to take up arms in maintenance of their liberty; upon which Don Ferdinand marched with his forces to the frontiers of that province, and partly by persuasion, partly by menaces, prevailed upon them to be quiet; only some who, from their old hatred to the Castilians, were determined never to submit to him, retired under Don Sisenand, a powerful and high-spirited nobleman, into the territories of a Moorish king, whose capital was Seville, and put themselves under his protection<sup>s</sup>.

THUS this monarchy, after it had subsisted almost 320 years, under twenty-three princes, from Don Pelayo and his race, came at length, partly by marriage, and partly by conquest, to be united to that of Castile; yet not so thoroughly but that it was afterwards disjoined and governed by its particular princes, but all of the house of this Don Ferdinand, till by degrees, and after repeated convulsions, these states were so thoroughly moulded and incorporated with each other, as not to admit of any future separation. But before we proceed to the detail of these events, it will be necessary, for the sake of perspicuity, and a steady adherence to the method which we have hitherto pursued, to give the reader a succinct account of the princes of Castile, from the time of its being recovered out of the hands of the Moors, to its conjunction with the kingdom of Oviedo and Leon.

The history of Castile, from the time of its being recovered out of the hands of the Moors, to the time of its being erected into a kingdom, in favour of Don Ferdinand, the son of Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, and who married Donna Sancha, sister and heiress of Don Bermudo, the third king of Leon.

e THE history of this country, and those who governed it within this period, is exceedingly embarrassed and perplexed, through the want of authentic records; the liberties that have been taken to supply these by fables and forgeries, and the unwillingness that some great men have shewn to have these coverings, bad as they are, taken away, and the naked and undisguised truth brought to light. In order, however, to make things as easy and as evident to our readers as possible, to decline intricate or trivial disputes as much as may be, and not to affect criticism to such a degree of severity as to hide from their knowlege those marvellous traditions, which in early ages passed for undoubted truths, we will relate as briefly as may be both the false and the true, the fictitious and the real history of the old counts of Castile; after delivering something previously, and that too as succinctly as we can, of the etymology of the name and of the situation of this country; without the knowledge of which, a what is to follow would be but imperfectly comprehended; in the discussing of which point, if we shall appear to leave things somewhat loose and undetermined, it must not be attributed to a want of diligence in our enquiries, or of a desire to come at certainty, if it had been possible, but to that obscurity, which, in spite of the endeavours of many learned men, still hangs over this period, and hinders us from seeing so clearly as we could wish: a circumstance which, how little credit soever it may bring us to confess, we nevertheless hold it our duty not to dissemble.

Opinions concerning the origin of the name of this country and people.

To begin then with the name of this country and people. Some have asserted, that it is to be referred to a certain old Spanish tribe, or nation, called by the Romans Castellani, who are supposed to have inhabited here as well as in Catalonia<sup>a</sup>; but, perhaps, evidence would not be easily found to establish this point, if it should be controverted. There were, indeed, a people called Callaici in Catalonia<sup>b</sup>; but if the best critics in antient geography are to be relied upon, the principal if not the only nation in this part of Spain, were the Vaccæi<sup>c</sup>; and it will surely be no easy matter to derive any thing for our purpose from among them. Others imagine that the origin of this name is to be sought no higher than the recovery of this country out of the hands of the Moors; at which time, say they, there was a strong castle built for the defence of the frontier, in which the count, or great officer of the province, resided, from whence it took its name and its arms<sup>d</sup>. There is something plausible at least, if not probable, in this, only the latter part of the argument seems to be a little defective, if we may rely on the best judges of heraldry, as to the antiquity of such kind of bearings. c However, as we are not like to meet with a better account than this, we may, perhaps, reconcile nicer critics to this notion, by observing, that if the name of the province was really derived from some such castle, this may well be supposed to have been supported by tradition, as low as the times in which arms were assumed; and then it will very well account for the assuming a castle, by way of allusion to that antient fortress<sup>e</sup>. But perhaps we may have still a better account of this matter from what we are going to relate, concerning the means by which this country was rescued out of the hands of the infidels, and annexed to that monarchy, which the Christians had formed in Asturias. For in such enquiries, one passage throws light upon another; and if, taking all things together, they appear to have an easy and natural connection, it is the best proof that can be had that they are consistent d with truth, or at least but a little removed from it; which, in such cases, is as much as can well be desired, and more than can often be met with.

Situation of this province, and the manner of its being recovered from the Moors.

We come next to describe the province of Old Castile, so called, because it was recovered from the Moors long before that which is stiled the New. As it stood in the times of which we are writing, it was separated from the kingdom of Leon by the following little rivers, Carriou, Puifergo, Heva, and Regamon; and, on the other side, it was bounded by the Asturias, Biscay, and the little province of Rioja; towards the south it had for its limits the mountains of Segovia and Avila, lying in the middle between the Christian kingdom of Oviedo and Leon, and the Moorish sovereignty of Cordova<sup>f</sup>. As this country was extremely fertile in corn and wine, abounded with excellent pasture, and was consequently e well stocked with cattle, and the best watered of any province in Spain, we need not wonder that both nations were desirous of being its masters. We are told by an eminent and elegant historian, that, even while it remained under the dominion of the Moors, there were several great lords who maintained themselves in the possession of certain districts, and who, by degrees, increasing in wealth and power, at length shook off the yoke of the infidels, and put themselves, as it was very natural for them to do, under the protection of the kings of Oviedo<sup>g</sup>. If this account be true, as at least there is no authority to prove it otherwise, we may very well believe, that these lords had each of them a well fortified mansion, or castle; whence, at the emancipation of this province from the yoke of the Moors, it might well receive that name by which it has been ever since known. The same historian tells us, that f these lords, supported by their new protector, were not only able to defend their frontier, but to extend their little territories by their excursions against the Moors, as often as any favourable opportunity presented itself; and that from hence they assumed the title of counts; and, being regarded as feudatories of the monarchs before-mentioned, were summoned in time of war to repair with their vassals to attend the king's standard, and in time of peace were called to the assemblies of the estates<sup>h</sup> (A).

- a Don Rodriguez is the first of these counts mentioned by name in the Spanish histories; and he flourished in the reign of Don Alonso el Casto, or the Chaste, whom he assisted in his wars against the infidels. Some antient writers say, that he was the father of Don Diego Porcellos, who is thought to be the same that, as we have already shewn, received the king of Oviedo's orders to rebuild and fortify Burgos. There is, indeed, another account of this matter, which is, that one Nugno Belchides, a German lord, making a pilgrimage into Spain to the tomb of St. James, being kindly entertained by this count, resolved to remain with him, and to assist in defending the country against the infidels. Don Diego was so charmed with the generosity of this stranger, that he gave him in marriage his only daughter Donna Sulla Bella, and, by his advice, collecting the people together out of the straggling villages, b he brought them to live in a town, which he surrounded with walls, and gave it the name of Burgos, from the German word Burgh<sup>i</sup>. It must be admitted, that this has so much the air of a fable as not to deserve any credit; but then to infer from hence, that the counts in Castile were not hereditary, seems to be carrying the matter too far; since, rejecting the fable, we may retain the history, and allow Don Diego, the son of Don Rodriguez, to have built the city of Burgos, not by the advice of this son-in-law, but by the order of Don Alonso the Great<sup>k</sup>. What seems to render this probable, and to give some degree of evidence to the before-mentioned account of the origin of these nobles, is our finding that there were many of them at the same time; such as the count Don Fernand Ansules, Don Almondar el Blanco, or the white, and Don Nugno Fernandez; which plainly intimates, that they did not receive c either their authority or titles from the kings of Oviedo, but were indebted to them only for their protection<sup>l</sup> (B).

have the government of certain provinces (1). The privileges or prerogatives of both sorts of counts were precisely the same; that is to say, they had a vote in the election of kings, a seat in the assembly of the states, and were not liable to any inferior jurisdiction. On the other hand, these counts were bound to perform their offices in the palace, to raise the forces of their provinces at the king's command, and to repair to the assembly of the states, when and wherever it was summoned (2). We may easily collect from hence, that if a nobleman associated with, and submitted himself to, a prince to whom he was not born a subject, he must take upon him the duties of such an officer at the same time that he acquired the prerogatives; so that, except the hereditary possession of estate, and it may be title, which, as the king did not give, he could have no right to take away, this associated count stood in just the same point of light with all other counts; that is, did the like homage to the king, and owed the same service to the crown. It must be acknowledged, that the case would be very hard, if we were obliged to make out every circumstance here advanced by indisputable authorities; and yet this does not in the least destroy either the force or the credit of what is advanced, because, while it is in our power to shew the general form of this government, it concludes clearly as to all that has been offered concerning this dignity. The kings of Oviedo and Leon were elective and limited in their power, and therefore so must their companions be; in which sense, according to the natural meaning of the Latin word Comes, the best Spanish lawyers have understood the import of this title (3). But as the king was no longer considered in that capacity than while he governed according to the laws, so we may be sure these counts were under the like restrictions; and, though they were the king's companions, they were not his masters, or privileged to disobey these orders, which, in virtue of his dignity, the king, whom themselves had elected, had a right to issue, for the benefit of the state.

(B) We may more clearly apprehend what is advanced in the text, if we consider the meaning of the Spanish word Castellania, which is derived from Castillo, or, as it was antiently wrote, Castil, which we find thus asserted in the dictionary of the royal academy: A separate territory, in the manner of a province, independent of any other; in which its particular laws are observed, and which has a jurisdiction over all the places dependent on its capital (4). This clearly points out what kind of authority these lords had; who, upon the general wreck of the Gothic monarchy, seized upon whatever they were able to keep and to defend against the common enemy. It is, therefore, very probable, that, as they were independent of each other before they joined themselves to the kingdom of Leon, they remained so for some time afterwards; and that it was not long before Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, who threw off this yoke of homage, as he esteemed it, that any single person assumed the title of count of Castile, but at the same time his ancestors first became eminent. It is at least not repugnant to probability to suppose, that they might be intrusted with a superiority of power by the kings of Leon, which, setting them above those who were as good as themselves at home, made way for their notion, that there could be none better abroad; and thus pride might easily suggest the desire of receiving, in their own right, the respect paid them as representatives of their master (5). As to the city of Burgos, it was raised out of the ruins of the antient town of Auca, or Occa, from whence the adjacent ridge of mountains is stiled Sieras de Occa (6). The air of this capital is very sharp; the inhabitants of that, and of all the fifty towns, hamlets, and villages, under its jurisdiction, are hardy, industrious, and robust (7); and it is universally allowed, that the Spanish language, or, as called by themselves, Lengua Castellana, is spoken with greater purity here than in any other part of his catholic majesty's dominions (8). It contests with Toledo, the capital of New Castile, the precedence in the states, and upon all public occasions; and it is thought the dispute will not be speedily ended.

How, amongst the great lords,
one came to be styled the count
of Castile.

In order to form a clearer idea of this, we are to consider, that the counts, to whom the grandees have succeeded, were appointed by the king; and, in process of time, such as held the government of certain districts, disposed things in such a manner as their sons succeeded them, yet always with the consent of the crown<sup>m</sup>. But, with respect to the counts of Castile, we find no traces of their being appointed by the kings of Oviedo or Leon; and if they had, there would probably have been but one count; and whenever that dignity became hereditary, it would have been in his family; whereas we have as much certainty as can be had of any thing in these times, that it was not so; but that, from the time of their becoming a province to the kingdom of Oviedo, there were several great lords, though it is not at all improbable that one of these might have the precedency in virtue of the king's appointment for the better government of the province; and also, that Don Diego might hold that dignity, when, by the command of Don Alonso, he built and fortified Burgos, which became afterwards the capital of the province, and the place where the king's count or governor resided<sup>n</sup>.

The king of Leon impris-
ons, and puts to death some of these lords as rebels.

If we consider things in this light, it seems highly probable, that Nugno Fernandez was the principal count and chief governor of Castile, at the time that Don Alonso the Great consented to a match between his eldest son, the prince Don Garcias, and the count's daughter, which, as we have already shewn, was attended with unhappy circumstances; since that prince aspired to the crown in the life-time of his father, by which he drew upon himself the king's displeasure, and a long imprisonment<sup>o</sup>. In these family quarrels the count of Castile not only countenanced his son-in-law, but also supported the queen Ximena and the prince Don Ordogno, governor of Galicia, and the younger brother of Don Garcias: so that at length, by their cabals, the good old king found it requisite to resign his crown to Don Garcias, who behaved more dutifully afterwards than he had done before; and it seems highly probable, that when, after the death of that prince, Don Ordogno came to be seated on the throne, he disapproved his brother's conduct and his own towards their father; and, on this account, retained a dislike to Don Nugno Fernandez, to whom he might impute those councils by which they were misled<sup>p</sup>. However that may be, it is certain that, having summoned that nobleman and the rest of the nobles at Castile to meet him at Burgos, in which they failed, he resolved to chastise them; but dissembling his intentions, and directing them once more to meet him at a little town called Regular, he caused them all to be arrested, and carried prisoners to Leon, and there put to death. This Don Roderic, bishop of Toledo, represents as an act of tyranny, and a very foul stain on the administration of that king, who was otherwise a prince of great virtues<sup>q</sup>. Don Lucas, bishop of Tuy, barely relates the fact without any censure; and yet Mariana, and most of the modern historians, have followed the archbishop, and treated the king as a tyrant for this very act<sup>r</sup>; but Sampiro, bishop of Astorga, who had much better opportunities of knowing the truth, is directly on the other side, justifies king Ordogno's severity, and speaks of these nobles as rebels<sup>s</sup>. But how just soever his motives might be, the manner of his getting these great men into his hands can never be defended; and therefore we need not wonder that the people of Castile were generally disobliged, or that heats and heart-burnings were hereby kindled between the two nations.

Upon which,
as is commonly believed, the Castilians revolt, and set up judges.

ACCORDING to the general current of history, the sense which the Castilians had of this act of severity, joined to some new hardships they sustained under the reign of Don Freila, who compelled them to resort to Leon for the decision of all disputes, provoked them to withdraw their allegiance from such tyrannical matters, and to set up a new form of government amongst themselves. This consisted in chusing two persons of quality, who were styled judges, and in whom the supreme power was vested. The two first, they say, were Don Nugno Rasura and Don Layn Calvo: the former of these was the son of Don Nugno Belchides, a man in years, of great experience, and of a mild and equitable temper: the latter younger, married to Nuna Bella, the daughter of his colleague, very brave and active. Don Nugno, therefore, was the legislator, and Don Layn the general of this new commonwealth<sup>t</sup>. They generally rendered justice together, seated on the same tribunal; and, as a proof of this, they shew the remains of what they call the judgment-seat at the village of Bijudico, two leagues from Medina de Pomar, as a decisive evidence of the matter of fact, asserting, that it was built for their use<sup>u</sup>. We are also told, that the laws by which their sentences were regulated made the contents of an antient volume, intitled, El Fuero de Castilla, which continued in force to the reign of Don Alphonso the Wise, by whom these laws were abolished, and a new code introduced<sup>v</sup>. It is, however, admitted, that nothing farther is known of the transactions of these magistrates; how long they remained so, or who were <sup>a</sup> their immediate successors. The truth seems to be, that the name of the village, and the ruins of something like a tribunal, together with the darkness of these times, inspired some fertile imagination with this history, that the birth of him who was really the founder of an independent sovereignty in Castile, might appear sufficiently noble: and to leave the reader in as little doubt as may be upon this head, let us intreat his patience for so much more of this story as will bring us down to this illustrious person, and we shall then dismiss these fabulous relations, which, however, he will find have passed for very good history with some very great men, as indeed what would not pass under an easy natural dress, which Mariana * gives to every story he tells.

<sup>b</sup> Don Gonzalez Nugno was the son of Don Nugno Rasura, and some say that he also be-<sup>c</sup> came one of the judges: but be that as it will, he is reported to have been a person of most extraordinary natural endowments, improved by more learning than in that age laymen usually acquired. He married Donna Ximena, the daughter of the count Nugno Fernandez, who was put to death by Don Ordogno, and who was also a lady of exemplary virtue; and a most consummate understanding. These excellent persons, having nothing so much at heart as the good of their country and the glory of the Castilian nation, bred up most of the young nobles of Castile in their own family; by which they acquired, as no doubt they well deserved, the universal esteem and affection of all ranks and degrees of people. This illustrious couple were the parents of that great hero we mentioned, Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, of whom we are now to speak, as of the real and indubitable founder of this principality, and whose actions <sup>d</sup> were in themselves too great, and his character in all respects too noble, to stand in need of any assistance of this kind; which, as it ever does, only obscures what it should illustrate, and renders that doubtful and suspected that would be otherwise sufficiently conspicuous in its natural and proper point of light (C).

For, after all, it is morally certain, that no credit is to be given to this genealogy, but that it is infinitely more probable this great man was the son of Don Fernandez Gonzalez, lord of Lara in Castile, and who, from authentic records, appears to have been the founder of the monastery of St. Peter de Alanca <sup>y</sup>, from whom his title and estate descended to this son; who, by his excursions against the Moors, by his hospitable and generous way of living, by his courage in war, and conduct in peace, raised himself to such an extent of power, and <sup>d</sup> to so high a reputation, that he married the infant Donna Sancha of Navarre <sup>z</sup>, and governed Castile in the same absolute manner almost as if he had been the legal master of it; but, notwithstanding this, he took care to preserve measures with the king of Leon, upon whom himself, as well as his predecessors, depended; though it is highly probable, that, as they increased in power, they endeavoured to make that yoke as light as they could; as on the other hand the great service they did, sometimes by making diversions, at others by joining their forces to the armies of Leon, made those monarchs less inclined to differ with them than otherwise they would have been. At the famous battle of Simencas <sup>a</sup> he was in the army of Don Ramiro, the second king of Leon, and had a large share in obtaining that glorious victory, notwithstanding that Mariana <sup>b</sup> and other writers affirm, he did not bring up his troops till <sup>e</sup> after the battle was over, and that then pursuing the enemy with his forces fresh and unfatigued, he did prodigious execution. But it is sufficient to destroy the credit of all that laboured relation, that he makes him found the monastery of St. Peter de Alanca in consequence of this victory, and of a vow that he made before it; which monastery, as we remarked, was certainly founded many years before; and, as there is just reason to believe, by his father.
 However, by him, if any credit be due to the charters and privileges by them produced, it could never be founded.

In the following year he thought fit to disobey that monarch's orders, with respect to fortifying the frontier; and, as some writers say, entered into a confederacy against him with the Mohammedans; which is not at all probable, since we find that the count Ferdinand Gon-<sup>f</sup> zalez and the count Diego Nunez, were the next year reduced and brought to Leon, from whence the king sent them to two separate castles, and kept them some time in captivity;
 but at length, by the interposition of the nobility, and very probably of the king of Navarre, whose sister Don Ferdinand had married, he was set at liberty, reconciled to the king,

(C) When we attribute these stories in a very particular manner to Mariana (4), it is by no means to be understood, that he is chargeable with the mention of them, but that the honour he did them, by affording them a place in his history, has intitled them to a credit with modern historians; at which, without his assistance, they could never have arrived.

and the prince Don Ordogno married to his daughter <sup>a</sup>. At this time there is nothing clearer, than that Don Ferdinand and Don Diego both were feudatories to the king of Leon; for had it been otherwise, no doubt but the king of Navarre would have sent them assistance, and prevented his brother-in-law's disgrace; but he was too great and too wise a prince to protect him from the just resentment of his sovereign, otherwise than by an interposition of good offices in his favour, which we see had the desired effect, and produced a reconciliation, at least for the present <sup>d</sup>.

<sup>a</sup> Marries his daughter to the prince Don Ordogno, with whom he differed after his accession, which occasions his parting with his queen. But, without all question, Don Ferdinand was inclined to render himself independent; and there is nothing more probable, than that the king, by marrying his son to Donna Urraca, the count's daughter, meant to divert him from that design, and to fix his and his successor's fidelity to princes that were of their own blood. Count Ferdinand Gonzalez, however, <sup>b</sup> was too great a politician to be governed by such a consideration; and therefore the king was no sooner dead, than he joined with his brother-in-law of Navarre to prescribe terms to Don Ordogno, who had married his daughter, and this with a view of making his brother Don Sanchez king of Galicia, by which the power of that monarchy being divided, he might, with safety, have set up for himself <sup>c</sup>. Yet when he saw that this scheme, though well contrived, was not easy to be executed, he did not care to run the hazard of a battle, though joined with the forces of Navarre; and this made a coldness between him and Don Sanchez, in whose favour he took or pretended at least to take up arms <sup>f</sup>. He bore also the insult offered him, by the sending back the queen of Leon, with great seeming patience, which was purely the effects of his policy, since it afterwards sufficiently appeared that he was sensible enough of the affront <sup>e</sup>. His interest governed him then, and indeed upon every other occasion: the great point he had in view was to render himself independent; and this he pursued indefatigably, till at last he attained it, as we shall shew in its proper place. But this character of him, founded on facts, renders some stories of him by Mariana altogether incredible (D).

<sup>a</sup> Don Ferdinand procures the deposition of Don Sanchez, king of Leon, and marries his daughter to Don Ordogno the Wicked, who supplanted him. HE pushed his dissimulation still farther; and, upon Don Ordogno's making an irruption against the Moors, he likewise took a share in the war, and made a seeming diversion in the king's favour; though at the same time it answered a great purpose of his own; for the infidels had built a strong fort at Corazo, on the frontiers of his country, which was a great thorn in his sides, and which he took this opportunity to remove <sup>b</sup>. Some writers say; that <sup>d</sup> he gained at the same time a great victory over the infidels; but that seems not a little doubtful, or rather it is confounded with another victory, of which we shall speak hereafter. It is, however, certain, that he took and demolished the fortress of Corazo; and though by this he so apparently served his own turn, yet when, the year following, Don Ordogno, at the head of his numerous and victorious army, was on the point of entering Castile, he went boldly to that prince, pleaded the service he had done in the preceding campaign, and, by promising a steady adherence to his duty for the future, diverted that storm by which he must have been otherwise overwhelmed <sup>i</sup>: and when the Moors, in revenge of that action, invaded his territories, he demanded and received such assistance from Don Ordogno, as enabled him to gain a victory at St. Stephen de Gormez which intirely broke the force of the infidels, <sup>e</sup> and left him nothing to fear on that side for many years to come <sup>k</sup>. The king of Leon, he so much dreaded, dying soon after, he set on foot those intrigues against his brother and successor Don Sanchez, whose ally he had formerly been, as forced him to quit the throne,

(D) Instead of troubling the reader with those strange and improbable exploits which are attributed by Mariana (1), and those who have copied him, to this great man, we will content ourselves with transcribing a very judicious remark from Ferreras, which will give him more light than without his assistance we could have pretended to afford. The valiant actions of this brave man, says he (2), are so interlarded with fables and impostures, that it is very difficult to distinguish between the true and the false, as is acknowledged by Sandoval, with whom, in this point, all the critics agree. Gonzales Arredondo has written a history of this hero, which some persons, for want of judgment, have considered as containing a detail of facts; whereas all that he intended was to afford proper instruction to a prince, under colour of writing the life of Ferdinand Gonzalez, which induced him to take the liberty of inserting therein whatever appeared requisite to inspire a monarch with heroic sentiments, in the same manner that Xenophon long ago composed his work of the education of Cyrus, as is well known to the learned. For this reason, continued he, I omit whatever is mentioned in that book that is not supported by such authorities as manifest the truth of the history. We now see the true source of many of those strange things that have been already related, and, it is also hoped, sufficient reason for our declining to insert any more, as we would willingly inform without fatiguing our readers (3).

- a and retire for shelter into the territories of the king of Navarre<sup>1</sup>. Yet not satisfied with this, he took part with Don Ordogno the Wicked, son to Don Alphonso the Blind, advanced him to the throne of Leon, and by that means restored his daughter to the title of queen<sup>m</sup>. In the quarrel of this prince, the worst that ever sat upon the throne, he broke with his brother-in-law Don Garcias king of Navarre; and, being defeated and taken prisoner by him in the battle of Aronia, was carried by him to Pampeluna, where, it is highly probable, that monarch, in order to engage him to be quiet, prevailed upon his nephew Don Sanchez, king of Leon, to release him from the homage due to him in that quality; and having, by this means, provided in the best manner possible for the security and good correspondence of all the Christian powers, he, at the request of the counsels of Castile, his sister, set the count Don Ferdinand at liberty, and sent him home<sup>n</sup>. A. D. 960.

- b ABOUT four years after he involved himself in a new war with the infidels, by fortifying Sepulveda; which so provoked Albacan, king of Cordova, that he sent Mohammed, his Alhagib, or vizir, who afterwards acquired the name of Almanzor, with a powerful army to demolish it<sup>o</sup>. The count Don Ferdinand, knowing the extent of the place, suffered them to invest it, by which their army occupied so great a space of ground, that, by making a quick march, he fell upon them with an inferior body of troops with such impetuosity, that he forced the posts he attacked, divided one part of the army from the other, which made way for a total defeat, wherein they lost fifteen thousand men, and all their baggage<sup>p</sup>. A. D. 965.
- c It is observed by Ferreras<sup>q</sup>, as a circumstance subject to some doubt, that at this time the infidels were at peace with Don Sanchez, king of Leon, who notwithstanding took no umbrage at their invasion of Castile: from whence we may collect with certainty of what has been before advanced, that Don Sanchez had relinquished the sovereignty, and no longer considered count Ferdinand Gonzalez as his vassal; which is a much better reason for his conduct than that which, in most of the general histories of Spain, is very gravely asserted<sup>r</sup>.

- d WE draw now towards the conclusion of this great man's life, who, as we have observed more than once, ought to be regarded as the true author and founder of this principality; and though it cannot be denied, that, as well in point of courage and military conduct as that kind of court-craft and cunning which too often obtains the name of policy, he was one of the most distinguished persons in his time, yet many of his actions were such as nothing but ambition could suggest; so nothing but a conscience rendered callous by a frequent repetition of crimes could have borne. As for instance, at the time he projected the deposition of Don Sanchez, king of Leon, amongst other great lords whom he sought to draw into a confederacy against that unfortunate prince, one was the count de la Vela, who seems to have possessed the little fruitful country of Alava, on the same terms that Don Ferdinand Gonzalez originally held his territories in Castile<sup>s</sup> (E). The count, however, resisted all

(E) This little province, or county of Alava, has on the east the kingdom of Navarre, Old Castile on the south, and the country of Biscay on the north-west. It is in shape a long square, extending one way about 22 miles, and about 18 the other. At different times it has been accounted part of each of the countries before-mentioned; first of Navarre, on account of its being conquered from the Moors by Don Sanchez, with an intent to make it his frontier. As a part of Biscay, the kings of Oviedo and Leon claim to be lords paramount, as descendants from Don Pedro, duke of Cantabria, to whom the whole country belonged; and lastly, count Ferdinand Gonzalez acquired it at this time by conquest (1). The truth seems to be, that, with the assistance of their neighbours, the family of la Vela had induced the inhabitants to throw off the yoke of the infidels, and to live sometimes under the protection of the crown of Navarre, and sometimes under that of Leon. They seem to have been subjects of the last-mentioned power at the time that the old count de la Vela and his three sons were expelled by the count of Castile, to whom it is not impossible that Don Ordogno the Wicked, his son-in-law, might transfer his right to this country by way of composition for the great assistance that he had given him (2). But be that as it will, there can be nothing clearer than that, under some pretence or other, the count Don Ferdinand actually added this rich country to his dominions. Mariana insinuates, that it was in resentment of several irruptions made by the family of Vela into Castile (3); which, if true, must have been in the reign of Don Ordogno the third, and by his orders, at the time of his repudiating Donna Urraca (4). This old count, taking shelter at Cordova, grew there into great intimacy with Don Sanchez, king of Leon, who was an exile as well as himself; and by the help of these unfortunate princes and their adherents, who were all determined enemies of the count of Castile, the infidels received so good intelligence of every thing in that country as rendered them infinitely more able to harass the count Ferdinand than they had ever been; in most of which excursions, such is the source of implacable hatred, the counts, at the head of their followers, came in conjunction with their new allies, and were the chief instruments of the mischiefs done by them on all occa-

all his solicitations, and remained firm in the interests of Don Sanchez, even after he was a constrained to abandon his kingdom and to retire into Navarre<sup>1</sup>. The count Don Ferdinand, provoked at this, and at the same time perceiving how commodiously the country of Alava lay, if he could get it into his hands, resolved, as soon as Don Ordono was placed on the throne of Leon, and had married his daughter, to make an expedition with all his forces against that excellent lord, and oblige him to pay for his loyalty no less a price than his whole dominions; in which, not without a great struggle, he prevailed, but could not get the person of the count into his power, who, with all his family, and the best part of his dependents, made their escape, and took refuge in the court of Abderrabman, king of Cordova<sup>2</sup>. He was there received and entertained in a manner suitable to his quality; and, at his intercession in succeeding times, most of those dreadful incursions were made that b sometimes reduced both Leon and Castile within a hair's-breadth of ruin<sup>3</sup>. Notwithstanding this, and the repeated intercessions, as well of the kings of Navarre as of Leon, he never could be prevailed on to do that nobleman justice, but kept the county of Alava till the day of his death, which happened in the month of July, in the year of our Lord 970<sup>4</sup>; when he left his territory free in all respects, very much extended, and the frontier well fortified, and a great corps of intrepid and well disciplined troops, to his son, a prince of great hopes, and highly esteemed by his neighbours.

Don Garcia Fernandez succeeds his father, and is victorious over the Moors.

THE name of this young count was Don Garcia Fernandez, who, from the time he became possessed of his father's dominions, turned his thoughts intirely upon the improvement of the country, and to the emolument of its inhabitants; by which he deservedly raised a very c high reputation, and obtained not only the confidence of his own subjects, but of his neighbours<sup>5</sup>. He seems to have passed the first seven years of his government in peace, owing chiefly to the age and infirmities of one king of Cordova, and to the indolent temper of another; but this last having made choice of Mohammed Abenamir for his prime minister, who was a man of great abilities, and of an active and martial disposition, he readily listened to the repeated applications of the count de la Vela, and set on foot a numerous army, commanded by Orduan, one of the most experienced officers in his service, in order to restore him to his dominions, with whom went the count in person and most of his partisans<sup>6</sup>. As soon as count Garcias had intelligence of these formidable preparations, he strenuously solicited the assistance of Don Ramiro the third, then king of Leon, but without effect; for d that prince, being at peace with the Moors, refused to break with them upon his account. But his cousin Don Sanchez Abarca, king of Navarre, declared frankly in his favour, and began to arm immediately with the same zeal as if it had been in his own quarrel. Orduan, general of the Moors, entered Castile on the side of Osma and St. Stephen Gormez, wasting the country with fire and sword; but as soon as the troops of Navarre had joined Don Garcia he attacked them with so much vivacity, that they were quickly routed, and with the loss of a considerable body of men, as well as of their baggage, were constrained to make a precipitate retreat into the territories of Cordova, which gained count Garcia Fernandez great reputation<sup>7</sup>.

Baffles the Moors in several invasions with inferior forces.

As the infidels were highly provoked by this defeat, they levied the next year an army e very far superior to that which had been beaten, and Mohammed Abenamir, surnamed afterwards Almanzor, took the resolution of commanding it in person<sup>8</sup>. The count of Castile solicited, as before, both kings in his favour; but the one granted him none, and the other very small succours, under pretence that the former campaign had been very expensive<sup>9</sup>. The count Don Garcia, therefore, found himself so much inferior to the enemy, that he durst not hazard a battle; yet he seemed often disposed to hazard it, and by marches and counter-marches harraressed the Moors so much, that their general was excessively provoked, and at length contented himself with besieging St. Stephen de Gormez. This place was so well fortified, and defended by so strong a garrison, that his army suffered exceedingly during the sions (5). At length years, infirmities, and vexations, absolutely broke the heart of the old count de Vela, but not before he had broke that of his enemy. For several historians say, and the fact is not at all improbable, that when, after all his labours, hazards, and victories, the great count of Castile saw his barrier destroyed, and his subjects in a manner ruined, by this unnatural conjunction of Christians and Moors which he had brought upon himself, it affected him to such a degree, that he died rather of grief than any other disease (6). A dreadful example of the inconstancy of human prosperity, and the unexpected reverses of fortune, to which even the greatest politicians are always exposed!

a siege; which induced him, when the place was taken, to put the garrison to the sword, the rather, because his forces were so much diminished and fatigued, that he found himself in no condition to undertake any thing farther, and was therefore obliged to defer the bloody vengeance he threatened to take till the next year <sup>c</sup>. The next campaign was, notwithstanding, less favourable to the infidels than the former, though Don Garcia had not a better army in the field; but his fortresses were so well provided, and the Moors had so little stomach to sieges, that, after moving up and down the open country which they ravaged, they found it expedient to retire; and the next year they either did nothing, or employed their arms elsewhere <sup>f</sup>. A. D. 981.

ABOUT four years after Almanzor made a new irruption into Castile, took Sepulveda after a long siege, and several other places; from whence we may conclude, though there is no mention made of it in the Spanish histories, that he gained some advantage over the count Don Garcia, who otherwise would not have been a tame spectator of the miseries his people felt <sup>g</sup>. The resolution taken by the Moors next year to act with all their forces against the king of Leon procured the Castilians some recess, which the count employed in repairing his fortresses, and recruiting his troops. Three years after Almanzor made a new invasion, and brought with him the sons of the count de la Vela <sup>h</sup>. Don Garcia was now assisted by the kings of Leon and Navarre, but not in any proportion to the number of his enemies, who besieged and took Alienca; which, however, put an end to their progress for that year <sup>i</sup>. The next was rather more unfortunate; for the count having but a very small army in the field, they ravaged and destroyed the country at their pleasure, but without undertaking any siege. The year following Almanzor invaded Castile again, and, after endeavouring to no purpose to force Don Garcia to a battle, he, in the month of August, besieged and took Osma, after a long resistance <sup>k</sup>. This war was in a good measure suspended for the three following years; during which, however, the count Don Garcia was exceedingly perplexed with some disputes that arose between him and his cousin Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, which ended not but with the death of the latter. A. D. 986. 989. 990. 991.

WHEN the infidels renewed the war, they made a greater impression upon Castile than they had ever done, and not only took but garrisoned Corugna and St. Stephen de Gormez, which they held for several years <sup>l</sup>; and it is highly probable that they might have pushed their conquests much farther, if they had not, at this time, meditated the destruction of Leon, which they effected soon after. It was the loss and ruin of that important place that saved the Christians in Spain from being undone, by opening their eyes to the necessity of uniting, and produced that league between the kings of Leon and Navarre and the count of Castile. This first gave a check to the arms of the infidels, by the glorious victory <sup>m</sup> obtained over them in the plains of Osma, where all the three princes acted in person, and where, after the Moors were defeated, the pursuit was committed to the count of Castile, who executed it with such vigour, as drew upon him the particular resentment of the infidels. As soon as they were able to gather another army, they resolved to employ it solely against his dominions; but Don Bermudo, king of Leon, dying in the interim, engaged them to alter their intention, and to make an irruption into that kingdom, where the Moorish army, under the command of Abdilmelech, was thoroughly and shamefully beaten by the confederates, commanded by Don Garcia, count of Castile <sup>n</sup>. The year following died Don Garcias, king of Navarre, and was succeeded by Don Sanchez, afterwards surnamed the Great; and the same year Don Garcia, count of Castile, consented that the sons of the count de la Vela should be restored to their patrimony, and that a general pardon should be granted to them and all their adherents (F). (F) The propensity of the Spanish writers to give place in their general histories unto the fictions contrived to raise the lustre of particular families, has diverted them from such enquiries as would have been of infinitely more use: so that it is difficult to say whether they deserve more blame for giving place to feigned history, or for omitting such circumstances as might have illustrated what is true (1). According to Mariana's account, there was a kind of war between Leon and Castile during the best part of Don Garcia's administration, which he infers from the Moors continuing to infest Castile, without any diversion made, or any opposition given, by the kings of Leon (2). This, however, seems to be carrying things too far, and yet there is a ground of truth at bottom: Don Sanchez, king of Leon, and his son, were under such obligations to the king of Cordova as would not permit them to act against the Moors, on account of their incursions into Castile, which was now become an independent principality, which was a great misfortune to Don Garcia. On the other hand, when the Moors attacked the kingdom of Leon, the people of Castile were so enfeebled by the long war which they had sustained, that they were in no condition to yield assistance to their neighbours, which

THE young king of Navarre being arrived at an age in which it was fit for him to marry, <sup>a</sup> cast his eyes upon Donna Elvira, the daughter of Don Sanchez, and the grand-daughter of Don Garcia, count of Castile, whom he soon after demanded in marriage by his embassadors, to whom the young lady being readily delivered, the marriage was soon after solemnized with great splendor at Pampeluna <sup>p</sup>. The great joy occasioned by this event, which was indeed very favourable to the Christian cause, was very soon damped by the ill conduct of this young queen's father, who, listening to the advice of count Garcia Gomez, and some other flatterers, began to form cabals against his parent and his prince. The count Don Garcia laboured all that was in his power to convince his son of the folly of his proceeding, but to no purpose, for the prince was as obstinate as he was undutiful: so that at length the count of Castile, who was grown old in fighting against the infidels, was obliged once more to draw his sword, <sup>b</sup> in order to chastise his son <sup>q</sup>. Don Sanchez pushed things to extremities, and would not suffer their differences to be any other way terminated than by a battle, in which, it is on all hands agreed, he was thoroughly beaten <sup>r</sup>; and though Mariana <sup>s</sup> and some other historians say, that he kept up the contest notwithstanding till his father's death, yet authors <sup>t</sup>, who lived nearer these times, assert, that he was wise enough to submit to ask pardon of Don Garcia, and not only to receive it, but by signal marks of repentance, and a sincere return to his duty, effaced the very memory of his crime, which delivered the Castilians in time from a civil war, that might otherwise have rendered them an easy prey to the infidels, who, as it was very natural, began their preparations to invade Castile on the first news of this dispute.

ABDERAMA succeeded his brother Abdilmelech in the post of general, or commander in chief of the forces of Cordova; and being exceedingly desirous to signalize his entrance on that great office, by revenging his father's death and his brother's disgrace, he assembled a very numerous army, with which he invaded Castile <sup>u</sup>; and, as several of the best fortresses had been ruined, and two of them were still in the hands of the Moors, there seemed to be nothing more easy, than with superior forces to ruin and destroy the country, if not to make an absolute conquest. The count Don Garcia perceiving the enemy's design, and knowing no other way to preserve his country from ruin, assembled as many troops as he could, and with them marched to give the enemy battle. The Moors, who looked upon this step as very favourable to their design, did not at all decline an engagement; so that, <sup>d</sup> on the 28th of July, an action ensued between the towns of Alocer and Berlanga, in which the Castilians had at first the advantage <sup>w</sup>; but the count Don Garcia, penetrating at the head of his cavalry too far, was surrounded by the Moors before his infantry could come up, and most of his troops being killed, and himself dangerously wounded, was taken prisoner <sup>x</sup>; after which his army made a precipitate retreat: but by the desperate charge made at the beginning, the infidels found themselves so much weakened, that, except burning some of the places that were nearest them, they did nothing more that campaign. As for the gallant Don Garcia, he died, partly of his wounds, and partly of grief, two days after the loss of his liberty and of the battle; that is, on the 30th of July, in the year of our Lord 1005, and when he had governed Castile thirty-five years complete <sup>y</sup>. The Moorish general Abderama sent his body in triumph to Cordova, from whence, being redeemed for a sum of money, it was brought back into his own dominions, and buried in the monastery of St. Peter de Cerdagna, universally regretted by his subjects, and by the Christians in general <sup>z</sup>. <sup>e</sup> brought destruction upon the people of Leon; but at length all the Christian princes opened their eyes, and saw, what they might have seen long before, that the distress of one would very quickly become the destruction of all, and they united but just time enough to prevent it (3). All these mischiefs were the effects of Don Ferdinand Gonzalez's ambition and false politics; and therefore his son very wisely consented to recal the family of Vela, who, during their exile, had sufficiently revenged the injury done them of despoiling them of their county of Alava (4); to which it is doubtful whether they were now restored. But, however, the bringing back them and their partisans from the Moors proved of great consequence to all the Christian powers (5), who, from the beginning of the eleventh century, began to recover that superiority which they had lost for many years; and thus we have taken the liberty, by conjectures, to remove, in some measure, that obscurity in which this period is involved (6).

<sup>a</sup> DON SANCHEZ GARCIAS succeeded his father<sup>a</sup>, the ransom of whose body was the first act of his administration; and, as soon as he had paid his last devours to it, he applied himself with inexpressible diligence to recruit his forces, that he might be in a condition to revenge his death upon the infidels. Several accidents contributed to facilitate his design; his neighbours, the kings of Leon and Navarre, sent him considerable succours; multitudes of his own people, being afraid to till their lands, betook themselves to arms; and before he could take the field, a civil war broke out in Cordova<sup>b</sup>. Don Sanchez, finding his army more numerous, and the conjuncture more favourable, than he expected, disposed all things very wisely, in order to make the most of his advantage; for first he blocked up the Moorish garrisons in his own country, that they might give his subjects no disturbance in his absence, and then passing <sup>b</sup> the mountains that separate the two Castiles with the rest of his troops, he fell into the open country behind them, and having burnt three or four small places, he thereby so terrified the inhabitants of all the great cities and towns, that they immediately sent deputies to his camp, even from places at a great distance, and agreed to deliver him wine, provisions, and money; upon such terms as he thought fit to prescribe. Having thus spread terror throughout all the enemy's dominions, and fully indemnified his subjects for their want of a harvest that year, he repassed the mountains in the middle of autumn with his army, covered with glory and laden with riches<sup>c</sup>.

His good fortune did not end here. Those who had revolted at Cordova from Almahadi, Zuleiman, <sup>c</sup> who then bore the title of king, could not agree amongst themselves whom they should place upon the throne in his stead; and at length dividing in favour of two persons, they came immediately to an action, in order to decide which of these competitors they should assist to <sup>d</sup> throne the reigning prince. The name of him whose adherents were victorious in this action was Zuleiman<sup>d</sup>, who becoming master of the person of his rival, kept him closely confined; but this success, which freed him from one opponent, rendered him much less able to contend with the other; for, notwithstanding those who revolted at first were strong enough to depose Almahadi, if they could have agreed, yet the remains of both parties found themselves manifestly too weak<sup>e</sup>. In this situation Zuleiman very wisely drew off his forces from the neighbourhood of the capital, that they might be less liable to be debauched; and having seized upon certain places, where for the present they might remain in safety, he sent his <sup>d</sup> ambassadors to count Don Sanchez, to propose a firm and constant alliance between them, promising him great advantages, if, by his assistance, a passage could be opened to the throne of Cordova, and accompanied these offers with presents of great value<sup>f</sup>.

THE count of Castile received these ambassadors kindly; and having maturely weighed what they proposed, accepted the offers that were made him, and assured Zuleiman, that he would join him with his troops as soon as the season would permit them to take the field. Accordingly he not only assembled his own forces, but procured auxiliaries from the kings of Leon and Navarre, who saw with great pleasure so fair an opportunity offer of employing the Moors in the service of the Christians, and in weakening themselves. He passed the mountains with as good an army as he had led in his last expedition, and in conjunction with Zuleiman, who <sup>e</sup> received him with great joy, advanced directly towards Cordova<sup>e</sup>. Almahadi with the assistance of his Alhagib Alhamer, had drawn together a very numerous body of troops, with which he proposed to defend the city, which, as it was extremely well fortified, he looked upon as very practicable, even if the enemy had been stronger they were; but, upon the approach of the confederates, Alhamer, who had the confidence of the troops more than his master, formed a resolution of marching out and giving them battle, in which he persisted, notwithstanding all the reasons Almahadi could offer. This design he executed with the same spirit in which it was formed, but had the misfortune, notwithstanding, to be defeated by the confederates, and constrained to retire into another part of the kingdom, while they continued their march and invested Cordova, into the suburbs of which the count of Castile entered with his forces, <sup>f</sup> whom he enriched with the plunder<sup>f</sup>. Almahadi found it impossible to defend himself, and therefore made his escape<sup>g</sup>; upon which Zuleiman was received without opposition, who, rewarding the count of Castile and his forces even beyond their expectation, sent them home perfectly satisfied, and recommended to them the reduction of Alhamer, who had withdrawn himself to the frontiers of Castile<sup>h</sup>.

AT the return of the count Don Sanchez, his consort was delivered of a son<sup>m</sup>, who afterwards succeeded his father in his dominions. The next campaign the count made himself master of the fortress of Alienca, which was in the hands of Alhamer. Having dismantled it, he ravaged the rest of that country, and then returned into his own dominions, being perhaps unwilling to march again to the assistance of Zuleiman, because the count of Barcelona, and other Christian lords, had engaged themselves on the part of his competitor, and he was unwilling to see Christians destroy each other in fighting the battles of the Moors<sup>a</sup>. For want of his assistance Zuleiman was dethroned and expelled, which constrained him to retire into Africa; and this, in process of time, afforded Hissam, the grandson of Abderrahman, who was the lawful monarch of Cordova, and had been long kept in prison by different usurpers, an opportunity to mount the throne<sup>b</sup>. He found, however, very great difficulty to keep possession of it; for Abdalla, the son of Almahadi, who perished in these troubles, had got possession of Toledo, where he assumed the title of king<sup>c</sup>. On the other hand Zuleiman, returned from Africa, and bringing with him considerable reinforcements, created new disturbances, and sent a fresh embassy to the count of Castile to demand his assistance once more. But Don Sanchez, who made no scruple of assisting one tyrant against another, made a scruple of arming against Hissam, whom he took to be a lawful prince<sup>d</sup>. He therefore sent an agent to Cordova, to propose to the king, that, if he would order the Moorish garrison to evacuate St. Stephen de Gormez, Osma, Corugna, and other places, he would become his firm ally, and assist him with all his troops. Upon mature deliberation Hissam accepted this offer; in consequence of which the count of Castile began to levy troops. Hissam, to shew his confidence in the faith of that prince, honestly performed his part of the agreement, and, having given up to him all the places that he demanded, summoned the count of Castile to the performance of his promise<sup>e</sup>.

DON SANCHEZ, equally ready to do what he had stipulated, marched, at the request of his ally, to Toledo, where the troops of Hissam were already arrived; and, as soon as they had notice of the count's approach, invested the place. Don Sanchez, perceiving it to be very large and well fortified, and being also informed that it was very populous, advised the Moors to blockade it very strictly, as not only the surest but the shortest method of becoming masters of it. They took his advice, and had no reason to repent it; for in a few days the inhabitants, finding themselves oppressed by famine, seized upon the person of him whom they had stiled their prince, and surrendered the place<sup>f</sup>. After which the count of Castile, having fully made good what he promised, returned again into his own dominions. The civil war still continued between Hissam and Zuleiman, but it does not appear that the count of Castile took any father share therein on either side, but remained quiet in his own territories, where he governed his subjects with great equity and justice. Yet a body of Moors, supposed to belong to the garrison of Saragossa, made an irruption into his country, reduced Cerdagna, and put the inhabitants there to the sword; upon which Don Sanchez put himself in arms; but found they had quitted his dominions, and retired to a place of safety, whither he held it improper to follow them<sup>g</sup> (G).

(G) Among other privileges which this famous and fortunate count of Castile granted to his nobility, there is one that deserves to be particularly remembered, which is thus represented by Mariana; all the lords of that country, small and great, were obliged, as vassals to their count, to march, with such numbers of men as they could raise, whenever he summoned them to attend him in the field, without expecting any other recompence or satisfaction than what they were able to carve out for themselves at the expence of the enemy. This service, it is said, he took away, and engaged for himself and his successors, that they should have a certain consideration, proportionable to the number of men that each of them commanded, and the length of the campaign. Of the truth of this the French translator of Mariana seems to doubt, and we find not a word of it in Ferreras. As the military tenures in all the Gothic governments were much the same, it is not easy to conceive either how or why he should attempt to change them; more especially as there is nothing said of any equivalent, or of the method by which he was to raise that pay, which it is said he undertook to give them. Besides, it does not appear that he was ever in any such circumstances as could render it advisable or expedient for him to do this; or, indeed, that, upon the whole, such a privilege would have been advantageous to his nobility, since they were as much interested as he in the defence of their country, and had therefore no reason to desire, that the only effectual means of defending it should be laid aside. It is therefore highly probable, that the case was no more than this: He made two expeditions out of his own dominions as an auxiliary to Moorish princes; and it is very possible, as well as very reasonable, that he might exempt his nobility from attending him in such expeditions at their own expence, and engage to indemnify them out of the recompence or subsidy that he was to receive. It may indeed be said, that, while they were thus employed, they were in the service of their country as well as of their prince; but, at the same time, this was a kind of service to which they were not subjected by their tenures; and therefore it is very likely he would have found it difficult to comply with his engagements to the king of Cordova, if he had not by this concession cut off all grounds of dispute, and made these foreign expeditions a common concern (7).

a ABOUT this time Don Sanchez found himself under an absolute necessity of doing what he took to be an act of justice. The three sons of the count de Vela had, from the time of their return, been treated with great kindness and respect, and the count of Castile had pushed this so far, as to make choice of the eldest, whose name was Don Roderic de Vela, to be the godfather of his son and heir apparent<sup>u</sup>. But whether these lords still retained their old resentment, or whether it proceeded from the natural fierceness of their disposition, so it was, that they behaved in such a manner to the Castilians, that the count received perpetual complaints of their excesses, which in the end provoked him to such a degree, that, forgetting how fatal their former exile had been to all the Christians in Spain, he drove them a second time out of his dominions<sup>w</sup>. Upon this Don Alonso the fifth, then king of Leon, apprehensive of the ill consequences that might ensue, if they should again take shelter among the infidels, offered them a retreat in his dominions, and actually gave them lands sufficient for their subsistence, at the foot of the mountains, with which for the present they seemed to be well contented<sup>x</sup>; but, as the reader hath seen in another place, these were very far from being the real sentiments, as clearly appeared after the death of the count Don Sanchez, when an opportunity offered of glutting their resentment by the murder of his son, and by the extinction of the male heirs of the counts of Castile. But at present our business is to continue the thread of our history, by relating the remaining achievements of the count Don Sanchez.

b THE count Don Sanchez, having now an interval of peace, took great pains in correcting whatever errors had crept into his government during those stirring times, when justice is, generally speaking, silent. He repaired those fortresses that were proper to make a part of his frontier, and demolished others, that, either through an irruption of the Moors, or insurrections at home, might have proved nuisances of his dominions. He took this opportunity also to regulate with the king of Navarre the boundaries of their respective territories, to prevent any disputes in succeeding times between their descendants<sup>y</sup>. He likewise facilitated the endeavours of Don Alonso, king of Castile, in repairing the places ruined by the Moors, and more especially in restoring such churches and convents as they had demolished<sup>z</sup>. Actions that shew him to have been a wise, active, and magnanimous prince, and therefore not likely to have proceeded with so much rigour, as is reported, against his mother. However, as the fact is related by more than one historian<sup>a</sup>, and is represented as having given rise to more than one custom that still remains in general use in this country, it is not fit to hide it from the reader's knowledge, however improbable it may appear, as indeed there is hardly any thing that can wear an aspect more fabulous, or more incredible.

c THE countess dowager of Castile, it is said, forgetting her birth, her honour, and her religion, cast her eyes upon a Moorish lord, with an inclination to have married him; but being apprehensive that this would have been displeasing to her son, who might have considered such a marriage as deriving discredit on himself, she resolved to remove that obstacle to the gratification of her passion by depriving him of life. With this view she prepared a violent poison, which she put into his drink, and which she afterwards offered him with her own hands; but the count, having received information of this black design, first desired, and then obliged her to drink it herself, and thereby turned the effect of this cruel project upon its author. But, says Mariana<sup>b</sup>, how criminal soever the countess might be, her death, nevertheless, tarnished the reputation of her son, because gentler means might have been used to escape the intended evil, to punish the countess, and to put it out of her power to make any future attempts of the like kind. Some authors assert, that from hence arose the practice in Spain of the ladies drinking first<sup>c</sup>. It is also alleged, that the count himself, regretting the severity, built the noble monastery of Ona as an expiation of his crime. But, with much greater probability, others assert, that it was erected to gratify the desire of one of his daughters, who was inclined to quit the world, and became the abbess of this new foundation<sup>d</sup>.

d As the civil wars amongst the infidels still continued, when the count had adjusted all his domestic concerns, he was willing not to let slip so favourable an opportunity of extending his dominions; and therefore taking the field, with a complete corps of well disciplined troops, he presented himself before Penafiel, which, after a short siege, he reduced. After taking Ma-deruelo and Montijo, he at length invested Sepulveda, a place strong by nature, and even then somewhat assisted by art, with a good garrison, which enabled it to make a great resistance; however, being a place of consequence, a mark of triumph in the infidels, a thorn in the sides of his subjects, he pushed it so vigorously, that at length it fell into his hands<sup>e</sup>, which enabled him to clear all that neighbourhood of the Moors, and to take such precautions as might, for the future, put it out of their power to harass his subjects as in times past. He seems to have been thus employed, when he was seized with that distemper which brought him to the grave, to the great regret of his subjects, who loved him as he deserved, since few princes have been either more fortunate or more indulgent. He deceased <sup>f</sup> February the fifth, in the year of our Lord 1022. Mariana <sup>g</sup>, and indeed some other writers, place his death six years lower, but without any great appearance of reason, because it is not reconcileable to the current even of their own narrations. His body was interred in the monastery of Ona (H) which he founded, and, at the time of his decease, he left behind him four children, Don Garcias Sanchez his successor, and three daughters, Donna Nugna Elvira, who married Don Sanchez king of Navarre, Donna Urraca Theresa, who became afterwards the consort of the king of Leon, and Donna Frigida, who was abbess of the monastery before-mentioned <sup>h</sup>.

Don Garcias Sanchez succeeds his father and proves a prince of vast hopes.

Don Garcias Sanchez <sup>i</sup> succeeded his father under the tuition of Donna Elvira his mother, and the protection of Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, his uncle. There is a general concurrence of the Spanish writers <sup>k</sup> to raise this young prince into a kind of miracle, with respect both to his person and his parts, but at the same time they are very much divided about his years, since most of them make him but nine, whereas we, following the other computation, esteem him then to have been about fourteen; the rather, because we find, that, on the 25th of May 1025, his mother died <sup>l</sup>, and recommended him to the care of Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, who very soon after thought of marrying him. Besides, the person and the parts of a child of nine years old, though they may raise hopes, hardly excite admiration; whereas at fourteen, if he was really of such a superior genius, there is nothing absurd in supposing, that it might be discerned and distinguished even by foreigners as well as his own subjects; and as this was actually the case, it serves greatly to fortify that notion. However, notwithstanding the pregnancy of his parts, and the respect due to his father's memory, there wanted not some among his subjects, who were willing to take the advantage of his youth, and to disturb the peace of his dominions. The chief of these was Don Ferdinand Gutierrez, who made himself master of the castle of Moncon, and is reported to have had some connection with the infidels <sup>m</sup>.

Is assassinated by the counts Roderic, Diego, and Inigo de la Vela, at Leon.

BUT Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, under colour of providing a proper match for his nephew, made a tour into Castile, and brought with him, by way of escorte, a considerable number of troops, with which, and the forces about the person of Don Garcias, he quickly reduced Don Ferdinand, and some other great men, to reason <sup>n</sup>. This and some other affairs requiring his presence, Don Garcias, who was inclined to shew his passion for the princess Donna Sancha, proceeded, with a few Castilian noblemen that were about him, to Leon, which circumstance is omitted by Ferreras, though there is nothing in it improbable, and it seems to account for the absence of Don Bermudo from his capital, which could hardly have happened, if his intended brother-in-law had not arrived there before he was expected. This eagerness of his seems also to confirm our opinion as to his age, since it is natural enough in a young man of twenty, but not altogether so probable of a boy of fourteen. Upon his entrance into the kingdom of Leon, the three counts of the family of Vela made great demon-

(H) This monastery of Ona, in which Don Sanchez and his family are interred, was of his own foundation, at the desire of his daughter Donna Frigida, who chose to quit the world and to embrace a monastic life, in the year of our Lord 1011, that is, about seven years after the decease of his father (5). Some historians indeed are very positive that he founded this religious house upon a very different occasion, and with an intention to atone for the putting of his mother to death, a circumstance capable of putting that fact also out of doubt; for, if that monastery was not built till the time before mentioned, and that he had a daughter of age to take the veil, we cannot but believe him near forty years of age, which does not very well agree with the wantonness ascribed to his mother, who, losing all the names by which she was called in other parts of the history, is now said to have no other name than

Ona (6). The tomb of the count is near the high altar; not far from it stands that of his own wife Donna Urraca, who died three years after him (7); and, at no great distance, that of his son Don Garcia, whom the monumental inscription is said to make no more than thirteen (8); which agrees but very indifferently with the facts mentioned of him in history, and yet is far more reconcileable to them than the computation of a French historian, who makes him but nine (9). It must be acknowledged, that even the best historians differ about the year in which Don Sanchez died, (1), and about the time that his son survived him; but the chronology of Ferreras being probable, free from all absurdity, and at least as well supported as any other, we thought ourselves obliged to follow it for the sake of perspicuity (2).

- a strations of joy ; which had nothing in it strange, if we consider, that the eldest of them was his godfather, and might very well pretend an inclination to be reconciled to make his peace with a prince, whose father he had acknowledged for his sovereign °. This will still be the more probable, if what some historians say be true, that he gained the opportunity of stabbing him, by pretending to kneel to kiss his hand °. The circumstances of the murder we have given before, on account of its being committed at Leon ; but we are constrained to mention it here again, as this unfortunate prince was the last count of Castile of his race. His corpse was first interred in the church of St. John at Leon, where a tomb was erected to his memory, but it was afterwards removed to the monastery of Ona, where there is both a tomb and an inscription to his honour °.
- b Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, who had married his elder sister, took possession of Castile in her right ° (1). The reader will perceive, from what has been related, the reason why the assassins of Don Garcias made choice of the castle of Moncon for their retreat, because it belonged of right to Don Ferdinand Gutierrez, who might be inclined, upon the death of the count, to excite new troubles ; and lying near the territories of the Moors, might afford them an opportunity of contributing by their assistance to raise new troubles °. In all probability this scheme might have succeeded, if Don Sanchez had been in his own kingdom, and the malecontents in Castile more at liberty ; but, as it was, the king presently invested the castle, and took it, before either the discontented Castilians or the Moors had any time to discover their inclinations. However, his vigour in pursuing, and his severity in punishing, the counts of la Vela and their adherents, of whom not one escaped, could not but be pleasing to the bulk of the Castilians, who retained a just respect for the memory of their young prince and his father, and might very probably contribute to that facility with which he was admitted to the possession of that noble country, in which it does not appear that he met with the least opposition °.
- c Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, and count of Castile in his wife's right, was very justly sur- named the great °, since his prudence was at all times and in all respects equal to his fortune. He was advanced in years when he made this great acquisition ; and, that he might govern both countries with equal convenience, he fixed on the pleasant town of Najara ° in Old Castile, but near the frontiers of Navarre, for the place of his residence, and applied himself with diligence to conciliate the love and esteem of his new subjects ; though Mariana ° alleges, that his heart was intirely taken up with his ambition, and that, from the moment he had joined Castile to Navarre, he had in his intention the annexing Leon, Galicia, and Asturias, likewise ; and to this alone he attributes the war between him and Don Bermudo III. ; whereas Ferreras ° and other writers seem to lay the blame of that affair upon the young king of Leon. In all probability the want of proper lights on both sides has occasioned this difference ; though, to say the truth, probability seems rather to be on the side of Mariana. The source of that war

Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, inherits Castile, and revenges Don Garcias's death.

Suspected of forming ambitious views soon after upon the kingdom of Leon.

(1) As far as any thing can be known with certainty in relation to the antient form of government in those states, that rose out of the ruins of the old Gothic monarchy, the rule in Castile was that of succession. The counts were originally equal ; and what were their private estates in the days of king Roderic, became so many lordships or principalities, when themselves and their vassals defended them with their swords against the Moors (1). It is also clear from their histories, if any thing is so, that these lordships descended to heirs female (2). As to the pre-eminence of this family, not to lay any weight on the fabulous history, it arose plainly from the active ambition of Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, who, as count of Castile, rendered himself independent ; and the rest of the lords by assisting, or at least acquiescing, under what he did, and which he could not have done without them, from being his equals, became his vassals (3). In his line the succession was without all doubt hereditary ; and in this light the claim of the king of Navarre, in right of his wife, the eldest daughter of Don Sanchez, the grand daughter of Don Ferdinand Gonzalez, and the sister of the young count Garcias, was regular and just (4). It may be, however, that the troops he had brought with him into Castile might contribute to prevent any opposition on the part of the nobles, and that signal severity with which he had punished the assassins of their late prince, recommended him highly to the people (5). It is however asserted, that his queen, Donna Nugna, insisted that she had a power to dispose of this country which she brought, in favour of which of her sons she pleased (6) ; and it was in virtue of this, that it was given to Don Ferdinand ; but as to the motives upon which it was thus bestowed, as derived from the story told in the text, we ought to consider them as false and feigned, and such as were never heard of till above one hundred years after the decease of that great princess, whose memory has been aspersed by them, when, in fact, she was governed in her choice merely by her maternal affection (7).

was the king of Navarre's ordering the city of Valentia to be rebuilt, on account of a miracle <sup>a</sup> which happened to him near that place; for as he was hunting the wild boar, the beast ran suddenly into the wood, and took shelter in a subterraneous place, to which the king immediately followed: but, as he lifted his arm to strike the boar, he found it without motion, and soon after perceived an altar and the statue of St. Anthony; upon which he made a vow, that if, through the intercession of that saint, the use of his arm was restored, he would build a church upon that spot in honour of that saint; and being afterwards informed, that this subterraneous place made part of the ruins of the antient Palentia, it made him so much the more eager to perform his vow. But it seems Don Bermudo either did not credit the miracle, or did not apprehend the piety of incroaching upon other peoples rights in order to perform a vow; for Palentia now is, and it may be presumed was then, esteemed to lie within the dominions of Leon. <sup>b</sup> Mariana <sup>a</sup> indeed cuts the matter short, and, without taking any notice of Don Bermudo's resentment, ascribes the war to the king of Navarre's invading Leon with a formidable army, and making the conquest of a considerable tract of country, before Don Bermudo, who had no suspicion of his design, was in any condition to oppose him. Be that as it will, it seems that the king of Navarre had a better interest in the clergy than his antagonist: for it was clearly by their influence over the peoples minds, that Don Bermudo was forced to make a peace, and to yield a considerable district by way of dowry to his sister <sup>b</sup>, who married Don Ferdinand, the second son of Don Sanchez, who thereupon, with the consent of both monarchs, took the title of king <sup>c</sup>, instead of count of Castile; and the cession made to him of this country by his father seems to be the only point of the treaty that was in reality acceptable to Don Bermudo, as it freed him in some measure from the apprehensions he was under in having a monarch of Navarre for his neighbour.

The fabulous account of the motive on which Don Ferdinand was declared king of Castile.

WE may collect, from what has been related, so just an idea of the motives which engaged the king of Navarre to bestow Castile upon Don Ferdinand his second son, that there can be no reason for having recourse to that very strange and incredible story, which, moved by the credit of Don Roderic, archbishop of Toledo, most of the Spanish writers <sup>d</sup> have inserted as truth. The substance of this story is, that while this great monarch was engaged in the war against the Moors, his eldest son, Don Garcias, piqued at his mother's refusing him a horse, upon Don Pedro Sessa's representing to her, that the king would be displeased with it, gave the king an account, that his mother and Don Pedro lived together in adultery; upon this Don Sanchez returned from his expedition, caused the matter to be examined by the states, who, upon the testimony of Don Garcias, condemned the queen to be burned alive. Don Ferdinand it seems was passive in this business; but Don Ramiro, who was the king's natural son by Donna Caya, a lady of the court, undertook the queen's defence, and offered to fight with her son in support of her innocence. But, before the day of trial could be fixed, a certain hermit prevailed upon Don Garcias to own the accusation false, and to declare the true grounds of it. The queen being upon this set at liberty, desired that Castile, which was her patrimony, might not be given to Don Garcias, but to her second son Ferdinand; and that Ramiro, who had so generously staked his life in her quarrel, might be rewarded with the kingdom of Arragon; which requests, say they, were complied with; and Don Garcias also made a pilgrimage to Rome, <sup>e</sup> in order to obtain absolution from the holy father for becoming the false accuser of his mother. The whole has been so clearly refuted by a great writer <sup>c</sup>, that we should not have mentioned it, but for the sake of giving the reader a hint whence many of these ridiculous fictions arose.

The last acts of Don Sanchez the great, and the manner of his death.

A. D. 1035.

THE truth is, that, after bestowing on his son Don Ferdinand the country of Castile, the good old king took care to make many regulations that were equally wise and popular, with a view of gaining to his sons the affections of his new subjects; such as directing, that a new road should be made through Navarre and Castile, for the conveniency of such pilgrims as went to St. James at Compostella, repairing the principal places on the frontiers, that the Moors might not be able to enter, as formerly they had done, with impunity, and contriving to bring the inhabitants into the places that he had either founded or rebuilt <sup>f</sup>; which accounts so well for the time he lived after this transaction, that we have no need of supposing a war with the infidels, of which there is nothing said in the best authors, purely to fill it up. Authors are very far from being agreed, either as to the time or manner of his death. Ferreras <sup>g</sup> seems to be in the right as to the former, and therefore we have followed him; but, with regard to the latter, he is silent; however, some writers affirm <sup>h</sup>, that, going in pilgrimage to Oviedo with a small retinue, he fell into an ambuscade that was laid for him on the road; and, after so long and a glorious reign, was basely and barbarously murdered; which induced a suspicion, as supposing the fact true it very well might, that some of the neighbouring princes, who were afraid of his power, were concerned in this treacherous act.

If we consider how soon after the death of this monarch, Don Bernudo the third, king of Leon, entered the country of Castile with an army so much superior to that of the king Don Ferdinand, that, though he was a prince of great courage and spirit, he judged it not at all for his interest to hazard the whole of his dominions by a battle in the first campaign, we may see some reason to suspect, that he was not ignorant of that detestable design, or at least that he drew the same advantages from it as if he had been in the secret; but if he was, he quickly received the just reward of so black a contrivance, as the reader has seen at the close of the last section; for being, as we have there shewn, killed in battle, Don Ferdinand not only recovered the country that he had taken from him, but succeeded likewise to the kingdom of Leon in right of his queen Donna Sancha, by which he became the most powerful of all the Christian princes in Spain<sup>1</sup>. It is true that the Galicians gave him some trouble when he first entered into possession of that kingdom (K), but this was quickly over; and these people, as well as the inhabitants of Leon and Asturias, very soon saw that it was their interest to submit to a monarch by whom Castile was again united to their crown; and consequently their security as well as their grandeur visibly increased<sup>2</sup>. On the other hand, if they had proceeded to a new election, this must have produced a war, the event of which was uncertain, and a civil war too, of which this country must have been the seat; besides, when they came to consider this, they could find none more fit to wear the crown of Leon than the husband of Donna Sancha, the sole heiress of that glorious race of kings, who, by their valour and virtue, had preserved the Goths from being extirpated, and were at least the principal authors of the progress which the Christians had already made towards the recovery of all Spain. We need not wonder therefore that Don Ferdinand met with so little resistance, or that those, who were inclined to oppose him, were so slenderly supported.

THE civil dissensions, the violent commotions, and frequent revolutions, in the kingdom of Cordova, of which the reader has had an account in its proper place, having shaken that which was by far the most considerable monarchy of the Moors to such a degree, that, except an empty title of pre-eminence, it scarce preserved any thing more than the rest; there arose almost as many sovereignties as there remained cities in their dominions; so that, notwithstanding such as held them assumed the title of kings, yet we cannot, with any degree of justice, allow every little district they possessed the stile of a kingdom. Amongst those of which we shall have occasion hereafter to speak, the most considerable was the king of Seville, next to him the king of Toledo, and in the third rank we may reckon the king of Huesca, though perhaps the king of Saragossa might be thought to deserve it as well. As for the rest it will be time enough to mention them as occasion requires.

AT this juncture, that is, at the opening of the eleventh century, we may conceive the spacious, rich, and beautiful continent of Spain, as divided into two unequal parts, by a strait line drawn from east to west, from the coasts of Valentia to a little below the mouth of the river Duero; the country north of this line belonging to the Christians; who had the smallest and least valuable share; and all to the south in the possession of the Moors. Both parties

(K) It will, in all probability, afford the reader some satisfaction, if we enter a little into the reasons which induced the inhabitants of Galicia to be so much more untractable upon this occasion, than any of the other provinces of the kingdoms of Oviedo and Leon. It would appear rather an evasion than an answer, to allege that they were always mutinous, or to appeal to his own observation, that there were more insurrections here than in any other country comprised within those realms (1). The real cause was, that they disliked their situation as a province, and were desirous of becoming a separate state. The source of this desire was, their being richer and in better circumstances; for Galicia, though but one hundred and fifty miles in length, has near three hundred miles of coast, being washed by the ocean on the north, and on the west has more, and those too better, ports than any other part of Spain; which drew thither a very considerable trade even in those times (2). The country in itself is also fruitful, pleasant, populous, and exceedingly enriched by the resort of strangers from all parts of Europe, by land as well as sea, to the tomb of St. James at Compostella, the very bishops of which city lived in those days with the splendor, and in their power fell little short of princes. These circumstances rendered this country almost at all times a seat of faction, and inspired its inhabitants with a restless passion for a prince and court of their own; and, in all probability, it was a prospect of arriving at this, whenever a favourable opportunity should offer, with the assistance of the Moors, that induced count Sisenand to take shelter amongst the infidels, rather than submit himself to a prince, who, independent of all his different claims, had as much personal merit as might have intitled him to dominions even superior to those which he possessed. We shall see, that this wise and prudent prince concluded it, at length, the most effectual way to render these people loyal to his posterity, to gratify them in this favour, which expedient however was not attended with success (3).

were happy in having allies of their own religion and tempers at their back ; but in this the Christians seemed to be more fortunate, as they had no sea between them, but might at any time receive whatever supplies were sent, or whatever auxiliaries were hired within the bounds of France ; whereas the Moors had the Mediterranean between them and their countrymen in Africa. The dependance of both upon these foreign succours was alike precarious, as being equally unwilling to invite, and equally inclined to grow jealous of such auxiliaries. In point of wealth, and real power by land and sea, the Moors were much superior ; but this was more than ballanced by the Christians being better connected. The kings of Leon, Navarre, Sobrarva, and Aragon, were all brothers, and the count of Barcelona nearly allied to them ; which, though it did not restrain them from quarrels, or even from wars, yet it hindered them from being pursued with rancour, or for any length of time. We may add to this another great advantage, which was the rough mountainous countries in their possession ; such as Asturias, Biscay, Navarre, Guipuscoa, and even part of Old Castile ; where a sharp clear air, a soil not over fertile, and the continual labour necessary to their subsistence, furnished them with constant supplies of men naturally hardy and robust, and consequently very capable of undergoing the fatigues of war. Whereas the Moors, though naturally more industrious, enjoying a warmer climate, provinces abundantly more fertile, and having likewise the benefit of foreign trade, were, generally speaking, rich, luxurious, and vehemently addicted to sensual pleasures ; circumstances that gradually made way for their destruction, and had already brought most of their principalities to decline.

Conclusion.

THESE few general remarks will be of singular use towards understanding the following sections, in which we are to describe the contentions between these people, the ebbs and flows of their respective power, the uses both sides made of their advantages on certain occasions, and their neglect of them on others ; with those accidents that in a course of years made such defects irreparable on one side, as might have been easily corrected if they had been seen in time, and threw so much weight into the scale of the other, as enabled them at last to oppress their antagonists with a superiority of force, that could be only resisted so long as it was by despair, and that spirit of knight-errantry, which made men in love with danger, through an overweening fondness of praise ; and which did not long survive those gallant infidels among whom it was bred and cherished, and of whose vast efforts it was the sole support.

S E C T. VI.

The history of the kingdoms of Leon and Castile, from their first conjunction in the person of Ferdinand the first, to their perpetual union in that of Ferdinand the second.

The character of Ferdinand I. and the first seven years of his government.

A. D. 1037.

ALL the authors of Spanish history, antient and modern agree, that few princes have been blessed with greater talents, or the value of these less abated by vices, than him of whom we are going to speak, Don Ferdinand<sup>a</sup>, the first of Leon, and the second of Castile. It may perhaps pass for a kind of proof of this, that, for almost seven years after he came into the possession of Leon, we find little or nothing undertaken by him, that could be properly the subject of history. He very well knew, that the acquisition of a kingdom was sometimes less difficult than the keeping of it. He perceived that the bulk of his subjects were dissatisfied with the change of masters ; and that though he had been very sparing of blood in the reduction of Galicia, yet he held that province rather by conquest than any other title<sup>b</sup>, than which nothing could be more disagreeable to a prince of his disposition. He found it requisite therefore to spend a great deal of time in correcting gradually these mistakes, and recovering his subjects from all their prejudices and prepossessions. He spoke always with great clearness of the rights of the queen, and never permitted any claim to be mentioned but that of her descent<sup>c</sup>. He visited all the provinces, and indeed almost every great town, caressed the nobility exceedingly, paid a profound respect to the clergy, but made it a part of that respect to see that such were severely punished as were a disgrace to their order. He prosecuted his predecessor's plan of redressing grievances with indefatigable diligence ; and, by enlarging the privileges of the people in Galicia, he in a great measure acquired their affection, and lessened the power of their nobility by increasing their number. He took less care of the frontiers of his hereditary crown of Castile than his predecessors had done ; but he kept up greater garrisons, and by that means covered his territories in a great measure, and yet not so thoroughly, but a that the Moors<sup>d</sup> had sometimes opportunities of making incursions, which they were sure not to neglect, and which did not answer theirs better than it did the king's purpose.

WHEN he saw the interior of his dominions in perfect order, his subjects well united and unanimously well affected to his person and government, he began to applaud the conduct of his father-in-law Don Alphonso the fifth, who had rightly distinguished between the having no frontier, and the being obliged to defend one of a large extent; to avoid both which inconveniences, the only method was to follow his plan, and, by recovering the best part of that country now called Portugal, to arrive at natural boundaries of mountains and rivers, with plains of small extent between them; where the building two or three great towns, and fortifying them, would cover at once both his old dominions and his new conquests. The resolution of making war being once taken, was immediately carried into execution, and he marched with a very numerous army directly towards Zamora. The fortress of Xena was the first place of strength that lay in his way, which he caused to be carried by assault, in which the greatest part of the garrison were put to the sword, and the rest made slaves<sup>e</sup>. This had the effect he expected from it; all the little places in the neighbourhood surrendered on the first summons; so that he met with no farther opposition till he came to Viseo, which was naturally strong, had been fortified with great care, was defended by a numerous garrison, and had in it besides almost all the rich people of the adjacent provinces, who had fled thither with their best effects. Don Ferdinand acted with caution; he caused the place to be battered by his engines, that threw stones of a vast weight, for three weeks, and then caused a general assault to be given; by which he carried the town<sup>f</sup>, notwithstanding an obstinate defence. Here, amongst other prisoners, a cross-bow man was taken, who discharged the arrow by which Don Alphonso the fifth was killed. Don Ferdinand ordered his hands to be struck off, and some say his feet also<sup>g</sup>. He pushed his conquest this campaign as far as the river Malna; and, having put good garrisons into the best places, he returned to Leon, and was received with loud acclamations, after such a series of conquests in so small a space<sup>h</sup> (A).

THE very next year the king was in the field again. He had cast his eyes upon Coimbra or Conimbra, and considered it as a place of great consequence to his design of forming a strong barrier; for which reason he resolved to reduce it with as little prejudice to the place as possible. Instead therefore of investing the city with his army, he contented himself with posting his troops in such a manner as hindered them from receiving provisions; and, after some months, drew nearer, and threw up lines round the place. The besieged acted with great courage and constancy, and at length tired the king so much; that he had thoughts of raising the siege; but the monks in a Christian convent at no great distance, prevailed upon him to proceed in his design, furnished him with provisions, and acquainted him with the enemy's distress, by which at last the Moors were brought to capitulate, and were allowed to quit the place<sup>i</sup>. All the Spanish writers, however, antient and modern, take the honour of so important a conquest both from the king and from the monks, to bestow it upon St. James<sup>k</sup>. It seems that count Sisenand had quitted the party of the Moors before the war began, reconciled himself to the king, who, in reward of his services, and as a mark of his favour, made

(A) It is absolutely necessary that we should give the reader here some account of the chronology that we follow; because it differs from almost all the writers of Spanish history, except Ferreras. Some of the best old historians place the war between Don Ferdinand, king of Castile, and his brother Don Garcias king of Navarre, before the expeditions of the former against the infidels (1). But that this is contrary to the order of time in which those events happened is evident from authorities more authentic than history. In the first place it is evident, from the canons made in the council of Coyanca, that the war with the infidels was then over; and, as these are records, they ought undoubtedly to be decisive as to this point (2). It is no less clear from public monuments, mentioned in particular histories of Navarre, that the death of their king Don Garcia did not happen till the fourth year after that council (3). Mariana, though he was far enough from being exact in point of chronology, was aware of this, and has accordingly placed the conquests made from the Moors before the dispute with the king of Navarre; notwithstanding which he has placed those conquests some years before they happened; and this, very probably, because he did not think it probable, that a prince (4) of Don Ferdinand's active temper should, in the beginning of his reign, spend so many years in peace; and therefore he places all those salutary regulations, mentioned in the text, some years later than they really happened (5). But we hope the reader sees them here in their natural order, from whence many advantages arise; since, whether chronology is either doubtful or false, the facts related will appear either contradictory or perplexed, though ever so elegantly related; so essential a thing is truth, and so impracticable it is to render history pleasing without it.

him governor of this city; in which office he acquitted himself with great reputation<sup>1</sup>. The following year he swept the frontiers of his hereditary kingdom of Castile, demolished all the little fortresses the Moors had erected, drove them beyond the mountains, and established strong garrisons to cover each of the passes; but adhered to the old policy of Don Blayo, erecting no fortresses on this side, that the martial disposition of the Castilians might not be abated.

A. D. 1046.

The Moorish monarchs of Toledo and Saragossa become his tributaries and vassals.

In his fourth campaign he ravaged all the country about Medina Cæli, visited all his conquests, and, having enriched his army with plunder and slaves, returned in triumph to the city of Leon<sup>m</sup>. The next spring, when he came to assemble his troops, he found them more numerous than they had been in any of his former expeditions, which induced him to invade the dominions of the king of Toledo, at this time one of the most powerful of the Moorish princes; and, after he harassed and destroyed the open country, he at length besieged Alcala; which, though a place of great strength, was at length reduced to such straits, that they sent to Almanon, then king of Toledo<sup>n</sup>, to inform him, that, if they were not speedily relieved, they must be obliged to surrender. That monarch, finding himself in no condition to oppose Don Ferdinand by force of arms, took the best part of the riches that were in his treasury, and, attended by a small guard, went directly to the Christian camp, and presented himself before the king, intreating him to desist from hostilities against his subjects, offering to become his vassal, and pay him an annual tribute, and at the same time threw himself and the treasures he had brought at the king's feet. The principal officers in the army were of opinion, that this was only done to gain time, but Don Ferdinand was so touched with that prince's distress, that he granted him all he desired, and retired with his troops into his own dominions<sup>o</sup>. He proposed the next year to have carried the war into the territories of the Moorish king of Saragossa, of which the latter no sooner received intelligence, than he sent ambassadors to offer the like submission that had been accepted from the king of Toledo, and thereby diverted the intended expedition<sup>p</sup>. And of this vassalage he afterwards availed himself against another Christian potentate.

As the kingdom of Castile and Leon enjoyed at this time a profound peace, the king thought no time so proper for holding a general council, which he summoned at Cayanca, in which there was no legate from the pope present; and in which thirteen canons were made, most with respect to ecclesiastical, but some of them likewise respecting civil affairs<sup>q</sup>. The year following his brother Don Garcia, king of Navarre fell dangerously ill at Najara, on the frontiers of Castile; of which Don Ferdinand was no sooner informed, than he resolved to pay him a visit. He went thither accordingly, and was received with all possible demonstrations of affection and respect. It seems, however, that two kings can never be long safe together in the same place; for, in a short space, he was informed, whether truly or not is a point historians have disputed, that his brother intended to secure his person; upon which, taking a hasty but civil leave, he retired into his own dominions, extremely nettled at this real or supposed injury<sup>r</sup>. On the fifth of November, in the year of our Lord 1052, died the queen dowager Donna Elvira, widow of Don Alphonso the fifth, and mother of the queen Donna Sancho; her body was interred in the dormitory of the royal family at Leon<sup>s</sup>. The year following deceased the old king of Toledo, and was succeeded by Ali Maymon<sup>t</sup>, who seems to have remained tributary to Don Ferdinand, as his power was not in the least diminished, and as the Mohammedan princes were as far as ever from living upon good terms among themselves. These short scenes of mourning seemed to be the preludes of more afflicting calamities which quickly ensued, and which proved extremely fatal to the Christians in Spain, who were generally the authors of their own misfortunes.

Don Ferdinand falling dangerously ill in the succeeding spring, his brother Don Garcias, to manifest an equal affection, came to see him; but the king, who could not forget the informations, true or false, that had been given him at Najara, though he received him at first with all the marks of joy and fraternal kindness possible, yet caused him to be soon after arrested, and sent prisoner to the castle of Cea<sup>u</sup>, at that time the strongest place in his dominions. But notwithstanding the strictest injunctions possible were given for preventing either his escape, or his giving or receiving any intelligence, so it was, that he found the means of conveying an account of the usage he had met with to some persons whom he could trust in his own dominions, and whom he directed to be at a place appointed at a certain time. They came accordingly, and brought some of the fleetest horses in Navarre for the king's use; and he, by what contrivance

- a is unknown, was equally punctual, having found his way out of the castle in spite of all the care that could be taken. His flight was so sudden and unexpected, that he was safe in his own dominions by that time the news of it reached the ears of Don Ferdinand at Leon<sup>w</sup>. The king foresaw the mischiefs that would attend this accident, and it may be, in his own mind disapproved that conduct he had pursued. However, when he heard that Don Garcias, with a great army, was on the point of invading Castile, he went thither in person and assembled another, superior in troops as well as in number; he was notwithstanding very desirous, if possible, to avoid effusion of blood; and, with this salutary view, sent some of the clergy, who were about him, to propose terms of accommodation to Don Garcias, offering at the same time whatever satisfaction he could desire, explaining the motives upon which he acted, and offering to bury in silence all memory of either event<sup>x</sup>. The chief of the nobility about Don Garcias, and such ecclesiastics as were most in his esteem, concurred with the ambassadors of Castile, and laboured to reconcile him to his brother. All persuasions were vain; Don Garcias's breast was wholly occupied by his resentment: he would hear no proposals, but obstinately persisted, that all disputes between them should be decided by a battle<sup>y</sup>. Don Ferdinand did all he could to decline it, acted wholly on the defensive, and resolved not to fight, unless his brother was the aggressor.

- Don Garcias being informed of this, entered into the kingdom of Castile, and advanced directly towards Burgos; and notwithstanding Don Fortuno Sanchez, an antient nobleman, who had been his governor, laboured all he could to divert him, he fixed the first of September<sup>z</sup> for the day of battle<sup>2</sup>, when the two armies appeared in sight of each other between Atupuerta and Ages, about nine miles from Burgos. Don Ferdinand, who was much the better officer, ordered a corps of Castilian cavalry to charge the army of Navarre in flank, which they did with such success, that they penetrated to the post where Don Garcias commanded in person; and one Sanchez, a trooper, or, as antient history reports, an officer<sup>3</sup>, to whom that monarch had formerly offered some insult, plunged his spear into his breast. The nobility about his person prevented his being taken, or wounded a second time; but that was of little consequence, since the stroke he had received was mortal. Inigo, abbot of Ona, caught him in his arms, assisted him with his prayers in his last moments, and supported him till he expired<sup>b</sup>. A column was afterwards erected in the place where he fell<sup>c</sup>. As this misfortune could not be concealed from the army, and as it affected the minds of the soldiers to such a degree that they lost all courage, the dispute was soon at an end, and the flight became general. Don Ferdinand would not suffer his troops to pursue; but, perceiving a large body of Mohammedan auxiliaries, he caused them to be surrounded and cut to pieces, only their generals, being excellently well mounted, made their escape<sup>d</sup>. The king made no use of a victory that he regretted; on the contrary, he suffered his brother's body to be interred in the monastery of St. Mary at Najara, which he had founded, with royal honours, and returned himself to Leon, not in triumph, but with all apparent marks of the most sincere grief<sup>e</sup>.

- We find in some historians<sup>f</sup>, that this war was continued, and that the king, Don Ferdinand, availed himself of his superior army, to the prejudice of his nephew, the king of Navarre; but this is not supported by any of the antient authors<sup>g</sup>, and may be presumed from thence a gross misrepresentation. Indeed the king of Leon and Castile seems to have been a monarch of great mildness and moderation, and who made no other use of his superior power than for the benefit and protection of his subjects, by preserving peace on every side; and, while that subsisted, letting slip no opportunities of improving the great cities, and encouraging his people to cultivate to the best advantage their respective properties in all parts of his dominions. He removed the body of his father, Don Sanchez, from the monastery of Ona to the city of Leon<sup>h</sup>; where, having made choice of the church of St. John Baptist, in complaisance to his queen Donna Sancha, by whose father, Don Alonso the fifth, it was built for the place of his own sepulchre, he caused the old brick building to be pulled down, in order to rebuild it with stone<sup>i</sup>, and with a degree of magnificence suitable to the power, and expressive of the piety of its founder. He caused a council<sup>k</sup> to be held the beginning of the year 1056, in the apostolic church (so the Spaniards stile it) of St. James of Compostella, in which some canons were made for the support of the discipline of the church. Yet, notwithstanding this prudent and pacific behaviour, which it might have been presumed would have given all his neighbours the utmost satisfaction, we find that Don Garcias, king of Navarre, and Don Ramiro, a king of Arragon, had an interview at the monastery of Leyra, under pretence of the dedication of the church, where they made a defensive league<sup>1</sup> for the reciprocal protection of their territories, in case that either should be attacked by Don Ferdinand; who, it does not at all appear, meant them any disturbance, or took any umbrage at this precaution (B).

A legate from Rome, who began the quarrel as to the Gothic liturgy.

ON the death of pope Nicholas the second there happened a schism; and one of the competitors, who took the title of Alexander the second, sent a legate into Spain, in order to derive all the help he could from that quarter. This may seem an immaterial point, but it is really a thing of great consequence; for this ecclesiastic was extremely offended with the old Gothic liturgy, and was for obtruding upon the Spaniards the Roman offices at once; with which, in their turn, they were equally displeased. At this juncture, indeed, there was nothing done in that matter, but it was this legate who laid the foundation of all that has been done since; for, upon his return to Rome, he reported, that the Spaniards could never be made good subjects to that see (and in that, no doubt, he was right) till the Gothic liturgy and their antient usages were removed out of the way: and this being thoroughly comprehended, the indefatigable spirit of the church of Rome never suffered the government of Leon and Castile to be at peace, till they had got the better in this respect; which was not, however, till some years after, as will be shewn in its proper place; and then it was in consequence of their having prevailed in other Spanish principalities before. Let us now return from ecclesiastical to civil history, and observe what the strange consequences were of this legate's doctrine at the court of Leon, and how far, even under a wise and good prince, religious caprices operated upon the most important affairs of state.

Translation of the body of St. Isidore, bishop of Seville, to the city of Leon.

THE church of St. John the Baptist being finished, the queen Donna Sancha was desirous of enriching it, according to the superstitious humour of those times, with holy relics; and upon this there either came or was thrust into her head two virgins, St. Justa and St. Rufina, who were martyred, and whose bodies were interred at Seville. It was suggested, that the surest way of obtaining them was by force of arms. Upon this, the ablest Spanish historians<sup>2</sup> boast of it to this day, Don Ferdinand made an irruption into the territories of Mohammed Aben Habet, king of Seville, without provocation, and without any intimation of offence, murdered multitudes of Moors, drove vast numbers into slavery, and gave up the whole country to pillage, which brought the poor Mohammedan prince upon his knees<sup>3</sup> to Ferdinand, offering him all his treasures to ransom the bodies of his unhappy subjects, whom he wanted force to defend. The king of Leon and Castile insisted upon having the body of St. Justa taken up and sent to Leon, and that the Moorish monarch should do him homage and become his vassal. Mohammed submitted to all this very willingly and cheerfully. But when, some time after, three bishops and three counts came to Seville to demand the body of the saint, the poor king found himself in a very distressed condition, as not having the least knowledge where this saint was to be found. The Christian inhabitants professed themselves as ignorant as he<sup>4</sup>. In the

(B) We are assured by Mariana, that Don Ferdinand was not so disinterested a prince as no ways to avail himself of this victory (1); but that he made himself master of Briviesca, the mountains of Occa, and so much of the county of Rioja as lay on that side of the river Oja next to Castile; so that Don Sanchez, the son of Don Garcias, had only Navarre, Biscay, the remaining part of the county of Rioja, Najara, Logragno, and some other places left; and which is still more singular, he speaks of the countries now taken by Don Ferdinand, as if they had been the original cause of the differences between the two brothers, in which he not only contradicts others but himself; and, indeed, the whole relation is incredible, because it is impossible. For if Don Ferdinand was desirous of possessing himself of these countries, he would certainly have been the aggressor, which all historians agree he was not; and, on the other hand, that Don Garcias did not take up arms to recover these from his brother is evident, from what Mariana says of their being taken from his son after his death. Upon the whole it is, perhaps, more than probable, that not only Mariana, but an antient historian, in whom we also find something much to the same purpose, confound the death of Don Garcias with that of his son Don Sanchez, and speak of what certainly happened after the death of the latter, as if it had fallen out upon the demise of the former: for thus much of the truth it must be acknowledged there is in the foregoing relation, that the countries therein mentioned were taken from Navarre, and annexed to Castile; but this happened many years after (2), upon a compromise between the kings of Leon and Arragon, at which time the river Ebro, into which the Oja falls, was made the common boundary of their dominions. (3) It is impossible, considering our plan, to discuss in this manner all the variations we have been obliged to make from the common manner in which the Spanish history has been stated in our language; but from a few instances we hope the candid reader will do us the justice to believe, that it is out of respect to proper authorities, and not out of an affectation of singularities, that we are led to the same conduct in other places.

(2) As the reader will find a midst of this perplexity, St. Isidore very kindly appeared to Alvitus, bishop of Leon, who was at the head of the embassy, and told him, it was not a proper time to remove the saints Justa and Rufina, but that they should take his body " with them, and pointed with a cross to the place where it lay. This was accordingly done, and Alvitus himself dying in his return, both bodies were received with great reverence into Leon; the king, the queen, and a great number of the nobility going out a considerable distance to receive them; and the corpse of St. Isidore being deposited in the new church of St. John the Baptist, has, in some measure, changed its name ".

WHILE the king Don Ferdinand was employed in the war against Seville, Don Ramiro, king of Arragon, with a formidable army, invaded the dominions of the Moorish prince of Saragossa, who, being tributary to the king of Leon, immediately sent ambassadors to his capital to implore his assistance: they finding him absent, applied themselves to Don Sancho his son, who sent them instantly back to their master, desiring him to assemble all the troops he was able; and assuring him, that he would forthwith march with a strong body of forces to his relief, which he accordingly did. The Infant Don Sancho having for his lieutenant the famous Don Rodrigo, surnamed the Cid, no sooner joined the Moors than he proposed marching to give the king of Arragon battle, who, on his side, raised the siege of a town before which he lay, and marched to meet them. The dispute was long and bloody; but at length the victory * declared on the side of the Infant, the unfortunate Don Ramiro being killed upon the spot, as most of the Spanish writers agree; though there are some " who affirm, that he died some time after in his bed; and there are also others who assert, that he was not only killed, but that his body fell into the hands of the infidels, who caused it to be flead; the probability of which will be discussed in another place; at present it is sufficient to observe that the Infant Don Sancho, having relieved his father's vassal, returned with his victorious troops to Leon " (C).

At the time of the translation of St. Isidore (so the Spaniards " stile it ) the king Don Ferdinand held an assembly of the states at Leon, in which he opened to them his design of dividing his dominions amongst his three sons; that is, to give the kingdom of Castile to the eldest Don Sancho, upon whom the Moorish king of Saragossa was to depend; the crown of Leon and the Asturias of Oviedo to Don Alonso; and the kingdom of Galicia, with so much of Portugal as he had conquered, to Don Garcia, the youngest. We cannot doubt but many of the nobility must foresee the mischiefs that would inevitably follow from this measure, so inconsistent with all maxims of policy, as well as dictates of experience. But the majority complied with and applauded the king's proposal; upon which, at the breaking up of that assembly " , the Infants Don Sancho and Don Garcia were sent to take possession of Castile and Galicia. About the same time three Spanish prelates (which is the first instance of the kind) were sent

(C) There is something very dark and difficult in this piece of history. Mariana (1), Petavius (2), and most other writers, place the death of Don Ramiro four years later, that is, in the year 1067; and, upon that account, place the war not in the reign of Don Ferdinand but of Don Sancho, which is not easy to comprehend, more especially as it appears from the monument of this prince, in the monastery of St. John de la Pegna (3), that he died on the 8th of the ides of May, and also on the fifth day of the week; but upon examination this will be found not to agree with the year 1067, but with the year 1063, where it is placed in the text (4). The infant Don Sancho therefore must have commanded the troops of his father, which joined those of the Mohammedan prince of Saragossa, and with him went Don Rodrigo, surnamed the Cid, to whom this remarkable victory is in a great measure ascribed (5). It is not a little strange, that not only this particular fact of the king's death, but the whole war has been represented as false and fictitious by some very good criticks (6); notwithstanding which we must, if we agree with them, give up those rules that have been hitherto looked upon as the safest and best in judging of history, since we have contemporary writers who affirm it, and upon their authority it has been received by the best historians of that country (7). Mariana, who, as we have before observed, places this event in the reign of Don Sancho, acquaints us, that it was looked on as an ill omen to his administration, that it began with the death of his uncle (8); but it is as probable, that this omen might be applied as well to his first campaign; for we can scarce imagine, that the Infant Don Sancho had commanded in person before this time. There is little regard due to omens; but without doubt Don Ferdinand must conceive it a great misfortune, that two of his own brothers, and his wife's brother, should fall in the field by his arms: but, however, he might comfort himself with this, that in each of these actions they were the aggressors, and his forces only employed in the defence of his own subjects or of his allies. It is an inexcusable fault in Mariana notwithstanding, that he places the death of Don Ramiro four years later, to mention bulls directed to him by pope Gregory the seventh, who was not elevated to that dignity till the year of our Lord 1073, which shews how very little attention he paid to chronology, which is indeed the capital fault in this history.

to the council of Mantua<sup>c</sup>, which was held by pope Alexander II. where they produced the Gothic offices; and, upon perusal, the council unanimously declared, that they were orthodox and pious; so that they have this testimony of a learned council, with a pope at its head, in favour of their antient liturgy, if that could afford it any sanction. Some<sup>d</sup>, indeed, say, that the pope only approved the offices they sent, without suffering any to examine them but himself: and if so, then surely very little respect is paid to his decree, by those who speak so harshly of these venerable monuments of the doctrine and discipline of the truly catholic Christian church among the Goths.

THE Moorish kings of Toledo and Saragossa were not long before they took advantage of this impolitic division of the territories of the king Don Ferdinand, which, perhaps, they might attribute to the weakness and infirmities of old age, and from thence incline to hope they might be able to shake off the yoke and recover their independency. Yet how plausible soever these notions might be, they drew them into a hasty and fatal resolution. For having refused to pay their annual tribute<sup>e</sup>, Don Ferdinand assembled a numerous and well disciplined army, with which, before they suspected any such thing, he swept the frontiers of both kingdoms, wasting the country with fire and sword, and carrying multitudes into slavery<sup>f</sup>. He advanced with his victorious army into the neighbourhood of Valentia, the suburbs of which city he burnt, and perhaps had done more, but finding himself indisposed, and his disorder increasing, he thought it time to retreat, and accordingly returned to Leon in the beginning of winter. His health still declining, he caused himself to be carried into the church of St. Isidore, where he performed an act of public penance for his sins, and died the very next day<sup>g</sup>, which was the twenty-seventh of September one thousand sixty-five. Besides his sons before-mentioned, he left behind him two daughters, to the elder of whom, Donna Urraca, he gave the city of Zamora, which he had strongly fortified, with other lands, and to the younger, Donna Elvira, Toro, and some other places by way of appendages, that they might live in a manner suitable to their high birth, and without being dependant upon any of their brethren<sup>h</sup>.

Don Sancho, king of Castile, engaged in a war with the kings of Arragon and Navarre.

Don Sancho, king of Castile, though he submitted to the disposition which his father had made, looked upon himself as extremely injured thereby, from an opinion, that priority of birth gave him a just title to all the three kingdoms; but so long as his mother Donna Sancha lived, he did not suffer his discontent to appear, because her title to Leon, the Asturias, Galiccia, and Portugal, seemed clearer than his own, and he was perfectly satisfied that what the king had done was through her persuasion. He reigned therefore quietly at Burgos, and applied himself with indefatigable diligence to render the kingdom of Castile as flourishing as possible. But that prince's dying<sup>i</sup> on the 7th of November in the following year, he found himself more at liberty, and perhaps would have discovered his real intention sooner, if he had not been involved in a war with the kings of Arragon and Navarre, both of his own name, which most writers place two years sooner; and in which, it is said, that he met with a total defeat. But as the causes and consequences of this war are very obscurely expressed, and as it is much more probable it happened after the death of Don Ferdinand, we have followed the example of Ferreras<sup>k</sup>, and placed it here, though we are not able to acquaint the reader in what manner it ended. It may be the confederate princes, satisfied with their victory, and believing they had done enough for the security of their own dominions, were willing to give an example of moderation in their own conduct; or it may be they differed between themselves, which hindered them from pushing their success farther. But whatever the motive was, this war came to a very speedy conclusion; and for any thing that appears in authentic historians, Don Sancho might have enjoyed the kingdom bestowed upon him by his father in quiet, if the turn of his own mind would have permitted it.

War between Don Sancho, king of Castile, and Don Alonzo VI. his brother.

A. D. 1067.

Don Alphonso, king of Leon, was a prince of a very humane and gentle disposition, in consequence of which he had stood highest in his mother's favour, by whose counsels he was chiefly directed while she lived, and after her decease had great regard to the advice of his sisters, who were princesses of uncommon parts, and which was still more rare had nothing of jealousy or intrigue in their tempers. One of the first steps taken by this monarch after his accession was to conclude a treaty of marriage with a princess of England, whose name was Aguda, the daughter of William the first, surnamed the conqueror, whom he espoused by proxy, and who, in her passage to Spain, died at sea. Her corpse was landed in France, and interred in a monastery there. This misfortune was succeeded by another; for Don Sancho, king of Leon, invaded his dominions with a formidable army, notwithstanding that the two princesses their sisters had laboured all that in them lay to prevent things from coming to extremities. Don Alphonso opposed him with troops superior in number, but not equal in courage, or at a least in discipline. The battle was fought on the 19th of July, at a place called Lantada, in which Don Alphonso being defeated <sup>o</sup>, fled to Leon, and made the best disposition he could there for his defence; but, through the interposition of the princesses, a siege was prevented, and Don Sancho engaged to return for that year into his own dominions upon certain conditions; of which we have very indistinct accounts, and this probably because the agreement that was now concluded did not last long. A. D. 1068.

WHILE the realms of Castile and Leon were in such confusion, and the concerns of their inhabitants turned upon each other, the arms of Don Garcia, king of Galicia, were in very little better condition. He had a favourite, to whom he confided without reserve the management of all his affairs: the chief of his nobility had represented to him frequently the ill consequences of such a behaviour, and the bad use this man made of his unlimited authority; but as this had no effect, those great lords had recourse to rougher measures, and cut this insolent favourite to pieces <sup>p</sup>, almost in the presence of his master; after which they thought fit to retire into the dominions of Leon, where they met with protection and favour. The reader has been informed, that the inhabitants of Galicia were of a very mutinous disposition; and besides this, which is indeed a sufficient proof, there happened another in that country within the compass of a few months; for Gudesto, bishop of Compostella, having some disputes about the rights of his church with Don Froila, a nobleman of great authority, and his near relation, the latter found means to enter the apartment of the prelate when in his bed and fast asleep, and stabbed him to the heart with his dagger <sup>q</sup>; notwithstanding which, the government was in such confusion, that, for any thing that appears in history, he escaped with impunity. 1069.

THE peace between Don Sancho, king of Castile, and his brother Don Alphonso, king of Leon, had been with difficulty prolonged for somewhat more than a year, when Don Sancho had again recourse to arms <sup>r</sup>, without pretending any other motive than that of despoiling Don Alphonso of his territories. The latter had assembled a numerous and well disciplined army, towards which his brother Don Garcia <sup>s</sup> contributed, by sending him a considerable body of auxiliaries. The two armies met and fought on the fourteenth of July; when, after a long and bloody dispute, Don Alphonso remained victorious <sup>t</sup>. If he had pursued his advantage, he might very probably have put an end to the war; but the mildness of his nature, and his unwillingness to shed the blood of his father's subjects, restrained him. Don Sancho had with him the Gid, who rallied his army, and encamped not far from the field of battle. He afterwards prevailed both upon the king and the troops to fall upon the victorious army about an hour beyond midnight; and taking them by surprise, it was rather a slaughter than a fight, since they met with little or no resistance. The king Don Alphonso mounted the first horse he could find, and fled to the first church, which was that of St. Mary de Carrion; but Don Sancho pursued him with such eagerness, that he was presently taken, and sent prisoner under a strong guard of horse to Burgos <sup>u</sup>. Don Alonfo beats Don Sancho one day, and is totally defeated by him the next. 1070.

THE princesses, Donna Urraca and Donna Elvira, upon Don Sancho's coming to Leon, interposed in behalf of their unfortunate brother, and were very earnest in persuading the conqueror to spare his life; to which with some difficulty he consented, upon condition that he should abdicate his dominions, consent to be shaved a monk, and retire to the abby of Sabagon; which terms, however hard and inglorious, Don Alphonso was forced to accept, and is said to have taken a religious habit in the house before-mentioned; but an historian <sup>w</sup>, who lived near these times, tells us, that Don Sancho insisted only upon his quitting his dominions, and laying aside the royal title (D). However that may be, Don Sancho found no great opposition in establishing- Obligated to abdicate his throne by Don Sancho, who deposes Don Garcia like-wise.

(D) As it contributes not a little to enlighten history, when we have the characters of the principal persons mentioned in them drawn with fidelity and judgment, it may not be amiss to observe here, that Don Pelayo, bishop of Oviedo, tells (1) us of Don Sancho, that in his father's life-time he drew the respect and veneration of the people by the manly beauty of his person, which, though considerably beyond the common size, was perfectly well proportioned. His countenance was open and pleasant, his air majestic, active, and full of address in martial exercises, and he had such uncommon vigour, that he derived from thence the surname of Don Sancho the strong. He was very brave, and in his own nature generous and beneficent; but he had one great foible, which was, that he loved praise, and them from whom he received it. Mariana (2) says, that quarrels had arisen between Don Alonso and Don Garcia before Don Sancho made his first irruption into Leon. The archbishop of Toledo (3) asserts positively, that Don Sancho spared his brother's life upon no other establishing himself on the throne of Leon; and, indeed, in the situation things were then in, it is no great wonder. As ambition excludes content, so Don Sancho could reap no joy in the possession of one brother's crown, while there was yet a diadem upon the head of another; and therefore as soon as the people of Leon had submitted and sworn allegiance to him, and he had received large reinforcements from Castile, he entered Galicia with his victorious army. If the people had been in any degree united, his conquest might have been at least disputed; but their want of a good understanding with their sovereign and each other, disabled them from making any considerable resistance; and the severity with which Don Sancho treated all who opposed him, was another circumstance that facilitated his conquest. As for Don Garcia, his chief care was to avoid falling into his hands, and therefore, as soon as he found his affairs desperate, he threw himself, with such as remained firm to him under his misfortunes, who were but a few, into the dominions of the king of Seville; who, by the conquest of Cordova and Murcia, was become the most considerable of the Mohammedan monarchs in Spain, by whom he was very kindly received, and honourably protected.

While Don Sancho was employed in the conquest of Galicia, Don Alfonso was contriving how to recover his liberty, and to escape out of the monastery in which he was confined into the dominions of some foreign prince. He found means to inform the princesses his sisters of his intentions; and Donna Urraca prevailed upon three lords, of the family of Affurez, to run the hazard of facilitating his escape. They accordingly supplied him with horses; and, having drawn him safely out of the monastery, conducted him with the utmost expedition to Toledo. He acquainted Ali-Maymen, who was then king, with the situation of his affairs, and the reasons he had to have recourse to his protection. That monarch not only promised him all he asked, but provided for him, and those who resorted to him, with royal bounty; and, as he knew that he was extremely fond of hunting, he assigned him a district where he might enjoy that diversion, and where none were allowed to hunt but Christians. The sweetness of Don Alfonso's temper prevailed so much upon his protector, that he visited him almost every day, and they lived together in the most strict and intimate friendship (E). Don Sancho, at his return to Leon, quickly gave his sisters reason to believe, that he resented in a very high degree their attachment to Don Alfonso, by signifying to them, that, having now united his father's dominions, it terms than an absolute renunciation, and taking the habit of a monk; to which he was persuaded by Don Pedro Affurez; but the bishop of Tuy (4) relates this matter otherwise, for he tells us, that at the request of Donna Urraca, Don Sancho permitted his brother to retire to Toledo, on a promise that he would never return during his life without his leave, and that he also consented, that Don Pedro Affurez and his two brothers should attend him. But both writers agree, that Don Alonso was undone by his clemency in forbidding the pursuit of his brother's army when broken, saying of the Castilians, when he saw them fly, Spare them; they are your brethen, and were my father's subjects; and they likewise attribute all that afterwards happened to the councils given Don Sancho by the Cid, who seems to have held the same place in his favour that Don Pedro Affurez did in his brother's; and it may be, there is a little exaggeration in one character as well as the other.

(E) The reception met with by Don Alonso at the court of the king of Toledo was without doubt as good as he could desire, and much better than he could reasonably expect (1). But Mariana, in the method he has taken to make us sensible of this, has injured the elegance of his description, by pushing it not only beyond probability, but beyond possibility also (2). He gives us the speeches of the two kings at their first interview, the conditions proposed and accepted, the disposition of the city and summer palace, the pensions settled upon such as followed the fortunes of this exiled prince, the services they rendered the king of Toledo in his wars with other Moorish princes, and abundance of other entertaining particulars; amongst the rest he acquaints us, that one day, when the two kings were together, with many of the Moorish nobility about them, in the royal garden, Don Alonso laid himself along by the side of a canal, and seemed to be asleep, while the king of Toledo, who attentively considered that city, of which they had a fair and full view from the spot where they were, desired their opinion of his new works, and whether they did not judge that the place was now in a manner impregnable; to which one of his lords answered, that it was indeed much stronger than before, but that it might still be taken, by waiting for seven years together all the country round, by which the magazines would be exhausted, and the recruiting them rendered impracticable; after which a short siege would not fail of being attended with success. This discourse being over-heard, and treasured up in his mind by Alonso, furnished him in process of time with the means of becoming master of that capital. He adds, that there was such a resort of Christians to Don Alonso, that they built a town about his hunting seat, which is that now called Bribuega. But if he had adverted ever so little to the chronology of this history, it would have prevented, or at least have shortened, this description of the king's reception and manner of passing his time, since, by a comparison of circumstances, it is certain, he did not remain at Toledo a full year; and an historian (3), who flourished in his grandson's reign, affirms, that his stay did not exceed nine months; which clearly demonstrates, that most of these stories are the pure effects of imagination, not in Mariana, but in the writers from whom he took them, and by whom he would have been in no danger of being misled, if he had attended to this circumstance, which will justify our omitting them.

a was no longer requisite that they should remain mistresses of the towns which he had given them; but, upon their resigning these into his hands, he would assign them a maintenance suitable to their rank. They represented to him in vain how unworthy it was of so great a prince to think of oppressing two feeble women, and those too of his own blood. However, they called together their vassals, and acquainted them with the king's intention, whose haughty, morose, and cruel temper, having rendered him universally odious, those, who depended upon the princesses, dreading nothing so much as to become his subjects, freely offered to defend the places of which they were possessed to the utmost extremity; and this proposition being accepted, they took their measures accordingly.

b THE king was excessively provoked at this conduct, which he did not expect; but, on the contrary supposed, that their vassals would either have prevailed upon them to submit, or provided for their own safety by submitting themselves. As soon as he found himself deceived in that hope, he assembled a very numerous army, which he commanded in person<sup>d</sup>, and had for his lieutenant general Don Rodrigo, surnamed the Cid. He first attacked Toro, which belonged to Donna Elvira, and took it rather by the srew than the force of his army<sup>e</sup>, which pleased him exceedingly, and gave him great reason to hope, that he should find his next expedition attended with little difficulty. But he very quickly found the contrary; Donna Urraca had shut herself up in Zamora, which was very well fortified, and had a numerous garrison, whom he could not intimidate by menaces, and by whom his troops were repulsed with great loss in several assaults. There was a nobleman in the town, Don Arias Gonzalez, A. D. 1072. who acted as general and prime minister for the princess Urraca, and he acted so well in both capacities, that the troops did their duty with spirit, and were well supplied from the magazines with every thing they wanted; so that at length the king of Leon, notwithstanding the superiority of his forces, found himself obliged to retire to a greater distance, and to turn his siege into a blockade. This appeared to be a certain method of reducing the place; for as they had no succours to expect, so famine within the town would quickly bring them into greater distress than was in the power of an army without; and, indeed, all things considered, Donna Urraca and her subjects had great reason to look upon their condition as desperate<sup>f</sup>.

d It was not long before some in the town began to think it so, and to communicate their thoughts to their neighbours, which producing a kind of general murmur, a council<sup>e</sup> was called by the townsmen to know whether they should not demand a capitulation. After some very warm debates, one Ataulphus stood up, and assured them, that if they would have a little patience, he would undertake to deliver the place. Upon this the council broke up, and Ataulphus, at his own request, was permitted to go out of the city; he proceeded directly to the camp of the king of Leon, and having asked and obtained a private audience, he gave him an account of the council that had been held, assured him, that he was the only person who proposed a surrender; upon which they fairly turned him out of the town<sup>h</sup>. At this he expressed great resentment, telling him, that if he would advance with a party of horse near the place, he would discover to him a postern that might be easily forced, and the city taken by storm<sup>i</sup>. The king was extremely pleased with this intelligence, and at the request of him who gave it, kept it a secret from his officers. A few days after he advanced with a part of his cavalry, and when they were within sight of the walls, Ataulphus told the king, if he would dismount he would shew him the place, and him only. He readily complied with his request, but had not gone far before he found it necessary to ease himself; and while he was behind a bush for this purpose, Ataulphus struck him through the body with his javelin, and leaving him swimming in his own blood, made his escape<sup>k</sup>. Thus fell the ambitious Don Sancho, king of Leon, Castile, and Galicia, on the fifth of October one thousand seventy two, when he had reigned almost seven years. The greatest part of his army separated immediately upon the news of the king's death; but the Castilian troops retired in good order, carrying his corpse with them, which they caused to be interred with royal honour in the monastery of Ona<sup>l</sup> (F).

THE first care of Donna Urraca, when the blockade was raised, was to dispatch an express <sup>a</sup> to Toledo, to desire Don Alphonso to make all the dispatch imaginable in repairing to Zamora <sup>m</sup>. When he communicated this intelligence to those who were about him, they unanimously dissuaded him from acquainting the Moorish prince, from an apprehension that he would not suffer him to depart. Their arguments had no effect upon Don Alonso. He said, that princes might indeed be justified from policy in dealing artificially with each other, but that such a behaviour was inexcusable between friends. He went therefore to Ali-Maymon, presented to him his sister's letters, and desired his permission to return into his own dominions <sup>n</sup>. That monarch received him with all imaginable kindness, concealing his own intelligence which was very near as early as Don Alphonso's, he gave him the strongest assurances, that his pleasure was not greater than his own, and, having gently put him in mind of the kindnesses he had done him, <sup>b</sup> requested a continuance of his friendship towards himself and his eldest son Hissam; which Don Alphonso having promised in the most solemn terms, he dismissed him with all imaginable marks of esteem, and under the escorte of a strong party of horse, by whom he was safely conducted to Zamora, where he was received with all possible testimonies of affection and duty, as well as with the greatest tenderness, by the prince's Donna Urraca, to whose firmness and fidelity he owed his restoration <sup>o</sup>.

THE principal nobility of Leon and Galicia repaired very cheerfully to Zamora to congratulate Don Alphonso upon this happy turn in his affairs, and to assure him of their fidelity <sup>p</sup>. The Castilians, however, were not altogether so hasty, but they acted with as much prudence, and perhaps with more dignity; for after some deliberation they sent deputies to Don Alphonso, <sup>c</sup> to acquaint him that they were willing to acknowledge him for their sovereign, and were for this reason desirous of his presence as Burgos; but knowing, as he did, that their late king fell by the hand of a traitor, they expected he should purge himself by oath of all privy or participation in that action <sup>q</sup>. Don Alphonso readily accepted the crown on this condition, and went to Burgos as he was desired; but when it came to the issue, none of the Castilian nobility had courage enough to require the king's oath. At length Rodrigo, surnamed the Cid, administered it, which was certainly very laudable; but not contented with this, he obliged the king to repeat it twice more, which he did, but resented it so much, that Don Rodrigo could never after recover his good graces <sup>r</sup>. This being over, the king took possession of the government, to the great joy and with the general satisfaction of the Castilians. <sup>d</sup>

As soon as the news of Don Sancho's death, and Don Alphonso's being quietly admitted to the succession, reached Seville, Don Garcia requested the Moorish monarch, with whom he had taken shelter, to permit him to return into his own dominions, which he did with great readiness <sup>s</sup>. What reception he met with from his subjects, or how he behaved towards them, we cannot with any certainty affirm. It is as little in our power, and therefore as little in our will, to suggest, that he meant to give his brother any disturbance. Ferreras <sup>t</sup>, indeed, says it, but without proof; and we must not supply facts to support characters. Don Alonso, being informed of his resuming the government in Galicia, invited him to a conference; upon which he very readily came to Leon, and though at first received with all outward testimonies of kindness, was in a short time arrested by the advice of Donna Urraca, and sent prisoner to the castle of Luna, where he spent the remainder of his <sup>e</sup> days <sup>u</sup>. It is alleged, that he was of a mutable and yet of a violent temper, which obliged his brother to have recourse to this method of treating him for his his own security. We

the name of the person who managed the scheme of the king's death was Velido Dolfos, which seems to be a corruption of Ataulphus. It is added, that the Castilians, instead of deserting the siege, were so enraged by the murder of the king, that Don Diego Ordenez, of the house of Laura, went up to the gates of Zamora, and threatened the inhabitants with the utter extirpation of every thing within their walls, if they did not purge themselves of their having any share in the contrivance or execution of that assassination; upon which, according the custom then in use, Don Arias Gonzalez and his three sons, Don Pedro, Don Diego, and Don Rodrigo, offered to maintain the innocence of the townsmen in single combat one by one against Don Diego Ordenez, which was accepted; and in this fight Don a write the history and not the apologies of princes: the reader will judge of this action for himself; but certain it is, that the more antient historians are not so complaisant to the memory of Don Alphonso in this particular as the moderns <sup>w</sup>. We pretend not to determine the controversy, but we fairly report the facts. Their king being a prisoner, the Galicians readily and perhaps willingly submitted to Don Alonso, who thus united once more the dominions of his father, and became master of Castile, Leon, and Galicia <sup>x</sup>.

Diego killed all the three young cavaliers; but the youngest of them, Don Rodrigo, after he had received a mortal wound, aiming a stroke at Don Diego, cut the reins of his horse's bridle; upon which the beast wheeled about, forced the barrier, and carried his master out of the field of battle; which, according to the laws of combat, was the same thing as if he had been defeated. Upon this, the judges refused to give any decision, and the Castilians raised the siege and retired into their own country (2). The reader will know what credit is due to these relations, when he is told, that their most authentic support are the ballads, sung time out of mind, through all the provinces of Spain, concerning these wonderful feats of arms.

THE divisions among Christian princes were the true source of the papal power, which began now to extend itself in Spain. Don Alphonso found the Roman service introduced in the neighbouring kingdom of Arragon, and the emissaries of the pope used all their arts to engage the king's inclination to have it introduced also throughout his dominions. Gregory the seventh had succeeded Alexander the second; and having received some complaints of the behaviour of his legates in the other principalities of Spain, he made choice of cardinal Hugo, surnamed the White, to repair these mistakes, and sent him with special recommendations to the court of Leon <sup>y</sup>, and with instructions no doubt to make himself as agreeable there as he possibly could. He proved an active and an able minister, as appeared from his success; for after a short stay he prevailed upon the king to suffer his ambassadors to accompany him to Rome, to assure the holy father of his obedience, and to solicit the establishment of the Roman offices in all the churches throughout his territories; and this notwithstanding his predecessor had declared, that there was nothing in the Gothic liturgies but what was perfectly agreeable to the orthodox doctrines of the catholic church; so that what the king now asked as a favour to himself and subjects, was in reality a favour only to the Roman pontif; and having thus explained from their own historians <sup>z</sup>, and without the least exaggeration, the manner in which this objection of this church and state to the see of Rome was obtained, we will return to what is more immediately our province.

Don Alphonso had once been married without ever seeing his wife, and believing that the safety of himself and subjects depended in a great measure upon his leaving posterity, he judged it high time to think of a second marriage; to which it may be he was instigated also by the legate. The lady upon whom he cast his eyes, or rather who was recommended to him, was Donna Agnes <sup>a</sup>, the daughter of the duke of Guène and count of Poitiers, and their marriage was quickly after concluded and celebrated. The rejoicings upon this occasion were interrupted by the news of a war, in which Don Alonso thought himself obliged to take a part. Ambition prompted Mohammed Aben-Habet, king of Seville, who had already united three Moorish principalities, to attempt the conquest of a fourth, and it was with this view that he assembled the whole forces of his dominions; but as this could not be done without Don Alonso's knowledge, and as he knew not where the storm would fall, he likewise assembled an army; and upon receiving advice that the king of Seville had entered the dominions of the king of Toledo on one side, he without any ceremony entered them on the other <sup>b</sup>. Ali-Maymon, as soon as he had intelligence of Don Alonso's irruption, sent ambassadors to put him in mind of the old friendship that had passed between them. Don Alonso smiled at the gravity of their harangue, and assured them, that it was no other than the sense of that obligation that brought him thither, and that Ali-Maymon might rest satisfied, that his own subjects would not serve him more chearfully than the forces under his command <sup>c</sup>. This made a speedy and strange alteration. Ali-Maymon, who had fortified Toledo, understanding the approach of Don Alonso and his intentions, instead of expecting a siege, marched out and joined him with all his forces; and, as some authors <sup>d</sup> say, attacked and routed the king of Seville in a general engagement; though others affirm, upon the junction of the armies, he thought it expedient to retire into his own territories, and soon after made a peace with the king of Toledo upon equitable conditions; but, however, it is on all hands agreed, that Don Alonso had the honour of putting an end to this war, and of expressing, in the most honourable manner, his gratitude and affection towards his royal protector.

f WE have more than once observed, that it is dangerous for the princes even in communion with Rome to shew any extraordinary respect or deference for those who stile themselves the successors of St. Peter. We have a most amazing instance of this in the conduct of Gregory the seventh, who, having received the ambassadors of Don Alonso, king of Leon, Castile, and Galicia, and the report of his legate cardinal Hugo, who by the way has an extreme bad character in history, judged it proper to make him a suitable return; which, however, is thought and treated as a very extraordinary one, even by the Spanish historians <sup>f</sup>. This return was claiming the supreme and absolute dominion of all his kingdoms, and not of his only, but of all the Christian princes in Spain; which strange title was suggested to stand upon as strange a foundation, that is, on a commission granted to Eblon, count of Rouffi, to conquer countries in the hands of infidels, which he was to possess and enjoy for his pains, yielding an annual tribute, and acknowledging himself feudatory to the holy see of Rome. When or where this great conqueror lived does not at all appear, or what this commission to him had to do with the crowns of Spain. Ferreras<sup>2</sup> seems to suggest, that the argument drawn from hence was analogical. The count de Rouffi, in case he conquered lands from the infidels, was to hold them from the see of Rome, and to pay an annual tribute: therefore, according to this precedent, all territories conquered from infidels were to be held from the see of Rome by an annual tribute. A very wild title this; and from an error in the date of the pope's letter one would be glad, for the credit of these bishops, to suppose it counterfeit: but even in this we shall not find ourselves much relieved: for this pope did not stop at a single letter, to which Don Alphonso and the other princes seem to have given no immediate answer, because they knew not well what answer to give, but repeated and insisted upon his demand, at the same time that he enjoined the kings of Leon and Navarre (for in Arragon it was already in use) to lay aside the Gothic service, and to receive that of the Roman church. This at last obliged Don Alphonso to answer plainly, as the other princes likewise did, that they were independent princes, and would own no superior upon earth. As to the other part of the injunction, the king of Leon was inclined to grant it, and did as much as he thought convenient to do; but some of the bishops in his dominions peremptorily refused to quit their antient liturgy; and others, in obedience, or rather in complaisance to the king, introduced the Roman service.

A. D. 1075.

BUT as much as the pope interfered in this, we find no traces of his interposition in another great affair, where it might have been more reasonably expected. Don Sancho, king of Navarre, being murdered by one of his brothers, and some others of his family being suspected of conniving at it, his subjects absolutely refused to obey any of his race or line. Upon this the Infant Don Ramiro, one of the brothers of the deceased king, called in Don Alonso, who possessed himself of Biscay and Rioja, while most of the nobility declared for Don Sancho, king of Arragon, who got possession of the rest<sup>1</sup>. Don Alonso took the infant Don Ramiro, and the Infantas Donna Urraca, Ximena, and Mayao into his care; but what became of Don Garcia, the king's son, unless he died in his infancy, does not appear. If ever the interposition of Rome was necessary, it was in such a case as this, to prevent orphans and innocent persons from being injured; but of this we hear nothing. Yet the next year a council<sup>m</sup> was called at Burgos to force the Roman service upon the people; and upon this occasion, it is said, that the contest between the two offices was put upon the issue of a duel, and that the Gothic knight prevailed, and that both the services being thrown into the fire, the old book escaped without hurt; but notwithstanding this, the king persuaded the major part of the ecclesiastics to make a canon, enjoining the use of the Roman service, which was attended with great murmurings and heart-burnings among the people (G).

THE year following came a legate from the pope, who found or made a great deal of business at court. The king it seems had a mind to part with his wife; and he had an ecclesiastical favourite Robert, bishop of Sabagon, who had made himself some enemies by reforming that monastery, and who, being addicted to the old service-book, could find no passage there that would countenance kings parting with their wives when they had a mind to it. The

(G) We shall have occasion in another place to treat of this matter more at large (1), and to discuss the reasons which induced the people of Navarre to think themselves under the necessity of laying aside the reigning family, and calling in princes of the collateral line to govern them. At present we will confine ourselves to the matters of fact arising from this revolution. The great acquisition which Don Alonso made by these troubles, might tempt one to believe, that he had some share in them; but when we consider that all the princes and princesses of the royal family of Navarre fled to him for shelter, and were the very persons that delivered up the countries they could not keep for themselves to him, in preference to the king of Arragon, we see all grounds of suspicion destroyed, and are obliged to own, that he acted with great generosity, as well as like an able politician (2). Those of the deceased king of Navarre's family, for whom Don Alonso made provision, were his brother the Infant Don Ramiro, his sisters Donna Ximena, Donna Urraca, and Donna Mayao (3). Mariana will have Don Ramiro to be the son of the deceased monarch, in which he is certainly mistaken; but, however, he is right in supposing that he married the daughter of Don Rodrigo, surnamed the Cid; Donna Urraca married Don Garcia Ordonnez, of the royal family of Leon, and Donna Maya the count Macon in France (4). By the treaty he made with the king of Arragon both crowns were great gainers. The noble country of Biscay was again annexed to the Asturias, and all the territories lying south and west of the river Elbro were incorporated into the kingdom of Old Castile; and all this without any effusion of blood (5).

- a legate was much an abler man ; he did the king's business and his own with great facility ; he found out that the queen Donna Agnes was some way related to the king's first queen Agueda ; who, as the reader will remember, he never saw ; and upon this pretence of consanguinity he dissolved the marriage. He likewise excommunicated abbot Robert, and sent him back into France from whence he came : in his room came another French ecclesiastic, whose name was abbot Barnard, who, before the close of the year, negotiated a new marriage for the king with Donna Constantia, daughter of Robert the first duke of Burgundy *. The poor repudiated queen likewise found afterwards another husband * in the life-time of the king ; such was the purity that attended the new discipline, or rather such were the conveniencies that accompanied the submission to the holy see, and such the arts by which the pope's legates raised themselves

- THE good old king of Toledo, and Hissem, his eldest son, being dead within little more than the compass of a year, Hiaya, the younger son of the one, and brother to the other, was seated on the throne, and proved, as the Spaniards † say, a very great tyrant ; inasmuch that the people of Toledo solicited Don Alphonso to make himself master of that city and kingdom ; but if we advert to facts, we cannot help perceiving, that the conjuncture was extremely inviting. The ambitious and all-grasping king of Seville had already attacked the unfortunate monarch of Toledo ; the king of Arragon pressed hard upon other Mohammedan princes ; so that this unlucky king had not either an ally or a protector, when Don Alphonso made his first irruption into that which is now called New Castile. We have no very perfect account
- c of this war ; but from the memorials still preserved, it is apparent, that it lasted full four campaigns, during which Don Alonso wasted all the country, and took every place of importance in the neighbourhood of Toledo ; by which, having prepared all things for the reduction of the place, he came the fifth year with a very numerous army ; and, having first blockaded the city till the inhabitants began to be in want, he at length turned that blockade into a siege. It is allowed, that Hiaya defended himself with great courage and firmness, and that Don Alphonso lost abundance of men before the place, which induced some of the citizens to represent to Hiaya, that it was better to capitulate in time than to expose them to certain death by famine or the sword. That prince clearly perceived, by the manner in which this advice was given him, that he had nothing to do but to follow it ; for that otherwise the
- d authors of it were like to treat for themselves. He therefore demanded terms from Don Alphonso, and obtained such as would not have been given, if there had been any great probability of Toledo's being taken by force. In fine, it was agreed, that the king, and such as would share his fortunes, should have leave to go where they pleased ; that the inhabitants should enjoy their religion and laws, and not suffer the smallest injury either in their persons or properties. The city being surrendered, Hiaya retired with his followers to Valentia, where he established the seat of his government, and passed the remainder of his days in the peaceable possession of a small principality ; which seems to render it plain, that he might have reigned as quietly over his hereditary kingdom, if he had been happy in having better neighbours † (H).

(H) While Don Alonso was employed in the preparations for his great design of conquering Toledo, some of the detachments which he had sent to spoil the country advanced towards the frontiers of the territories held by the Moorish prince of Saragossa ; and as he had not the least conception of the king's real intention, he judged his own dominions to be in the utmost danger ; and as he had no forces capable of resisting those of the king of Leon and Castile, he had recourse to a stratagem that succeeded in part, and was very near being attended with all the success that he could expect from it. The stratagem was this : he ordered Aben-Falax, one of his principal commanders, to enter into a secret treaty with Don Alonso, in which he gave him to understand, that he had received such ill-usage from his master as had determined him to quit his service, and at the same time to make himself master of the castle of Rueda, near the river Xalon, five miles from Saragossa, which, as he was apprehensive he could not defend with his own troops, he was willing to give it up to those of the king of Castile, provided he would come thither in person to accept of his homage. This was accordingly executed, with so much cunning and address, that Don Alonso readily embraced it, and promised to do all that was expected or desired from him (1). Some, however, of the nobility were not so easily deceived, either because they knew the character of Aben Falax, or had some secret reason for distrusting his insinuations. However that was, they prevailed upon the king not to go in person, but sent a body of troops, who summoned the Moor to the performance of his promise (2). Aben Falax trifled for a time, and pretended that he would give up the place to none but the king. However, finding this would not do, he at length proposed to surrender it to such persons of distinction as the king should please to charge with his commission ; upon which Don Alonso, desirous of having the place, which was of great consequence, sent the Infant Don Ramiro of Navarre, the Infant Don Sanchez of Navarre, the count Gonsales de Salvadores, the count Don Nunez de Lara, and some other persons of great rank, with full powers to promise, in his name, what the Moors should require ; who

taken by the king to secure and improve
that city.

THIS city was surrendered to the Christians on the 25th of May 1085, after it had been in the possession of the infidels three hundred and seventy-two years<sup>x</sup>. Don Alphonso, who knew the importance of it, resolved to make it the capital of his dominions<sup>y</sup>, and to people it as soon as possible with Christians, of whom he found many, and some illustrious families that had lived there from the time of the conquest by the Moors, and were, for that reason, as we have shewn elsewhere, stiled Mozarabians: there were likewise abundance of Jews; and the number of Mohammedans who chose to remain under his protection was very considerable. There remained, however, room for many new inhabitants, and it was not long before they were supplied, the example of the king, and of the nobility attending upon his person, being a kind of irresistible motives. On the other hand, Don Alphonso omitted nothing that might render persons of different nations and different faiths easy under his government; and it very quickly appeared that he acted in this as a very wise and prudent prince, capable of foreseeing and providing against dangers that might otherwise have proved fatal to his interests. This shews that there are some natures that are improved by prosperity; and that as we frequently see men's understandings weakened and lost through unexpected success, so in the present case we cannot but discern, that the genius of Don Alphonso expanded itself with his fortune, and that no two princes can be produced in this history more different from each other in their characters, than this monarch from himself before his expulsion, and after his restoration. These remarks are so natural, that they may at least be thought excusable.

The Mohammedans are exceedingly amazed at the loss of this famous place.

THE Mohammedans were astonished when they saw Toledo in the hands of the Christians, and the greatness of their loss was evident from the effects of that impression it made upon them, since they immediately composed their differences, and entered into a league against Don Alphonso<sup>z</sup>. The principal powers at the head of this confederacy were the kings of Seville and Badajoz, who at the same time sent ambassadors to the princes of their religion in Africa, imploring their immediate assistance; alleging, that they were now engaged in a religious war, and that Don Alonso had nothing less in view than to extirpate all who professed the faith of Mohammed. These preparations and intrigues were no secret to the victorious monarch of Castile and Leon; and that he might not appear wanting in his own defence, he assembled a numerous army in the spring, and at the same time appointed a council to be held in his new capital the Christmas following, in order to the choice of an archbishop of that metropolitan see, which he had so fortunately restored to the Christians, and which he very justly regarded as the most considerable event of his reign, and it may be as the most glorious.

Don Alonso

A. D. 1086.

As soon as the season would permit, he marched with his forces into the territories of the king of Badajoz, that he might convince him of his temerity in putting himself at the head of a league against so powerful a prince, and with this view he ravaged the country of Estremadura with fire and sword, and at length, meeting no resistance, besieged, and in a short time made himself master of Coria<sup>a</sup>. But the two Mohammedan kings, having by this time assembled a numerous army of hardy and well disciplined troops, advanced to give him battle; and accordingly, on the 23d of October, the armies met between Merida and Badajoz, where, after an obstinate and bloody engagement, Don Alonso was defeated<sup>b</sup>. Some authors say, that he was wounded in the leg, and that, having on his return to Coria reprimanded some of the nobility very sharply, they went over to the Mohammedans. Whatever truth there may be in these facts, we find the king in the beginning of November at Toledo, where he held a council, in which Don Bernard, abbot of Sabagon, was elected archbishop of Toledo, and the nobility gave the king their advice as to the most effectual means of raising a new army, numerous enough to repair the loss he had lately sustained, and prevent the infidels from acting, as it was evident they would otherwise do, offensively, as soon as the season would permit; and on this head gave him the strongest assurances of their fidelity and assistance.

had no sooner prevailed upon them to enter his fortress than he caused them to be murdered. The king, upon hearing of this infamous act of treachery, came with all his forces, in hopes of reducing it, and of punishing Aben Falax; but the place was so completely fortified, the garrison so numerous, and the magazine so well supplied, that, after several assaults to little or no purpose, he was obliged to retire, and to furnish the relations of the noble persons that were slain with a sum of money to ransom their bodies, which were interred with great pomp in the monasteries of Najara and Ona (3).

<sup>a</sup> the strength of his own dominions, extensive as they were. On this account he wrote to Philip the first, king of France, desiring his assistance, and to the great lords of his kingdom, amongst whom count Raymond of Burgundy and count Besanson went in person, at the head of a considerable body of troops, to the relief of the Christians in Spain against the infidels. But before their arrival the war was at an end; for Don Alonso having drawn together the whole force of his dominions, and marching towards his frontiers, that the infidels might see that he meant not to decline another action, the two Moorish princes, apprehensive of being overwhelmed by the foreign troops that they knew were raising, in order to pass the Pyrenees, entered into a negotiation; in which, as they were very sincere, and as Don Alonso found peace at that juncture very convenient to him, it was not long before terms were settled to their mutual satisfaction <sup>f</sup>. Yet whether these Moorish princes became his vassals, and agreed to pay him an annual tribute, as some historians <sup>g</sup> say they did, is more than we can find sufficient authority to assert, and think it a point of too great consequence to be determined by bare conjecture.

According to the capitulation of Toledo, the cathedral, which the Mohammedans had converted into a mosque, was to remain in their hands, with which the king punctually complied. But the new metropolitan Don Bernard looked upon this as a reproach to christianity, and by his vehement declamations persuaded the queen to be of the same opinion; in consequence of which, while the king was in the field, they dispossessed the Moors by force of that noble structure, restored it to its former condition, consecrated and celebrated divine service therein <sup>h</sup>, not without great danger of raising an insurrection. The Moors, however, reflected very prudently, that as this was done in the king's absence, and without his knowledge, they ought, in justice to themselves and him, to try first what might be done in the way of expostulation. They accordingly sent deputies to meet Don Alonso, and to inform him of what had happened. The king, upon hearing of this flagrant breach of faith, which was at the same time the highest insult upon his authority, though he was naturally of a calm and moderate disposition, fell into such a transport of rage against the queen and the archbishop, as terrified the Moorish deputies to such a degree, that they left his camp, returned to Toledo, and made such a report to their brethren as induced them to go in a body out of the city to meet the king, and to beseech him to pardon the authors of this injustice, offering at the same time to depart from their pretensions to the cathedral, rather than become the instruments of confusion in a state where they were willing to live peaceably, and to enjoy the benefit of his royal protection <sup>i</sup>. A very singular instance of prudence and self-denial, and which ought certainly to give us a very high opinion of their morals and good sense. The pacification thus made, the king entered the city in triumph, with the universal acclamations of all his subjects; and on the 25th of October following, the cathedral was solemnly consecrated by the archbishop Don Bernard, in the presence of the king and queen, and with all the pomp and ceremony possible <sup>k</sup>. A. D. 1087.

As every thing was now quiet, Don Alonso resolved to take this opportunity of fortifying his dominions effectually, by repairing the many cities that were destroyed in the course of the war, and to repeople them with Christians <sup>l</sup>. He began with those of Segovia, Avila, and Salamanca, and committed the care of their restitution to count Raymond, who, in all probability, settled a great part of his own people in them <sup>m</sup>. The king likewise determined to repair all the great towns between the river Duero and the mountains that separate the two Castiles; and by encouraging people to come and settle in them, he hoped to put the new kingdom he had conquered into such a condition, as, in case of fresh troubles, it might be able to furnish a strength sufficient to defend itself. In this likewise he was so well seconded by count Raymond, that the several great towns of Medina del Campo, Aravelo, Olmedo, Coca, Isicar, Cuellar, Sepulveda, and Osma, were restored, and filled with Christian inhabitants in the space of a few years <sup>n</sup>. In return for these and other eminent services, as well as to attach him to the like for the future, the king bestowed upon Don Raymond his only daughter Donna Urraca, whom he had by the reigning queen <sup>o</sup>. About this time, and chiefly through the mixture of foreigners that resorted into Spain, they quitted the old Gothic characters of writing, and began to make use of those that were common in other parts of Europe through all this monarch's dominions <sup>p</sup>. Don Garcia, king of Galicia, after having worn out many years in captivity, died in the castle of Luna, on the 22d of May, Anno Domini 1090.

His corpse was transported to Leon, and interred with those of his ancestors in the church of St. Isidore; the king and queen, together with the Infantas Donna Urraca and Donna Elvira, and most of the great lords and bishops assisting thereat; and, which is more remarkable, the irons he had worn in prison were interred with him, according to his own directions <sup>s</sup>. The next year Donna Constantia, wife to Don Alonso, died, and he soon after married Donna Bertha, the sister of his son-in-law Don Raymond, in hopes of male issue; nor does it appear that consanguinity in this case troubled the conscience of the king, or gave any offence to Rome, though Don Raymond, and consequently his sister, was nearly allied to the deceased queen <sup>t</sup>.

A. D. 1093.

THE interior of his dominions being in perfect order, Don Alphonso held it expedient to <sup>b</sup> renew his excursions on the infidels; for he was sensible, that if his troops remained long inactive they might degenerate in point of discipline, or become seditious and turbulent. To prevent this, he made an irruption into the countries since stiled Portugal, with a resolution not only to harass and plunder it, as himself and his predecessors had often done, but to make an absolute conquest of it; very justly conceiving, that whatever he took from the Moors was doubly beneficial to the Christians, as at the same time that it weakened one interest, it added to the strength of another: his army took the field early in the spring, and began their operations with the siege of Coimbra, which being speedily reduced, he proceeded to Santaren, which having subdued, he marched next to besiege Lisbon, and afterwards took Sintria by capitulation on the ninth of May <sup>u</sup>. At this very time he was also engaged in a war against Don Sancho, king of Arragon, as an auxiliary to the Moors. The case was this: the king of Huesca had become his tributary, and insisted on his protection, in case he was attacked by the king of Arragon, who was raising, as he apprehended, an army for that purpose; and it was the dread of that army that hindered Don Alonso from meeting with any resistance in his conquests. The next year this war broke out, and most of the Moorish princes entered into a league for the support of the king of Huesca, whose capital was quickly besieged. To this confederate army Don Alonso joined a body of auxiliaries, under the command of Don Garcia, count of Najara; but Don Sancho, king of Navarre, being wounded at this siege, and dying <sup>v</sup> soon after, suspended the operations of that war for the present.

A. D. 1094.

His forces, in quality of auxiliaries, made prisoners before Huesca

IN the succeeding year died Donna Bertha, and Don Alphonso gave his natural daughter <sup>d</sup> Donna Theresa, whom he had by Donna Ximena Nugnez, to Henry Besanson, who had accompanied his son-in-law Don Raymond into Spain; and, as an establishment for his daughter, bestowed upon him all that he conquered in Portugal, with the title of count, to be enjoyed by him after his decease, with a reservation only of homage to his successors, as the Spaniards say; but, as the Portuguese writers affirm, without any such reservation at all. The next year the war broke out again between Don Pedro, the son of Don Sancho, king of Arragon, and the infidels, which called Don Alonso's troops into the field as auxiliaries of his vassal, the king of Huesca; but Don Pedro, though his army was inferior in number to the confederates, gave them battle notwithstanding, on the 18th of November, in the plain of Alcoraz, and, after a sharp and long engagement, totally defeated them, with vast loss on the side of the Moors; and as to Don Garcia, and the troops under his command, they were made prisoners <sup>y</sup>. By this glorious success the conquest of Huesca was secured, and an end put to that Moorish principality. <sup>e</sup>

Don Alonso, either desirous of male issue, or weary of being longer a widower, and having heard wonders of Zaide, the daughter of Mohammed Aben-Habet, king of Seville, esteemed the most beautiful and accomplished princess of that age, he resolved to espouse her, in case she would change her religion. The proposition was very agreeable to her father, and the princess making no difficulty as to the condition, the marriage was quickly concluded and celebrated <sup>z</sup>; by which Don Alphonso acquired several places that were very convenient; and, on the other hand, restored, as a mark of his friendship, Santaren, Sintria, and Lisbon, to the king of Seville; who, upon the whole, was no gainer by this marriage. Some writers <sup>f</sup> speak of Zaide as the concubine only of Don Alphonso, and a contemporary writer speaks of her in this light; but as he afterwards retracts this opinion, and acknowledges her for the lawful wife of Don Alphonso, there seems to be no reason to question this fact. It was in consequence of this alliance that, by the persuasion of his father-in-law, Don Alphonso entered into a negotiation with Joseph, king of the west part of Afric, that is, of the kingdoms now known by the name of Fez and Morocco. The design of this negotiation was a very strange one. The a kings of Leon and Seville meditated the destruction of all the Moorish principalities in Spain, in order to divide their territories between them; and to effect this they demanded these auxiliaries upon certain conditions from this African monarch, who entered very readily into the treaty, and promised to furnish troops for the destruction of his brethren with all the readiness that the confederates could wish <sup>b</sup>.

But king Joseph had very different designs in his head. He assembled a very numerous army and a large fleet for their embarkation, and landed them without any difficulty or opposition at Malaga. There he received embassadors from the little Moorish princes, who were to be the victims of this alliance, who represented to him, that Mohammed Aben-Habet was a Christian in his heart, and intended nothing less than the total destruction of the Moors and the Mohammedan religion in Spain, which in all probability he would accomplish, unless, accepting of their assistance, the king would deprive him, as he deserved, of his dominions, and condescend to become the protector of the faithful in Spain<sup>c</sup>. This was in a great measure what king Joseph designed. He accepted their offer without the least hesitation; and, marching directly to Seville, became master of the place and of the person of king Mohammed without difficulty or dispute <sup>d</sup>. Having thus acquired a great kingdom, he began to look about him, and to consider of the proper means of executing his own project in its full extent; and this it was that led him to affect a kind of neutrality towards Don Alonso, and to carry on the war against his own nation till he had reduced Granada, Almeria, and Murcia, and had forced some other lesser lords to acknowledge him for their sovereign; and, in the end, made himself master of the best part of the rich country of Andaluzia with little or no resistance <sup>e</sup>.

It is necessary to say something here of the origin of this new people with respect to Spain, whom the historians of that country call Almovarides<sup>f</sup>. They were part of an Arab tribe that entered that district of Africa, which they now possessed near half a century before, that they might live more at their ease and in a state of retirement, as pretending to follow the dictates of their Khôran more closely than others of their sect, from whence they took the name of Morabites; from which, as we observed, the Spaniards borrowed the appellation of Almovarides. The first prince or chief of this nation was Abu-beker-ben-Omar, who, in Spanish authors, is commonly called Abu-Texifen<sup>g</sup>; and to him this Joseph had succeeded, under whose administration their affairs had prospered exceedingly. Whatever, therefore, he might pretend upon his first invitation, his real project was to make himself master of as much of Spain as possible, both at the expence of Christians and Moors; and the reason that he first fell upon the latter was, that his power might acquire a suitable augmentation before he run the hazard of contending with Don Alonso, whose reputation was very great, and of whose power all the Moorish princes were very apprehensive. But the king of Leon and Castile penetrating his design, sent an army, commanded by Don Rodrigo and Don Garcia de Cabra, to insult Seville; while Joseph was with his troops in the kingdom of Murcia. He marched, however, to intercept this body of forces, and obliged them to fight in the neighbourhood of Rueda in La Mancha; where, after a brisk engagement, the Christian army, through the bad behaviour of Don Garcia Ordonez, was defeated, and a great number slain, and a still greater number made prisoners <sup>h</sup>; which threw all the country adjacent into consternation.

THE African monarch would, in all probability, have entertained a much higher notion of his victory, if Don Garcias Ordonez, and some of his adherents who went over to him, had not given him such intelligence as left him no room to doubt, that this would prove a matter of very little consequence with regard to the fate of the war, since Don Alonso would soon be at the head of another army, and, by commanding in person, prevent such accidents<sup>i</sup> as that to which he owed his victory. The truth of this information quickly appeared; for Don Alonso was indefatigable in raising forces through all his dominions, and desiling them as fast as possible to the frontiers of New Castile; and, as soon as the season would permit, he took the field, and marched directly towards Seville, though he was informed, that his antagonist was at the head of a more numerous army. Joseph, however, taking the advice of Don Garcia, acted wholly on the defensive. He saw clearly, that if he lost the battle, it could never be repaired; and that, as things stood, he had not a force sufficient to deal with the king of Castile and Leon, and at the same time keep the Spanish Moors in awe; for this reason he took a resolution of returning to Africa, and sending over a fresh army, which he accordingly executed; while Don Alonso, finding it impossible to force the enemy to a battle, after a he had ravaged the country about Seville, and enriched his army with booty and slaves, returned into his own dominions<sup>k</sup>, much less satisfied with the success of his expedition than those who attended him, as he had received certain information, that Joseph had in a manner extirpated Christianity in Andaluzia, by transporting into Africa such of the Mozarabians as had not an opportunity of making their escape<sup>l</sup>. An act of policy, or rather of violence, which proved afterwards a fatal precedent for the Moors, as will be seen in the course of this history.

King Joseph finds it expedient to return to Morocco.

THE orders and persuasions of the African monarch were so cheerfully obeyed, and had so great an influence over his subjects, that, before the close of the year, he sent over incredible reinforcements to Spain, with orders to Almohait Hiaya, his lieutenant general, to push the war with vigour, and to make all the use possible of his superiority. He executed these orders with great punctuality, and took the field early, with so great an army, that Don Alonso was forced in his turn to retire into his hereditary dominions, and to summon all his nobility to join him under the highest penalties; yet, before this could be done, the Moorish general had actually invested Toledo, which siege he carried on with the utmost vigour, and even made several assaults, in which he was not only repulsed, but suffered great loss<sup>m</sup>. On the approach therefore of Don Alonso, at the head of all his forces, he found himself in no condition to venture a battle, and therefore retired in his turn, and contented himself with taking a place on the frontiers, that he might have a passage open to renew his excursions whenever a favourable opportunity should offer<sup>n</sup>. About this time died the Infanta Donna Elvira, the king's sister; and this year was also fatal to that famous hero Don Rodrigo, surnamed the Cid; who with his own troops, and some assistance from Don Alonso, had taken Valentia from the infidels, and had gallantly maintained his conquest against several vigorous efforts that had been made to recover it<sup>o</sup>, though far inferior in strength to the assailants (I).

(I) In the compass of this note we intend a succinct account of that celebrated hero in Spanish histories, as well as romance, Don Rodrigo Dias de Bivar, surnamed the Cid, which in Arabic signifies lord (1). He was undoubtedly a person of very high quality in Old Castile; but we dare not pretend to give his genealogy, or even to warrant that found in Mariana and other historians (2): what we aim at is to represent fairly those great actions of his life which have been the objects of authentic history; and as for that fabulous legend of incredible, and even impossible adventures, which have obscured, and consequently diminished his true fame, which they were intended to illustrate, we leave them to be found in a multitude of histories; and we are sorry that we cannot refer to the Latin life of this celebrated person, composed in the reign of the emperor Charles the fifth by Ramiro Nugnez de Guzman, and by him dedicated to the prince Don Philip, afterwards Philip the second, which has not, however, been published. The first time we find the Cid mentioned in the more antient authors (3), is in the year 1063, when he assisted the prince Don Sancho, who marched with a body of auxiliaries to the assistance of a Moorish prince, when he had a large share in the battle of Grao, where Don Ramiro the first king of Arragon was defeated and slain. In 1068 and 1070, he commanded under Don Sancho, king of Castile, against his brother Don Alonso, as is very certain; but that he attended that monarch into Galicia, rescued him when taken in battle, and afterwards brought Don Garcia prisoner, though related by some modern historians, is not so well established as to deserve intire credit. In 1072 he commanded, under his master Don Sancho, at the siege of Zamora, retired from thence in good order with the Castilian forces, carrying with him the royal corpse, which he caused to be interred in the monastery of Ona. We have remarked in the text, that he alone, of all the Castilian nobility, was so hardy as to administer the oath of exculpation to Don Alonso at Burgos, and, by the manner in which he did it, incurred his displeasure. Two years after, perceiving that the king's resentment continued, he resolved to retire out of his dominions, notwithstanding he had married a little before Donna Ximena Diaz, daughter to Don Diego Alvarez de las Asturias; and accordingly, followed by all his friends and dependants, and by many of his relations, he went into Arragon; where, after ravaging and plundering the country adjacent, he at length made himself master of the castle of Alcocer, situated at a very small distance from Calatayud. Thither resorted to him a great multitude of malecontents from Castile and Leon, which enabled him to continue his inroads upon the Moors with great success. As he extended his conquest gradually, he penetrated at length into the district of Teruel, or, as some write it, Tervel, twenty-seven leagues south of Saragossa, where he fixed his residence in a strong fortress, called to this day Pena de el Cid, that is, the rock of the Cid (4). It may not be amiss to observe, that there is not in all Spain, perhaps hardly in Europe, a more pleasant country than this, where the air is so pure, and withal so soft, that there is a kind of eternal spring; every little copse being enamelled with odoriferous flowers, that blow, flourish, and decay in all the months of the year. It was during his residence here, that he had intelligence of the execrable murder of the unfortunate Hiaya, formerly king of Toledo, and then lord of Valentia, traiterously slain by Aben Japhet, who usurped his little principality. Upon this the Cid sent to the king, Don Alonso, to put him in mind of the obligations he was under to revenge that poor prince's death, and to desire, that he would send him a small detachment of troops, with which, joined to his own, he would try his fortune be-

- a In the first year of the twelfth century deceased Donna Urraca, who, as well as her sister the Infanta Donna Elvira, preserved her virginity during her whole life, and was buried with great magnificence in the church of St. Isidore <sup>p</sup>. The city of Jerusalem being at this time taken from the infidels by the forces of the Christian princes, under the command of Godfrey of Bouillon, several Spanish noblemen proceeded to Rome, with an intention of joining the succours that were about to pass into the Holy Land; but Pope Paschal the second very prudently interposed, and advised them to return home and deliver their own country from the infidels first. The Moors, as soon as they had intelligence of the death of the Cid, made very little doubt of their recovering Valentia; and therefore bent all their forces that way. Don Alonso opposed to them a very numerous army, under the command of his son-in-law the count Don Henry;
- b who, endeavouring to stop their passage, gave them battle at Malagon, where, however, he met with a signal defeat <sup>q</sup>; notwithstanding which Donna Ximena, the widow of the Cid, assisted by Don Alvaro Fanez the governor, defended the place with such spirit and obstinacy, that after lying before it a long time, and suffering great loss, the infidels were at last obliged to retire. This was a very seasonable check, and prevented the Moors from harrassing New Castile, which gave Don Alonso time to regulate his domestic affairs, and to put the city of Toledo into a state of defence, by repairing the walls from the church of St. Stephen to the river <sup>r</sup>.

The city of Valentia gloriously defended against the Moors by Ximena, widow to the Cid.

- THE very next year the Moors, with a great army, appeared again before Valentia, which was preserved by the succours sent by Don Alonso over the mountains with very great difficulty, and with such expence, as determined him to quit that place; which, lying at so great a distance from the rest of his dominions, he believed would fall, sooner or later, into the hands of the infidels, with all the Christians who were in it, and who, at his command, withdrew <sup>s</sup>. Soon after this Don Alonso lost his fifth wife Donna Isabella, who was buried in the church of St. Isidore with great solemnity, leaving behind her a son, Don Sancho, who was considered as the heir apparent of all his fathers extensive dominions <sup>t</sup> (K). But, notwithstanding he had now an heir male, the king resolved to marry again; and Bernard, archbishop of Toledo, whom he had sent to the Pope, negotiated a match with the princess Beatrix, of the house of Este, very little to the satisfaction of the Infanta Urraca, and her husband Don Raymond. Soon after this he had the misfortune to lose a great battle against the Moors, in which, however, he did not command in person; but notwithstanding it is acknowledged that great numbers were slain, and many taken prisoners, yet by his prudence he had soon so formidable an army on foot that the Moors were not able to draw any great advantage from their victory <sup>u</sup>.

fore Valentia. The king applauded his design, granted him all and even more than he asked; and the Cid, in 1094, after a long siege, took the city, and defended it against the whole force of the Moors, who attempted to recover it. There he continued the remaining part of his life; and there, full of years and of glory, he died in 1099 (5), leaving his widow Donna Ximena in possession of Valentia, which she also defended with more than masculine bravery, till, in obedience to the king's orders, for reasons that are mentioned in the text, she thought fit to abandon it. As to his wars with the kings of Aragon, and the counts of Barcelona, they appear to be but fabulous; and the same thing may be said of many of his expeditions against the Moors, at least as they are commonly represented; and as to the marriage of his daughters with the counts of Carrion, they have been already, by the judicious pen of Sandoval, shewn (6) in their proper light, that is, of foolish and inconsistent falsehoods.

(K) We have already acquainted the reader, that this Moorish princess, to facilitate her marriage with Don Alonso, at the time of her baptism, took the name of Maria Izabella, or Elizabeth, for they are the same name; and yet a strange mistake happened very early in relation to this princess, occasioned by some obscurity in the inscription to her memory; whence Don Pelayo, bishop of Oviedo, has made her both the king's queen and concubine. His queen, by the title of Izabella, daughter to Lewis king of France, and his concubine, by the Moorish name of Zaide (1). Mariana corrects half this mistake, since he acknowledges her to have been the lawful wife of Don Alonso, but still this Izabella of France runs in his head also (2). Another inquisitive and judicious writer (3) seems to have untied this knot effectually, for he has produced the inscription, which has given rise to this dispute; and which, notwithstanding, is as decisive as one could wish, and being very concise, we will transcribe it: Hic R. Regina Elizabeth, uxor Regis Alphonsi, filia Benavit Regis Siviliæ, quæ prius Zaïda fuit vocata; that is, Here reposes queen Elizabeth, wife of king Alphonso, daughter to Benavet, king of Seville, who was formerly called Zaide. The old writers many of them (4) bestow upon her two daughters by the king, which, however, she had not; but, as his family is very clearly represented to the view of the reader in the text, it would be needless and impertinent to repeat any thing upon that subject here.

The royal family was increased on the first of March 1106, by the birth of the infant Don Alonso, son to Don Raymond count of Galicia, by the Infanta Donna Urraca, who was baptised in the apostolic church of St. James at Compostella; with respect to the birth of which prince, the annals of those times unanimously report, that a new and bright star was observed for thirty days together, before that in which he was brought into the world<sup>y</sup>; which in those days was regarded as a very favourable presage, and will be deservedly exploded in these; since, supposing the fact to be true, it could have no more relation to Spain than to any other country where that star was visible.

*Invasion of the Almovarides and the fatal battle of

JOSEPH, king of the Almovarides, thought it now high time to return into Spain, having fully achieved all that he proposed in Africa, bringing over with him on board a numerous fleet, a much more powerful army of Mohammedans and Moors than had hitherto ever landed in that kingdom<sup>z</sup>. As soon as he had incorporated them with those which he had already on foot in that country, he judged his power sufficient to undertake at once the conquest of the dominions of the king of Castile and Leon, with which view he assembled two great armies, and all the remaining princes of the Moors, to which he destined a third<sup>a</sup>. Don Alonso was not a little alarmed at the news of these preparations; and, being too old to command an army in person, he sent for Don Raymond, his son-in-law, out of Galicia, who fell ill of a fever in his journey, and died upon the road; but the good old king had the satisfaction of visiting, and affording him all the consolation in his power in his last moments<sup>b</sup>. He then made a progress through the kingdoms of Leon and Castile, in order to quicken the nobility in marching with their vassals to form an army in the neighbourhood of Toledo, towards which city he foresaw the enemy would not fail to advance as soon as the season would permit. He was not mistaken in his conjecture; for king Joseph, having united his troops on the frontiers, bent his rout directly towards the capital<sup>c</sup>. Don Alonso, in hopes that it would give fresh courage to his army, which was composed of almost all the force of his dominions, sent the infant Don Sancho, though a child but of eleven years old at most, with his governor Don Garcia de Cabra; but who had the chief command does not appear<sup>d</sup>. On the arrival of the infant the Christians advanced to Ucles, where they met the infidels ranged in order of battle; the dispute was very obstinate, and they fought on both sides with the utmost intrepidity, till at length the Mohammedans pierced into the center of the Christians, and surrounded that body of troops where the young infant was, whose horse being killed he stood on foot, and his governor Don Garcia covered him with his buckler, fighting with incredible bravery, though he was far advanced in years, till at length he fell, and bore down his pupil with him; when the Moors massacred all that body of troops; and the army being intirely broken, gained a complete victory, no less than seven counts dying in the field<sup>e</sup>. This fatal battle was fought on the 29th of May 1108, and was the most heavy reverse of fortune the Christians had sustained since the loss of the city of Leon; but, however, the Moors bought this victory so dearly, that they were in no condition to reap any immediate advantage from it<sup>f</sup>. The infanta Donna Urraca, with the assistance of the bishop of Compostella, having assembled all the forces in Galicia, advanced immediately into New Castile, received the scattered remains of the defeated army, and marched with so good a countenance towards the Moors, that they did not judge it convenient to venture another battle, but contented themselves with the reputation they had acquired, and retreated into their own dominions. The Christians took this opportunity of putting a strong garrison into Toledo, while the old king brought out of Castile a fresh body of troops, which enabled him to cover that city with a good army in the field<sup>g</sup> (L).

(L) There can be nothing more evident, from the account given us of this fatal battle, than that the infant Don Sanchez was the legitimate son and heir apparent of Don Alonso; for otherwise it would have been an act of extreme cruelty, to have exposed a child of eleven years of age, to no purpose whatever. The heir of all was, or ought to be, the care of all; so that, in this desperate state of things, the king may be said to have acted wisely in sending that young prince to the army; for, by this action he plainly shewed, that the safety of his people was dearer to him than the safety of his Children. He shewed also his courage and firmness of mind, in assembling fresh troops, and providing, notwithstanding this severe blow, for the future security of his dominions; which, in a prince, so broken with age and diseases, was so much the more laudable, as it was less to be expected a THE king Don Alphonso was, as we may well suppose, extremely mortified to find himself in this sad situation in his declining years, and when his bodily infirmities, as well as his great age, disabled him from doing what his prudence dictated in favour of his subjects. He did not, however, omit any thing that was yet within the reach of his abilities, Guido, archbishop of Vienna in France, brother to the deceased Don Raymond, coming into Spain to see his nephew Don Alonso, the king caused the young prince to be brought to Leon; to which city he directed all the nobility of Galicia should repair; and in his presence, as well as of the French archbishop, take an oath of fidelity to their infant sovereign, whom he appointed his sole successor <sup>b</sup> in all his dominions, in case his daughter Donna Urrara should have no other male issue, having, in compliance with the desires of the nobility, consented to her marriage with Don Alonso king of Arragon and Navarre<sup>i</sup>. He disposed the troops under the command of the several counts, who brought them into the field so judiciously on his frontiers, and gave his orders so properly for assembling a numerous army, in case the Moors should make any attempt, that they chose to carry their army into Catalonia and elsewhere, rather than attempt to purchase any more victories at so dear a rate as the Castilians were accustomed to sell them <sup>k</sup>. It does great honour to the memory of this prince, that, though for the space of eighteen months he lay in a weak and languishing condition, the civil and military affairs of his kingdom were preserved in so good order, that there neither happened any invasion from foreign enemies, or any tumult or commotion among the people; and in his capital city of Toledo Don Alvaro Fanez, whom he had appointed governor, disposed every thing to such advantage, that the inhabitants were not under the least apprehension, though they had every day fresh advices of the increasing strength of the Moors<sup>l</sup>. At length the king, worn out with age, care, and sickness, departed this life June the thirtieth, in the year of our Lord 1109, when he had enjoyed the regal dignity thirty-seven years from the time of his restoration, and forty-four from the death of his father <sup>m</sup>. His sixth and last wife Donna Beatrice returned into Italy after his decease <sup>n</sup>.

THE demise of this prudent and potent monarch was indeed the epocha from whence might be dated the miseries of his subjects. Don Alonso king of Arragon and Navarre, believing it impossible to acquire kingdoms without an army, entered Castile at the head of a numerous body of troops, to support his claim of the government in right of his queen; the states quickly put an end to the troubles that this might have occasioned, by informing him, that they were not accustomed to see their sovereign at the head of foreign troops; that his army therefore might be better employed in his own dominions, since there was no need of force, where the right of the queen was not at all disputed. Don Alonso received this message with the spirit it deserved; he said, he knew not the intentions of his people when he entered Castile in arms, but that he was ready to dismiss his army, which he did immediately, and to rely on their loyalty, which had been ever conspicuous <sup>o</sup>. He found it much more easy to deal with the states than with their queen, who was so very fond of sovereignty, that she would willingly have reckoned her husband only the first of her subjects. The passion of her first husband count Raymond made him really so; the dignity, and it may be said the disposition of the king of Arragon forbade it. He laboured to make her sensible, by reason of the duty she owed to him, and she discovered by her behaviour, that she understood nothing of duty, but as others were bound by it to obey her will <sup>p</sup>. An old Castilian nobleman, Don Pedro Affarez, the companion of her father's exile, the favourite of his whole life, and who had been entrusted with her pected (1). Some historians tell us, that he did still more, and they report the occasion of it thus: They say that after this battle, discoursing with those who were most in his confidence, he expressed a strong persuasion, that this was a severe visitation from heaven for some particular sins; and that they had little hopes of a change of fortune, till the necessary change was made in their manners; and how this might be effected he was at a loss to know, and would be glad to learn. One of his nobility took occasion from thence to observe, that heaven punished them by the Moors, for his having suffered too great an intercourse between them and his subjects, which had produced a great depravity of morals, and the fatal introduction of foreign luxuries, to which in former times the Castilians were utter strangers (2). The king received this admonition thankfully, and immediately published a prohibition (3) of public baths, and of all kinds of spectacles and diversions, which, in imitation of the Moors, had been introduced at first among persons of distinction, and by degrees diffused through all ranks of people, which had a very good effect, and banished for a season that propensity to idleness, vanity, and pleasure, which are always both the causes and the symptoms of a declining state.

education,

education, took the liberty of expostulating with her, and of setting her conduct in a true light; which provoked her to such a degree, that she banished him the court, stripped him of his employments, and confiscated his estates<sup>a</sup>. The king could not bear this; he took Don Pedro into his immediate service, he restored him to his honours, his employments, and his estate; declaring, that whatever injury was offered to him, from whatever hand it came, he would regard it as done to himself<sup>b</sup>. This naturally increased the disorder; which at length rose so high, that the king secured the person of his consort, and made her prisoner in the fortress of Castellar<sup>c</sup>, from which she was speedily delivered by some of the nobles of Castile, and began to feel great trouble of mind on account of the relation between her and her husband, for they were second cousins; so that, to quiet her conscience, she was desirous the marriage should be dissolved<sup>d</sup>.

A civil war breaks out in Galicia,
where the rebels seize the young prince.
A. D. 1110.

IN the midst of these disturbances a civil war broke out in Galicia; Don Pedro Frolaz de Traba had been charged with the education of the young Infant Don Alfonso by his father, and confirmed in it by his grandfather; his conduct was irreproachable; and this was the source of the war<sup>e</sup>. Some of the nobility, headed by two brothers, Don Arias Perez and Don Pedro Arias, men of a most turbulent spirit, invested the castle where the young prince was; and, contrary to their faith given, tore him out of the arms of the countess Don Pedro's wife, and imprisoned for a time the archbishop of Compostella, who reproved them for their rudeness<sup>f</sup>. But the inhabitants of that city taking arms in behalf of their prelate, they thought proper to set him at liberty, retaining still the young prince in their custody, and pretending to colour all the violences they committed, with the specious pretence of loyalty to the child they kept a prisoner<sup>g</sup>; a sort of proceeding that put an end to the regular administration of affairs in that province, and threw all things into the utmost disorder and confusion. Such was the disastrous train of events that fell out in the first year after the demise of that great king, who had raised the power of the Christians in Spain to so formidable a point of elevation.

Ali Joseph,
king of the Almoravides, besieges Toledo without success.

JOSEPH king of Morocco, and of the Almoravides in Spain, died much about the same time with Don Alphonso the sixth, and was succeeded by his son Ali Joseph<sup>h</sup>, who, for the sake of distinction, we shall call only Ali, and who had been for some years his father's viceroy in Spain; but at the time of his demise he was in Africa, from whence he speedily returned with a numerous army and a potent fleet. He had no sooner debarked his forces, than he marched directly to Seville; and, having examined and given the necessary directions for repairing and augmenting this capital of his dominions, he issued his orders for a general rendezvous of all his forces at Cordova, to which city he repaired in person. Having made a general review, he concluded himself well able to accomplish what his father had only contrived; and, under a strong persuasion of this, grounded probably on the present state of the Christians, he proceeded directly towards Toledo, wasting all the country with fire and sword, and utterly demolishing two beautiful monasteries in his passage<sup>i</sup>. The city being completely invested, and no fear of disturbance from any army in the field, he proceeded vigorously in his siege; and, by the help of the best machines then in use, actually made a breach in the wall sufficiently practicable. He intended to have stormed upon the eighth; but on the seventh day of the siege, Don Alvaro Fanex, with the best part of the garrison, passed, by the help of wooden bridges, over the breach into his camp a little before the break of day, levelled his works, burnt his machines, and gave his troops such an earnest of the reception they were like to expect, that the king of Morocco, finding he had no stomach to the attack, very prudently raised the siege the next day, with a resolution to insult Madrid<sup>j</sup>.

Fails in the whole expedition, and returns again to Morocco.

THERE was but a small garrison in the place, but the inhabitants were very numerous, and they defended themselves so gallantly, that he was obliged to retire from thence also; but, to make himself amends, he took another route into his own dominions; and, sweeping all the country before him, amassed a prodigious booty, and carried many thousands of people into slavery<sup>k</sup>. All these, together with the remains of the Christians who still lived peaceably in his territories, he caused to be shipped on board his fleet, with which he returned to Africa; and having carried his miserable captives up to Morocco, dispersed them in the county adjoining to that capital, to replace, in some measure, the inhabitants whom he had carried to Spain<sup>l</sup>. Thus the Christians of New Castile were left to supply the vast loss they had sustained in the best manner they could, by their private endeavours, as they had received very little assistance, and could scarce expect more from the condition of their government, which was so extremely unsettled, that it scarce deserved that name, as appears from no efforts being made, either upon a the irruption or the retreat of the infidels, when they might have been attacked with the greatest probability of advantage.

THE nobility of Leon and Castile saw with inexpressible concern how low they were fallen, and how much lower they might fall: they therefore solicited the queen to consent to a reconciliation with her husband; and to this, to satisfy their importunity, she at last agreed <sup>d</sup>. That it might appear an act of her own, she went to him, and was received; and they lived together again for some little time <sup>e</sup>. But the coldness and contempt of Don Alphonso was too apparent to be borne by a princess of so high a spirit; and therefore the queen, believing that she had now given her nobility all the satisfaction they could expect, left him again, with a full resolution never to be reconciled to him more, which naturally increased those disorders, that were but too many and too great already <sup>f</sup>. The king, on the other hand, depended upon the Arragonian lords, whom he had placed as governors in some of the best towns in both the Castiles, and upon many of the Castilian nobility, who were also in his interest; for though he had conceived an implacable aversion to the queen, he was by no means willing to part with her dominions <sup>g</sup>.

THE queen, though her affairs wore so indifferent an aspect, did not suffer her spirits to sink at all; but by her affability to all the lords of Castile, who came to pay their respects to her, and by her gracious deportment towards the commons, drew over multitudes of all ranks to her party; and these at length came to entertain so good an opinion of her cause and their own force, that they summoned the Castilians, to whom the king had committed castles, to surrender them; which, generally speaking, they did, and threatened to reduce the Arragonians by force <sup>h</sup>. Among the rest, Don Pedro de Affurez surrendered those which the queen had taken from him, and to which he was restored by the king's favour; but, as soon as he had done it, he went directly to Toledo, and having obtained an audience of the king, told him, that as for the fortresses they undoubtedly belonged to the queen his master's daughter, who having demanded he had yielded them, as he conceived it is duty; but that, if his majesty considered the thing in another light, he had brought his body to answer for the offence. At first the king was in so great a rage, that, if some of his favourites had not interposed, Don Pedro's life would hardly have been safe; but as soon as that transport of passion was over, the king embraced him, and testified the highest admiration of his loyalty and virtue <sup>i</sup>. From this moment the king discerned that his authority could no longer depend on any thing but success; and therefore, having recommended the kingdom and capital of Toledo to Don Alvaro Fanez, who had shewn himself firmly attached to his service, he marched with a small body of excellent troops directly into Castile, where he found the whole force of that kingdom assembled to impede his passage, which put him under a necessity of beginning the war with what had very much the appearance of a decisive battle; and as things were come to this extremity, he was a prince of too much courage to decline it; though without question he could not avoid discerning of how dangerous consequence these disputes were to the Christian cause.

THE queen's army was encamped in the neighbourhood of Sepulveda, and, upon the king's troops advancing towards them, a battle ensued, which was fought on the 28th of October 1111, in a large plain called Campo de Espina, which in English we should call Thornfield. The vanguard of the queen's army was commanded by Don Pedro de Lara, which was quickly broke by the square battalion of the Arragones infantry, commanded by the king in person, upon which Don Pedro fled to Burgos. The second line, commanded by the count Don Gomez, made a gallant and obstinate resistance; and when they were at last broken, the count had the honour to die upon the spot, covered with glory and wounds. There fell likewise many other persons of great distinction, and a great number of private men. In consequence of this victory, the king became master of Burgos, Valentia, Carrion, Sabagon, and the royal city of Leon; all which he gave up to be pillaged by his soldiers, who plundered even the monastery of Sabagon, and the church of St. Isidore at Leon, the sacred dormitory of their kings, which filled all the adjacent countries with such terror, that some places in Galicia, seduced by his emissaries, declared for the king <sup>k</sup>.

THE queen, who was retired to a place of safety, published, to repair this loss, a proclamation, requiring all her subjects, capable of carrying arms, to take the field <sup>l</sup>. In the mean time, however, the archbishop of Compostella, and Don Pedro Trolas de Traba, prevailed upon Pedro Arriaz and his accomplices to compromise their disputes, and to surrender the person of the young prince Don Alonso Raymond, whom the archbishop crowned <sup>m</sup> with great solemnity before the high altar in the cathedral church of St. James, and quickly after carried him, at the head of the best army they could raise, to join the queen his mother; but were attacked in their passage by the king of Arragon: and though the army was defeated, yet the archbishop found means to convey the young prince safely to the queen, who, as soon as it was in her power, retired with him back again into Galicia, where she immediately began to raise a new army; while the king of Arragon, with his victorious troops, besieged the city of Astorga, in which were the remains of the archbishop's army, who made a gallant and a long defence<sup>1</sup>. The queen applied herself to count Henry of Portugal, who had married her sister, and intreated him to assist her, and the son of his friend, in this danger and distress. Count Henry advised her to march immediately to the relief of Astorga, and promised to join her with a considerable body of troops, which he did. The great lords of Asturias likewise joined her with the flower of their militia; and the nobility of Castile about the same time attacked and defeated a body of Arragonese troops that were in full march to join their king; and that prince found himself in such circumstances, that he raised the siege of Astorga in the night, and retired precipitately to Carrion<sup>2</sup>. The queen followed him so close, that her forces invested the city almost as soon as he entered it; and in all probability he had fallen into her hands, if the pope's legate, who was lately arrived in Spain, and who appointed a council to be held in Palentia to judge finally of the queen's marriage, had not prevailed upon her to suffer him to retire, upon his promise to deliver up all the places in her dominions that were in his possession; which, however, he absolutely refused to perform<sup>3</sup>. The count Don Henry of Portugal, had scarce the pleasure of seeing the queen in Astorga, before he died there<sup>4</sup>, and was carried from thence to Braga, where he lies under a splendid tomb. Mariana seems to have aspersed his memory by mistake, in ascribing the loss of the former battle to his deserting the queen after it began<sup>5</sup>.

The war continued between the king and queen, of which the Moors
take advantage.

THE queen, Donna Urraca, finding herself deceived in her expectations, and under a necessity of having recourse to arms, in order to recover the city of Burgos, into which the king her husband had put a strong garrison, and caused a new castle to be erected for its defence, marched thither. She found this enterprize, however, embarrassed with far greater difficulties than she expected; for, on one hand, the lords of Castile were so displeased with her conduct towards Don Pedro de Lara, that they abated much of their zeal for her service; and, on the other, the Galicians had their suspicions likewise, arising from their affection to the young king; so that, if the archbishop of Compostella had not been indefatigable in his endeavours, the army could never have been brought before Burgos; which city soon opened its gates, but the garrison held out a siege of several weeks, but at length was obliged to surrender on the feast of St. John the Baptist<sup>6</sup>. About this time the Moors made an irruption into the kingdom of Toledo, and advanced from thence towards the frontiers of Galicia; but, at the pressing instances of the queen and archbishop, a numerous army marched against them; upon which they thought it more adviseable to retire with the plunder they had acquired<sup>7</sup>, than to hazard a battle against troops that would otherwise be employed in their service, that is, in weakening the king of Arragon.

A council held at Palentia, in which the queen's marriage is declared void.

THE queen, to put an end to these troubles, that had so long disturbed and distracted her subjects, called a general assembly of the states at Burgos; to which, at her request, resorted Don Bernard, archbishop of Toledo, and Don Diego, archbishop of Compostella. The debates in that assembly ran quickly very high; for most of the Castilian nobility, and more especially the deputies of the city of Burgos, declared roundly for the queen's being reconciled to her husband; and, upon the archbishop of Compostella's insisting on the invalidity of the marriage, they were so exasperated, that he thought it prudent to withdraw; soon after which the assembly broke up, referring the decision of this difficult point to the council that was to be held at Palentia<sup>8</sup>. This council<sup>9</sup>, held in the beginning of the succeeding year, and in which the pope's legate presided, declared the marriage null; by which an end was put to all the king of Arragon's pretensions; who, notwithstanding, raised by his emissaries a formidable rebellion in Galicia, which, but for the prudence and spirit of the archbishop of Compostella, might have been attended with very fatal consequences (M). (M) Those of the nobility, who now took up arms in Galicia, were Pedro Gudesteo, Rodrigo Nugnez, Arias Perez, and Pedro Arias; against whom the bishop of Compostella quickly marched with forces so considerable, that the malecontents thought fit to separate. Pedro Gudesteo and Rodrigo Nugnez retired to their castles, which lay by the sea-side, and invited an English body of troops on shore, who happened to pass at this critical juncture along the coasts of Galicia, on board their own vessels, and had sent to desire leave to purchase provisions. They complied readily with this invitation; and were no sooner on shore, than they began to spoil and lay waste

- a on some occasion from Toledo to Segovia, an insurrection happened in the last-mentioned place, in which he was unfortunately killed. He was succeeded in the government of Toledo by Don Rodrigo Nunez; whether by the appointment of the king of Arragon, or by the choice of the inhabitants, does not appear; but by that time he was well fixed in his office, the city was invested by a numerous army of infidels, under the command of Amazaldi; but the place was so well defended that he was obliged to retire<sup>b</sup>. To make himself some amends he ravaged all the adjacent country, and Don Rodrigo Nugnez, with the best part of his garrison, attacking him in his retreat near Pulgar, in hopes of recovering the booty, were thoroughly beaten for their pains. The next year Amazaldi returned with a great army of Moors into the neighbourhood of Toledo, when Don Rodrigo Nugnez had his revenge; for drawing his whole force out of the city, he gave the infidels battle in the field, and, after a long and bloody engagement, cut the greatest part of them to pieces, and their general Amazaldi among the rest<sup>c</sup>. A. D. 1115.
- b Donna Urraca, desirous of reducing the places that still remained in the hands of the king of Arragon, went to Compostella, in order to procure the assistance of the Galician nobility; and conceiving some jealousy of the bishop, who had done her so many services, would have seized upon his person, if she had not been prevented by some of the lords who were his friends; after which a reconciliation was brought about, which enabled her to oblige Don Alonso to retire into his own dominions, who was upon the point of making a fresh irruption into Castile<sup>d</sup>. To this singular mark of his credit with the people, and loyalty to his sovereign, that prelate speedily added another, by causing a small squadron of gallies to be built and equipped at his own expence, which not only freed the coasts of Galicia and Asturias from the insults of the Moorish pirates, who had pillaged and destroyed all the sea-coasts, but likewise made reprisals, by plundering their territories. Notwithstanding all this, the queen became again out of humour with him to such a degree, that she directed his friend Don Pedro Frolaz to secure his person; instead of which he gave him notice of his danger; and, after maturely weighing the many inconveniences to which they were exposed from the mutability of this princess's temper, they judged it most expedient to put the government into the hands of her son, at least the kingdom of Galicia, to which his right seemed unquestionable, even in the lifetime of his mother; which proposition was well received by all the nobility, and the design was put in execution, which occasioned new disturbances; for the queen assembled all the forces of Leon and Castile, and pretended to treat the bishop and his adherents as rebels, notwithstanding her son was with him and approved of all he did<sup>e</sup>. At length, however, by the interposition of some of the principal nobility, things were compromised; when the queen had visibly the advantage, and might have treated those who adhered to her son with great severity, or at least have obliged them to abandon their country<sup>f</sup>. But as there was nothing cordial in this reconciliation, so it did not last long, both parties retaining a deep resentment of what had passed; the queen looking upon the bishop and Don Pedro Frolaz as men who had seduced her son into a rebellion; and they regarding her as a princess besieged by flatterers, inordinately fond of power, and far from having those abilities that were necessary to govern so many kingdoms, in so critical and perilous a conjuncture.
- c THE Moors were so tempted by these intestine disturbances, to hope the recovery of Toledo, that they scarce failed either besieging or attempting to besiege it, every year. In this we are told, that Ali sent one of his generals, whom an ancient Spanish chronicle calls Acredelia, with a numerous army, to ruin the country round about. But the Christian governor, whom the same author calls Abbacil, foreseeing the consequences of such expeditions would be distressing the place by famine, marched out with his forces, engaged and beat the enemy, and killed their general upon the spot. The Moors, provoked at this defeat, and still anxious to avail themselves of the troubles among the Christians, speedily drew together a fresh army, and under Aben Haret, a celebrated general of theirs, took the field, and marched directly towards Toledo. They found, however, their passage speedily stopped by the governor, and the waste the country on every side. The bishop of Compostella had no sooner notice of this, than he directed some gallies, which had been built at his own expence to act against the Moorish pirates, and which were laid up in the port of Padron, to be equipped, and embarked on board them some of his best troops, with orders to find out and engage the English. They executed his instructions very punctually, and made themselves quickly masters of the whole squadron, including some vessels belonging to the Galician rebels, the best part of the men being on shore. At their return the bishop purchased all their prisoners, that he might have an opportunity of setting the English at liberty; practising the like generosity upon the reduction of the castles, which very quickly followed. As for Arias Perez and Pedro Arias, they were no sooner informed of the fate of their companions, than they quitted Galicia, and retired to Don Alonso of Arragon (1).

(1) Histor. Compestel. lib. i. which is a proper and sufficient authority to a fact of this nature, though not supported by any other, as probably lying out of the way of other historians.

whole force of the garrison, who immediately gave them battle, and this with success not inferior to the former; since the Moors were intirely vanquished, and Aben Haret, being taken prisoner was sent to the castle of Toledo; while the governor, with his victorious army, ravaged the Moorish frontiers, and swept the places where he came so thoroughly of provisions, that it was impossible to assemble any third army there for that year, which, at that juncture, was indubitably a thing of infinite consequence to the cause of the Christians <sup>a</sup>.

The queen and the bishop of Compostella in great danger of being burnt in a commotion.

THE compromise between Donna Urraca and those who declared for her son, was quickly violated by the queen's besieging Gomez Nugnez in the castle of Turon, which he held for Don Alonso Raymond, and she was soon after besieged herself in Soberosa by Don Pedro Frolaz, at the head of the Galician army, assisted by the troops of Portugal, though that country was governed at that time by her sister Donna Theresa; but the great lords of Castile and Leon <sup>b</sup> came with a potent army to deliver the queen, and clapped up another pacification; soon after which she returned to the royal city of Leon <sup>c</sup>. Some new disputes arising in Galicia, the enemies of the bishop of Compostella took advantage of them, and were on the point of securing his person; for, being a moderate and an honest man, this prelate had the honour to be very heartily hated by the bigots of both parties; so that, to provide for his own security, he was obliged to retire to Leon. The queen received him with equal kindness and respect, desired him to write to those worthy men, who were his friends in Galicia, to compose these disturbances, and to put things into such a situation, as she might with safety visit her son; which in a little time was brought about, and the bishop first, and the queen not long after, went to Compostella <sup>d</sup>. The populace, surmising that there was a secret intention to punish them for the insults they had offered to their prelate, surprized him with the queen and the principal nobility in the cathedral, and, failing in their attempt to force it, set that noble structure on fire, crying, vehemently, let the queen come out, and let the bishop and his adherents perish in the flames <sup>e</sup>. The bishop, more concerned for her safety than his own, obliged the queen to quit the cathedral, which she did, and retired to the church of St. Mary, loaded, in her passage, with all the foul language that an enraged mob could bestow; and, after her departure, the bishop, not without great difficulty, made his escape in disguise <sup>f</sup>. In the midst of these disorders, the inhabitants of Toledo took a very laudable resolution of recalling their natural prince; and accordingly Don Alonso Raymond made his public entry into that city 1117 <sup>g</sup>.

Don Bernard, archbishop of Toledo, re-

AT this juncture there was a schism in the church of Rome; one party adhering to cardinal de Gayette, by the name of Gelasus the second; the other, supported by the emperor Henry the fifth, to Maurice Burdin, archbishop of Braga, who assumed the name of Gregory the eighth, but was soon after deposed, and ended his days in prison (N). (N) We have as hideous a picture of this Maurice Bourdin, or Burdin, in various histories, as it was almost in the power of men to invent (1). Amongst other things it is said, that, being sent to Rome to solicit on behalf of Bernard archbishop of Toledo, he most ungratefully traduced that prelate, to whom he had the highest obligations; and laboured assiduously to get himself raised to that dignity; which, upon the whole, however, does not appear to be true. He was a native of Limoges in France, and was carried from Rome into Spain by the archbishop of Toledo, with whom he was in great favour. In the year 1108, he became bishop of Coimbra, or Conimbra; after which he made a tour to the Holy Land, and in his return staid some time at Constantinople, where he was very much caressed by the emperor Alexis (2). Upon his coming back to Portugal he was, in 1110, elected archbishop of Braga. It was in consequence of this, that he came to differ with his old patron the archbishop of Toledo, who, as the pope's legate and primate of Spain, required such submission from him, as he thought inconsistent with the rights of his see, which had always contested the primacy with that of Toledo. In reference to this dispute he went to Rome, and pope Pascal the second thought him so far in the right, that by his letter to the archbishop of Toledo, dated November the third 1115, he discharged him from the exercise of his legantine power within the province of Braga (3). As a farther mark of his confidence in this archbishop, the same pope sent him with the character of his legate to treat with the emperor Henry, whom the archbishop ventured to crown in his absence; for which the pope excommunicated him in the council of Beneventum (4). Gelasus the second, his successor, was exactly of his sentiments; and the emperor, hearing that he had assumed the popedom without his leave, caused the archbishop of Braga to be elected by those of his party, March the 14th 1114, who thereupon assumed the name of Gregory the eighth, and was so acknowledged in some parts of Germany and England; whereas in France and in Spain they acknowledged Gelasus, and in many countries they would own neither. Calixtus the second succeeded Gelasus, made peace with the emperor, and then proceeded to Rome; upon which Gregory retired to Sutri, whither Calixtus followed him with an army, and made him prisoner in the month of April 1121. His soldiers mounted him upon a camel with his face towards the tail, with a sheep's skin new flead and bloody about his shoulders. He sent him prisoner to the monastery of Cava, and from thence removed him to Janula, from whence his successor, Honorius the second, transferred him to Fuman near Alatri, where he wore out the remainder of his days, and died in such misery and contempt (5), that the time is not known.

- a age in general were certainly very extraordinary persons; for we find, that Don Bernard, <sup>duces Alcala</sup> archbishop of Toledo, whose gratitude to the memory of his protector had kept him firm to <sup>the interests of his family, and who, therefore, while the place was in the hands of the king</sup> the interests of his family, and who, therefore, while the place was in the hands of the king <sup>of Arragon, remained under a cloud, no sooner regained his own authority, than he per-</sup> of Arragon, remained under a cloud, no sooner regained his own authority, than he persuaded the people to make an attempt upon the strong town of Alcala de Henares, the same which the antients stiled Complutum, and to which, from a conflux of waters, the Moors gave the name of Alcala, and distinguished it farther by the adjunction of Henares, the river upon which it stands; it was in all respects very considerable, but particularly in commanding a large district of country, well fortified, and had a numerous garrison; notwithstanding which, and that the Moors defended themselves gallantly, the archbishop reduced it, and immediately
- b put it into the king's hands, who made a grant<sup>o</sup> of it to the archbishops of Toledo, from which place it is distant about eighteen miles.

- At the opening of the ensuing year died pope Gelasus, who was succeeded by the arch- <sup>Discontents a-</sup> bishop of Vienne, uncle to Don Alonso Raymond, by the title of Calixtus the second, for <sup>gainst the</sup> which reason we mention it<sup>p</sup>. The queen, who at this time was upon good terms with her <sup>queen rise so</sup> son, desired his assistance for recovering the places that were still held by the king of Arragon; <sup>high, that the</sup> and Don Alonso joined her with a considerable body of troops at Segovia, to which city she <sup>nobles seize</sup> came with a numerous army, attended by most of the nobility of Leon, Castile, and Asturias. <sup>Don Pedro</sup> In a short time, however, after the king's arrival, disputes arose; for the nobility could not bear, that Don Pedro de Lara should put on airs of state and dignity in the presence both of
- c his and their master, which excited murmurs in the army; till two of the principal lords cut things short, by seizing upon the person of Don Pedro, and carrying him prisoner to the castle of Mancilla; upon which the queen, in great discontent, retired to Leon<sup>q</sup>. After her departure, the king, with the forces under his command, entered upon the proper business of the campaign, and reduced most of the places that were held by the king of Arragon, while those two lords of the queen's army, who had seized Don Pedro, followed her to Leon, reduced that city, besieged her in the castle, which they constrained her to deliver up, and to be reconciled to her son<sup>r</sup>. The new pope, at the request of a prelate who had deserved so well by his strict adherence to his nephew, raised the see of Compostella to the rank of an archbishoprick, of which dignity Don Diego Gelmirez took possession July the 25th, on the
- d feast of St. James, in the year 1120; and in the succeeding year he held a council there, in which he presided as the pope's legate, which gave no small offence to the archbishop of Toledo.

- His cares were, however, unsuccessful, in respect to the preservation of the public tranquillity; some of the nobility in Galicia remaining in arms under slight pretences, but with high protestations of their fidelity to the king; which brought Donna Urraca thither, who had again drawn together a considerable army, by the assistance of the lords of her party in Castile. The archbishop of Compostella received her with all imaginable marks of duty and respect, and, in obedience to her commands, endeavoured to reduce those of the nobility who were in arms; which, with some difficulty, he performed<sup>s</sup>. The queen then declared her
- e intention to act against her sister Donna Theresa, on account of her having taken Tuy, and some other places which belonged to Galicia. The archbishop did all he could to prevent this war; but finding this out of his power, he passed the river Minho with his forces, and the rest of the queen's army; but when Donna Theresa, after having abandoned all the places in question, was besieged by the queen in the castle of Laniusa, the archbishop was desirous of retiring with his forces into his own diocese, which revived the queen's old resentments against that prelate, to whom she ascribed most of the disappointments she had met with in her violent projects. She dissembled, however, her disposition for the present, and gave him leave to send back his troops; but, under pretence of relying wholly upon his advice, would not suffer him to retire from about her person. She could not, however, take her
- f measures so secretly, but that her sister Donna Theresa gained intelligence of them, and gave notice to the archbishop of his danger, who was so much deceived by the queen's behaviour, that he considered this as an artifice to detach him from her service. He was very quickly convinced of his error; for, upon raising the siege, and the army's repassing the Minho, the queen caused this prelate and his three brothers to be arrested, and sent to different prisons<sup>t</sup>, without the king's consent, though he was in the army; and at the same time seized upon several castles and lands that belonged to the archbishoprick of Compostella. The queen's politics deceived her extremely upon this occasion; she imagined, from what had formerly happened, that this would have been pleasing to numbers of the Galicians; whereas it proved quite otherwise. The enemies of the archbishop were only so on account of his attachment to the queen; and therefore the news of his imprisonment was no sooner divulged, than they were the loudest in their clamours; and those who would have burnt him in his church, now took a up arms, or would have taken up arms, for his deliverance. It was thought more adviseable to try fair means first; and therefore four prebendaries of the cathedral, and four deputies from the city of Compostella, were sent to know the reason why the queen had confined their archbishop, and met with a very ill reception. The queen went, however, in person to that city; and, on St. James's day, proceeded in pomp to the cathedral, which she found intirely hung with black; and was met at the entrance by the principal persons of the city in mourning, who very respectfully desired, that she would lay hold of this opportunity to set their archbishop at liberty: but the queen was inexorable; upon which her son Don Alonso left her, and went and incamped with his forces on the other side of the river, which raised the spirits of the people, and intimidated the queen, who at length perceiving her person in danger, and that the people had seized John Diaz, in whose custody the archbishop was, she pretended suddenly to change her mind, ordered the archbishop to be released, declared she was satisfied of his innocence, and that she meant with the utmost severity to punish his accusers; but this had no effect; neither the populace thanked her for the archbishop's deliverance, nor could that prelate be ever afterwards brought to trust her *. So low even princes fall, when their artifices are discovered.

The death of Donna Urraca, the cause of which is differently reported.

A. D. 1126.

IN a short time after this, things were on the point of coming to an open rupture; the queen and her Castilian lords remaining in the field with one army, and the king Don Alonso, with the archbishop, Don Pedro Frolaz, and most of the nobles of Galicia, at the head of another; but, through the indefatigable pains of the prelate, things were at length accommodated; and sixty lords of the queen's party bound themselves for the due performance of articles *. But soon after all was in confusion again; Don Alonso, or at least the nobility about him, would have Galicia taken for a separate and independent kingdom, within which the queen should have no power; whereas the queen pretended, that her son held it in homage of her; and therefore very frequently committed therein most exorbitant acts of power. Some writers † say, that, wearied out with these disputes and their consequences, Don Alonso confined her; but the contrary is much more probable. At length on the sixth, as some ‡ say, on the eighth, as others § affirm, and, as some ¶ again assert, on the tenth of March, in the year of our Lord 1126, she died at Saldagna, not far from Carrion, of the consequences of a miscarriage, as certain historians † allege; though there want not those ¶ who affirm, that, having plundered the church of St. Isidore, she died suddenly as she came out, and was buried in the royal dormitory there, among the princes her ancestors, little regretted by her subjects †.

Don Alonso VII. succeeds in Castile, Leon, and Asturias, being before king of Galicia and Toledo.

THE king Don Alonso came to Leon within two days after the death of the queen his mother, and was received with all possible testimonies of affection and loyalty by the nobility of Leon, Castile, and Asturias, who there swore allegiance to him; only the citadel of that place, being in the possession of the adherents of Don Pedro Lares, and his brother Don Roderic Gonzales, were hardy enough to refuse giving up that fortress to the king, surrounded by his nobility ‡. They were quickly made sensible of their fault; for many of the great lords, and more especially the archbishop of Compostella, had brought troops; so that, with the assistance of the townsmen, the place was presently invested, and in a few days carried by storm; when the king might have put the rebels to death, as well by the rules of war, as by the laws of the land; but he contented himself with banishing them his dominions †. He next made a progress to Zamora, in order to receive the homage of the nobility in that neighbourhood; and this over, he went to Ricorado, which stands at the conflux of the rivers Orbigo and Duero, where he had a conference with his aunt Donna Theresa, and concluded a truce with her for a certain time; after which he returned to Zamora, to meet such of the Galician and Castilian nobility as had not hitherto sworn allegiance †. But some there were, who, hardened by that spirit of anarchy that prevailed during the late troubles, absolutely refused to acknowledge him for their prince. These were Don Pedro Gonzales de Lara, and his brother Don Roderic, who kept, with their adherents, in the mountains of Santillana; Don Ximenez Iniquez, who held the town now called Valentia; Don Juan and Don Arias Perez in Galicia, where they had seized Castro, Luparia, de Pena, de Cornaria, and other places †.

- a jara, and some others; but this seems to have been chiefly out of pique to Donna Urraca; for, as soon as the king's accession was published, they most of them opened their gates, and the people of Burgos particularly compelled the king of Arragon's governor to retire into the citadel, which they reduced without any assistance, and then put both the city and fortress into the king's hands<sup>1</sup>. In Galicia the archbishop of Compostella humbled Arias Perez, tho' not without effusion of blood. Don Ximenes was constrained to surrender Valentia, though he would not do it but to the king in person; so that, before the end of the year, the king found himself in full possession of all the dominions of his grandfather, except some few districts on the frontiers of Old Castile, which, however, troubled him more than all the rest, as the king of Arragon had some colour of title to them, which he appeared determined to maintain and make good by his sword. In the beginning of the succeeding year he marched with a numerous army, resolved to recover as much as possible, or at least to protect what was still left; the king of Castile and Leon advanced towards him with the flower of both nations, and surrounded by the principal nobility and prelates of his dominions. When the armies drew near each other, neither of these princes discovered any great eagerness to fight. The king of Castile spoke very respectfully of his antagonist, and the king of Arragon could not help having a tenderness for a prince he had been accustomed to call his son. The prelates and nobility on both sides saw this with great satisfaction; and the king of Arragon having been prevailed upon to send a message, importing, that in forty days he would order all the places in dispute to be evacuated, Don Alonso Raymond demanded a personal interview, where all their differences were amicably determined, and the two kings parted perfectly good friends<sup>m</sup>.

- WHILE the king Don Alonso Raymond was at a distance from the frontiers of Galicia, Donna Theresa, who made no doubt that the war in Arragon would find him full employment, caused the troops of Portugal to pass the Minho, in hopes of recovering Tuy, to which she pretended a right. Don Alonso had no sooner notice of this, than he marched thither with the utmost diligence; and having obliged the enemy to repass the river, followed them into Portugal, where he began to lay the country waste with fire and sword; but at length, through the persuasions of the archbishop of Compostella, who accompanied him, he was prevailed upon to listen to an accommodation, and things were speedily adjusted between him and his aunt<sup>n</sup>. This was quickly followed by an alteration of government in that country, where the people were extremely dissatisfied with Donna Theresa's administration, and her too great regard for Don Ferdinand Perez, the son of Don Pedro Frolaz; and therefore proposed to Don Alonso Henriquez, her son, that, laying aside his mother, he should take the government into his own hands; to which that high-spirited young prince readily consented, and caused himself immediately to be proclaimed sovereign of Portugal<sup>o</sup>. His mother, however, who was not of a humour to part with her right so easily, and who had a good body of troops, under the command of her favourite, about her person, marched directly to reduce the prince and his adherents; but having the misfortune to lose a battle, and being soon after obliged to surrender a fortress, into which she had fled for shelter, she was constrained to do as her subjects would have her, and to leave the administration in the hands of her son<sup>p</sup>; and as for Don Ferdinand Perez, he retired into Galicia (O).

(O) The usage which Donna Theresa has met with from the generality of historians, is yet harder than that of her sister. It is reported, that she had an intrigue with Don Veramond, the son of Don Pedro Frolaz; but being better pleased afterwards with his brother Don Ferdinand, whom she seems to have made earl of Trafamara, she consented that Don Veramond should marry the princess Donna Elwira her eldest daughter, and then secretly espoused the earl his brother; which excited, as it very well might, a general clamour amongst her subjects; and produced that offer which was made to the prince Alonso, mentioned in the text (1). Whatever truth or falshood there may be in the former of these facts, the latter has such a concurrence of evidence, that it may be regarded as certain; and from thence we may easily account for the conduct of this princess in respect to her sister and nephew, as well as for that intelligence which she seems always to have had with the malecontents in Galicia; and which she knew very well how to turn to her own advantage. We are told, that, at the time she was deprived of her administration and liberty by her son, he ordered two small chains to be put upon her legs, to prevent her escape, which she resented so much, that she prayed earnestly to God his legs might not continue whole as long as lived; and it is added, that, being defeated by the king of Leon, he broke his leg in endeavouring to make his escape, by which accident he became a prisoner. It is also reported, that he remained ever after so lame, that, being unable to mount a horse, he travelled always in a kind of carriage (2), of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter.

Fresh troubles in Castile, and a noble instance of Don Alon-so's clemency.

DON Alonso, king of Leon, having at this time peace on every side, and being full two a and twenty years of age, thought it time to provide for the succession by a prudent marriage; and with this view cast his eyes upon Donna Berengara, the daughter of Raymond, count of Barcelona, a young princess of great beauty and distinguished merit; which marriage was concluded by the interposition of the king of Arragon, to the great satisfaction of all parties<sup>a</sup>.
The year following he held a council<sup>b</sup> at Valentia, in which Don Raymond, who succeeded Don Bernard in the archbishoprick of Toledo, presided; and in which many wholesome canons were made. Soon after this the king of Arragon, who had not been very punctual in fulfilling his promise, formed some pretensions upon Medina Cæli and Moran, the latter of which he besieged; but the king of Leon marching with a numerous army to its relief, the king of Arragon raised the siege, and retired into his own dominions. The appearance of this war b raised another rebellion; for Don Pedro, count de Lara, and his brothers, attempted to engage the city of Valentia in a revolt, and not succeeding in that design, fortified several places in the mountains of Santillana. The king followed them hither sooner than they expected, invested the fort where Don Roderic Gonfalez was, took it by storm, and made Don Roderic prisoner, who, knowing he deserved no mercy, did not expect it; but the king, having degraded and stripped him of his estates, gave him his life and liberty, but banished him his dominions; and not long after Don Pedro died of infirmities and a broken heart. His brother was no sooner informed of this, than he returned privately into Castile, threw himself at the king's feet, and desired leave to live obscurely in his own country, assuring him, that he had not in his dominions a more faithful subject. The king, touched with his repentance c and humility, restored him to his honours, his estates, and his employments, which he more than merited by his future services<sup>c</sup>. The king, perceiving that his forbearance would never procure the places that were still in the hands of the king of the Arragon, took the advantage of that monarch's absence in France, to reduce them by force; but he contented himself with this, and did not offer any insult to that prince's frontiers, or to his subjects. It is very possible he might have some political motive to this moderation in his conduct.

A. D. 1130.

The gallant behaviour of Don Roderic Gonfalez, whom the king
pardoned.

ALL this time a prædatory war was carried on between the Christians in the kingdom of Toledo, and the Moors subject to the king of Seville; in which Don Roderic Gonfalez, now restored to the king's favour, had his share; and, though he behaved very bravely, had the d misfortune to be beat; but, upon the arrival of Texefin-ben-Ali king of Morocco, things began to have a more serious aspect; for he privately issued his orders to his principal officers, to assemble a numerous army in the plain of Lucena, on the side of Cordova, looking towards Toledo, intending to have destroyed all the towns in the neighbourhood of that city. In the mean time the Christians, vexed at their late defeat, formed a body of a thousand excellent horse, and three or four thousand foot, passed the Tagus on the side of Talavera, and after that the Guadiana and Sierra Morena, with all the speed and secrecy possible, and at length threw themselves into the territory of Cordova, with no other intent than to plunder, and make a hasty retreat. There they received the first intelligence of the king of Morocco's being on the other side of the city with a large army; upon which, giving themselves over for lost, they took a sudden and generous resolution; and, after a short repose, began their march e in the afternoon, continued it all night, and, before break of day, fell into the Moorish camp, where they made a horrible carnage; for the troops having not the least expectation of an enemy, more especially on that side, and, being attacked in the night, were so thunder-struck, that they could make no resistance; the king himself, wounded in the thigh, got on horseback, and fled to Cordova, to which place as many followed him as escaped; the victorious Christians plundered the camp, mounted all their infantry on horseback, and, with immense riches, returned in triumph to Toledo<sup>f</sup>, where the people were equally rejoiced at their success, and at their own happy escape from a danger, of which they had not the least notice, till it came, attended with that of their deliverance. A circumstance that rendered their transports the greater, and did not recommend the governor the less.

An insurrection in Asturias, a year in Galicia, and an irruption of
the Moors.

THE next year afforded the king of Castile and Leon troubles sufficient to exercise his courage and conduct. In the spring a rebellion broke out in the Asturias, at the head of which were the counts Don Gonfalez Pelaez and Don Roderic Gomez: he marched immediately thither, and had the good fortune to make Don Roderic prisoner, whom he degraded from his honours and banished; but Don Gonfalez, retiring into the city of Tudela, made there a long and vigorous defence; but, finding it impossible to escape, he submitted to the king's mercy, who pardoned him freely; but by that time he returned to Leon had intelligence he had revolted again, and had made himself master of several strong places<sup>g</sup>. His attention to this misfortune was called off by a greater, which was, the news that Don Alonso of Por-

While A. D. 1132; he was thus employed, advice was brought him, that the king of Morocco was on the point of invading the kingdom of Toledo with a numerous army; upon which he declared Don Roderic Gonzalez governor of that city and kingdom. That nobleman raised a considerable body of forces; and having secured the capital, and heard that his master was advancing towards the king of Morocco, he threw himself into the kingdom of Seville, where he had the good fortune to defeat the Moors in a general engagement; and, having ravaged the country to the very gates of Seville, returned with his victorious army laden with plunder, and driving with them a multitude of slaves in triumph to Toledo <sup>y</sup>. The king of Morocco, on the approach of Don Alonso, after he had spoiled the open country, and taken and ruined some places of strength, thought proper to retire into his own dominions; where, meeting with a small body of Christians returning from an expedition, he surrounded them in the night, and the next day cut most of them to pieces <sup>z</sup>.
- b

- THE Moorish monarch Texefin-ben-Ali, bearing still in his mind the importance of Toledo, Don Alonso's and that the recovery of this place was absolutely necessary to restore the credit and power of his nation, resolved to make yet another attempt, with an army more numerous than any he had before employed; but the king of Castile and Leon, being as early in the field as he, <sup>glorious expedition against the Moors, and triumphant return.</sup> marched directly towards that city, which the Moors had scarce time to invest, who thereupon raised the siege, and withdrew into their own country <sup>a</sup>. Don Alonso having reviewed the garrison of Toledo, and considering that the city could be in no danger while they were in the enemy's country, resolved to proceed forthwith into the territory of Cordova, by one passage, while Don Roderic, with the troops under his command, did the same by another, appointing the castle of Gallelo for the place of junction. There the armies being united, the king advanced into the neighbourhood of Cordova, wasting all the country before him, destroying their harvest, cutting down their fruit-trees, tearing up their olives by the roots, carrying off their cattle, burning their villages, ruining their mosques, killing their priests, and driving their people into slavery; which, unless it was done from a principle of retaliation, and to prevent the continuance of such a method, was certainly extreme cruelty. He advanced in this manner to Seville, beyond it, and even to the sea-coast: in his return, however, with an immense booty, he met the van-guard of the Moorish army; but being at the head of his own, composed of Castilian cavalry, he charged them so briskly, and with such success, that the gross of the army thought proper to retire into Seville; so that, without any farther interruption, he returned in triumph into his own dominions, and at Taravera dismissed his troops <sup>b</sup>.

- THE brave old kind of Arragon was far from being so fortunate; his army being defeated by the infidels, and himself killed <sup>c</sup> before Fraga. As he died without heirs of his body, it produced great disturbances; the people of Arragon electing his brother Don Ramiro, though a monk, and the people of Navarre Don Garcia Ramirez, a descendant from their antient princes, for their king <sup>d</sup>. In the midst of these confusions, Don Alonso marched with a numerous army towards Rioja, where the inhabitants of Najara and Callaborra opened their gates to him, as did all the places of any consequence on the south of the Ebro, till he came to Saragossa, where he was met by Don Ramiro, king of Arragon, and the chief prelates and nobility of his dominions, to whom Don Alonso declared, that it was not through any motive of ambition, or with any views of conquest, that he came thither with his troops, but purely to protect them from the infidels <sup>e</sup>. While he remained here, his brother-in-law, count Raymond, of Barcelona, repaired thither, and did him homage as his vassal; and his cousin Don Alonso of Toulouse did the like. The king of Arragon, with the consent of his prelates and peers, yielded to him the city of Saragossa; and the bishops having, in great ceremony, bestowed upon him their benedictions in the church of our lady of the pillar, he returned with his army into his own dominions <sup>f</sup>. The new king of Navarre met him in his passage, and, being desirous to obtain his protection, did him voluntary homage <sup>g</sup>; after which he proceeded to Leon to keep his Whitfuntide, at which season he proposed to solemnize his coronation. There were present together at this high feast the king and queen of Castile, the Infanta Donna Sancha, the king's sister, Don Garcia, king of Navarre, with all the prelates, abbès, counts, and great lords of the kingdom. They met the first day in the cathedral church of that city, where they consulted of ecclesiastical affairs only, and of the means of restoring ecclesiastical discipline. The day following it was resolved to proclaim the king Don Alonso emperor; and, accordingly, a deputation was sent to bring him from his palace to the church, where Don a Raymond, archbishop of Toledo, assisted by the bishops, abbots, and clergy, waited for him. As soon as he entered, the imperial mantle was thrown upon his shoulders, he was conducted up to the high altar, where, the crown being placed upon his head, and the scepter in his hand, supported on the right by Don Garcia, king of Navarre, and on the left by Don Arias, bishop of Leon, the clergy sung a solemn Te Deum; after which followed divine service; and, as soon as this was over, he was proclaimed emperor, all the assistants crying with a loud voice, Long live his imperial majesty <sup>b</sup> Don Alonso. This ceremony concluded, the emperor, with all who were present, returned to his palace, where a sumptuous feast was prepared (P).

The monarchs
of Navarre and Portugal enter into a league against the emperor.

WE might reasonably, from the number of his vassals, and the good-will expressed to him <sup>b</sup> on all sides, more especially in regard to the last mentioned action, conclude, that no prince had less to fear from his Christian neighbours; but such is the nature of men, and too frequently of princes, that they oppress those that are weaker, and envy such as are stronger. Upon this principle it was that Don Garcia Ramirez, king of Navarre, and Don Alonso Enriquez, sovereign of Portugal, entered into a league against the emperor; the cause of which was, that the former was desirous of recovering the country of Rioja, and the latter was unwilling to render homage to the emperor for his dominions, by whom it was required. In virtue of this league, Don Alonso made an irruption into Galicia, where he made himself master of Tuy<sup>c</sup>, and some other places, partly by force and partly by corrupting the governors, who were entrusted with Turon and Limmia. The emperor sent an army into Galicia, commanded by some of the prime nobility, to expel the enemy, but they were unfortunately defeated. As for the king of Navarre, the emperor was no sooner informed of his behaviour, than he entered his dominions in person, at the head of a numerous army, and wasted his country, without being able to bring him to a battle<sup>k</sup>. In this expedition he had a conference with the king of Arragon, to whom he restored the city of Saragossa, upon condition that he should hold it as his feudatory, and do him homage, which he very willingly accepted<sup>l</sup>.

(P) In the assembly of the lords and prelates, which, upon this occasion, is not stiled a council, probably because religious matters were not the subject of their deliberations, the following laws were made, or rather declared, for most of them seem to have been laws before, and to have received only on this occasion the sanction of the emperor, that his subjects might have the greater reverence for his new title (1). 1. The people shall henceforward be governed in the same manner, and enjoy the same privileges, as in the reign of Don Alonso VI. grandfather to the reigning emperor. 2. Churches and private persons shall be restored to whatever estates they can prove any legal title to. 3. All towns and villages that have been destroyed during the late troubles shall be rebuilt and repeopled, and the country round them cultivated, by planting vines and fruit-trees. 4. The judges shall every where punish, with such severity as the law requires, malefactors of all kinds, without respect of persons. 5. Sorcerers and magicians shall be punished with death. 6. The alcaides of Toledo, and other frontier provinces, shall annually make excursions into the enemy's territories, and waste the country with fire and sword. These were all the laws they passed; and it appears to have been the meaning of this last to oblige the Moors to put themselves under the king's protection, or at least it had this consequence; for we find that, upon an expedition of this nature, about five years before, a certain Moor of great quality, whose name was Zafadola, descended from the antient kings of Cordova, and lord of Rhoda, in the province of La Mancha, submitted himself to Don Alonso, put that place into his hands with its dependencies, and, retiring with his family into the kingdom of Toledo, had very considerable grants of castles, houses, and arable lands for his support; and as his castle of Rhoda was given by the king to his new born son, it fixes the birth of the Infant Don Sancho to Anno Domini 1131 (2), which is of some importance.

(Q) There does not appear the least trace of the motives which induced the emperor to entertain fresh suspicions of Don Roderic Gonzales. All we know of the matter is, that this great man no sooner perceived it, than he demanded leave to take the cross, as was common in those days, in order to make an expedition into the Holy Land, which was willingly granted him; and he went accordingly, accompanied by such as were either desirous of making that expedition, or inclined to follow his fortunes. He behaved in the wars against the Saracens with the same courage and conduct as against the Moors; built a fort near Ascalon, which he fortified, and provided with every thing necessary for its defence; but being seized with a desire of seeing his native country, he made a present of it to the knights templars. On his return to Spain, he went first to the court of Don Raymond, count of Barcelona, afterwards to that of Don Garcia, king of Navarre; but it does not appear that he ever thought of entering Castile; from whence we may conclude, that he remained still under the emperor's displeasure. We have a farther proof of this, from his withdrawing out of Navarre, in order to put himself under the protection

- a pointed Don Roderic Fernandez to the government of Toledo in his stead ; who, at the first entrance into his government, had the good fortune not only to make a successful inroad in the territory of Cordova, but likewise to beat the king Texefin ben-Ali, who attacked him in his return to Toledo, which gained him great reputation<sup>a</sup>. The next year the emperor went in person against the Portuguese, and sent three of his principal nobility, with a numerous army, to make head against the king of Navarre. As his army was more numerous than that of his antagonist, he entered the kingdom of Portugal, and wasted the country with fire and sword<sup>b</sup>. On the other hand, Don Alonso Enriquez, who acted on the defensive, being extremely chagrined to see his dominions ruined, and his subjects oppressed, fought, with the utmost diligence, how he might be revenged : and perceiving that Don Ramiro, who commanded a great detachment of the emperor's army, was at too great a distance to be succoured, he threw himself and his forces between him and the emperor, and, attacking him with great fury, destroyed most of his troops, and made him prisoner<sup>c</sup>. This check served only to irritate the emperor, who endeavoured to force his cousin Don Alonso to a battle ; who, upon intelligence received, that the Moors had made an irruption on the other side of Portugal, was prevailed upon by his nobility to send a deputation to the emperor, who received them very obligingly ; telling the ambassadors there would not be much difficulty in making a peace ; towards which there required no more than restoring the places and setting the prisoners at liberty taken on both sides. This was done on the part of the Portuguese at the return of their deputies, and immediately after by the emperor, who then had an interview with his cousin, and parted so good friends, that Don Alonso Enriquez thought proper to order the counts Don Gomez Nugnez, and Don Rodrigo Velloso, who had given rise to the war, by betraying their master, to quit his dominions<sup>d</sup> ; the common reward of traitors ; which affected the former so much, that he retired into France, and became a monk ; as for the second, he went to the emperor, and expressed so much sorrow for his offence, that he forgave him, and restored him to his employments<sup>e</sup>. Don Roderic Fernandez made another successful expedition against the Moors this year ; and the emperor's brother-in-law, Don Raymond, obtaining the crown of Arragon by the marriage of the heiress, prevailed upon the emperor to restore the places he had taken from that kingdom<sup>f</sup>.

Portugal demands peace of the emperor, which is granted. A. D. 1137.

- THE war on the side of Toledo continued with pretty equal fortune on both sides ; but the emperor, finding himself at ease from his neighbours, resolved to make a brisk effort with all his forces against the infidels, which he accordingly did, by entering Andalusia with a numerous army. A considerable detachment having passed the river without the emperor's leave, out of a desire to pillage, there fell so heavy a rain in the night, that they found the stream altogether impassable, and the very next day were surrounded by the enemy, and cut to pieces in sight of the emperor and his army, only one escaping by his great skill in swimming<sup>g</sup>. This accident so disgusted the emperor, that he returned into his own dominions, resolving to conclude the campaign with reducing Coria, a place of importance, and which, being in the hands of the Moors, gave him a great deal of trouble. He besieged it accordingly ; but the place being very well defended, and Don Roderic Martinez, governor of Leon, and one of the emperor's principal generals, being killed upon the spot, the emperor caused the siege to be raised ; and having bestowed upon Don Osorio, the son of Don Roderic, his father's employments, he returned to Leon<sup>h</sup>, by no means pleased with the operations of the year ; and resolved to employ the winter in preparing for a new expedition in the spring ; to which he was not a little excited, by having advice, that Texefin-ben-Ali had caused the best part of the Christians inhabiting in his dominions to be transported to Africa<sup>i</sup>, where he employed them as soldiers, being well acquainted with their valour, and having no reason to distrust their fidelity, when fighting against as well as for infidels ; which afflicted the emperor exceedingly ; who knew well enough, that the principal motive to this ill usage was the inclination they had shewn of becoming his subjects. He took pains, therefore, to settle, in the best manner he was able, all disputes with his neighbours, and even to terminate such as had broke out between themselves, from a persuasion that, when they had no other quarrel on their hands, they of Aben Gama, viceroy for the king of Morocco, in Spain, who resided at Valencia, where he was received with all possible testimonies of kindness and respect. Yet he did not continue long in this place ; for the Moors, for what reason it is impossible to guess, gave him a poisonous draught, which threw him into a leprosy ; and being by this means convinced that he could be no where safe in Spain, he returned again into the Holy Land, and there ended his days. A memorable instance of the danger in digressing once from the right path, which it is extreme difficult, if not impossible, to recover (1).

would naturally employ their arms against the Moors; and that, whether designed or not, a these would be in effect so many diversions in his favour. His scheme, as it was well laid, was prudently and happily executed; so that in the spring he found himself at full liberty to pursue the plan of operation he had laid down, without any apprehension of being compelled by new disturbances to alter his measures, which had hitherto been the principal cause that his arms had not made so great an impression upon the infidels, as, from the superiority of his power, in comparison with that of his predecessors, he had just reason to expect. He certainly reasoned very right upon this head; and if he could have prevailed upon the sovereigns of Navarre, Arragon, and Portugal, to have adopted the same principles, and to have pursued them steadily, the Moors had been much sooner driven out of Spain than they were.

He determines to reduce the castle of Oreja
on the frontiers
of Castile.

THE infidels had a very strong fortress at Oreja, which lay to the east of Toledo, from whence they made frequent irruptions into the territories of that city; and the year before, the Christians, not without great difficulty, had erected the castle of Azeca, in order to be a check upon this place; but it seems this did not prove so effectual a remedy as the nature of the case required: the emperor, therefore, resolved to open the campaign with the reduction of Oreja*, that his subjects might be once for all delivered from this thorn in their sides, with which hitherto they had been continually troubled. Accordingly, Don Roderic Fernandez invested it with the forces under his command, in the month of April, and the emperor joined him soon after with a very numerous and well appointed army. The alcaide of Oreja was Ali, esteemed the best officer in the Moorish service; he had a very powerful garrison, and the place was well supplied with every thing necessary; so that, as his countrymen expected, he made a very brave and well conducted defence†. At length he gave notice to the alcaides of Cordova and Seville, that their out-works were ruined, his garrison much diminished, his magazines almost exhausted, and that, therefore, they must send him an effectual and speedy relief, if they expected he should keep the place. The alcaides began to amass provisions, and to raise forces, at the same time that they gave intelligence to Texefin-ben Ali, who was at Morocco, of the situation things were in, and the apprehensions they were under; upon which he sent over a fresh body of troops, and ordered them to leave nothing untried to force the emperor to raise the siege‡. Upon the junction of their forces, the alcaides found themselves at the head of thirty thousand good troops, with a vast train of waggons, laden with provisions d and other necessaries. They resolved to march directly towards Oreja, and were so confident of success, that they sent instructions to Ali to make a vigorous sally upon the Christians when they should begin to raise the siege‡. The emperor, who had perfect intelligence of all their measures, determined to wait for them, and to give them battle if they persisted in their design, or to suffer them to besiege Toledo, if they proposed by that method to divert him from his enterprize.

In their march, the Moors took a small fort or two, and at length insulted the castle of Azeca, where the empress lay with the ladies of her court<sup>b</sup>. She sent a message to the alcaides, that the emperor waited for them at Oreja, which was the proper place for men of their birth and breeding to signalize themselves, and that little honour was to be got by disturbing a number of helpless women<sup>c</sup>. The Moorish generals excused themselves for their ignorance, and desired to have the honour of paying their respects to her imperial majesty. The empress, to gratify them, appeared upon the ramparts with all her ladies richly dressed; and the alcaides, at the head of their troops, in order of battle, having paid her their military salute, retired without giving her any farther disturbance. They tried every method they could devise to draw the emperor out of his lines, or to force a passage for their succours, but to no purpose. At last Ali sent to the emperor, and offered to surrender, if he was not relieved in a month, upon condition that his garrison marched out with the honours of war, and was escorted safely to Calatrava. The emperor accepted the proposal, and gave him leave to send to the king his master, who returned for answer, that he might surrender when he would, for that it was not in his power to relieve him<sup>d</sup>. When they came to march out, himself and garrison were perfect skeletons; the emperor received them very kindly, entertained Ali at his own expence, and ordered the garrison to be distributed thro' the camp. The alcaide expressed his surprise, and desired he might march to Calatrava. The emperor bid him be in no pain, that the articles should be punctually executed, but that he could not part with so many brave men in such a condition; and after feasting them for a month, sent them back very well satisfied with their usage<sup>e</sup>. The fortress of Oreja was surrendered in the month of October; and, after a the castle was thoroughly repaired, and a good garrison put into it, the emperor marched in triumph to Toledo; where, after singing Te Deum, and receiving the benediction of the archbishop, he went to his palace, and sent for the empress and her court, extremely well satisfied with the success of this campaign <sup>f</sup> (R).

RAYMOND, prince of Arragon, and count of Barcelona, relying on his near relation to the emperor, endeavoured to engage him in a league against the king of Navarre, against whom the emperor wanted not some just causes of complaint; and, therefore, what the prince of Arragon desired was easily brought about, who made no question now that he should be able to reunite the kingdoms of Navarre and Arragon, giving some places that lay convenient to the emperor for his assistance <sup>g</sup>. But Don Garcia very judiciously set on foot a negotiation with the young king of Portugal, by which he was brought to discern how great his danger must be by any accession of power to the emperor, which engaged him to enter into a defensive alliance with Don Garcia. As soon, therefore, as the season would permit, the emperor and the prince of Arragon took the field; Don Garcia was sensible, that his forces were by no means sufficient to act against those of the two princes joined together; from whence he very wisely concluded, that it was his business to fight them separately, or rather to fight the weakest. Accordingly, having put a strong garrison into Pampeluna <sup>h</sup>, he left the rest of his dominions to the emperor's mercy, marching with the best body of troops he could assemble against the prince of Arragon. The emperor, meeting with no resistance at Navarre, advanced to Pampeluna, and besieged it; but the place was scarce invested, before he had the news of Don Garcia's having beat the prince of Arragon <sup>i</sup>; and this induced him to raise the siege to give battle to the victorious army. Don Garcia, however, with his usual prudence, quitted the field, and threw his troops into the adjacent fortresses; upon which the emperor saw himself obliged to retire into his own dominions, and to defer the prosecution of the war to the next season <sup>k</sup>. In the mean time Don Garcia took pains to recruit and strengthen his army in such a manner, that he quickly found it in his power to give the emperor battle; but upon that monarch's entering his dominions, the nobility and prelates on both sides interposed so effectually, that a peace was concluded <sup>l</sup>. The emperor's eldest son, Don Sancho, espoused the Infanta Donna Blanca, daughter to the king of Navarre; and, as this princess was very young, she was sent to be educated at the court of Castile <sup>m</sup>. The king of Portugal also, who had been extremely rudely handled in his invasion of Galicia, judged it expedient to make peace likewise; and by this means the ambitious scheme of the prince of Arragon was entirely defeated, and the peace of the Christians in Spain restored <sup>n</sup>.

THE war with the Moors continued all this time as hot as ever, and the alcaides, Aben-Azuel of Cordova, and Aben-Ceta of Seville, having united their forces, resolved to undertake an expedition of importance; the consequences of which might prove more favourable to their nation than those prædatory excursions that were commonly the business of their summers. Accordingly, having taken all the precautions that they thought necessary, and assembled the utmost force of their respective governments, they directed their march, with as much secrecy as possible, towards the fortress of Mora, between the rivers Guadiana and Tayo, and at no great distance from Toledo; a place of infinite importance, as it covered the Christian frontier on one side, and opened a passage into the Moorish territories on the other; where the Christian governor, Muna Alonso, through an inexcusable indolence, was so ill provided, that the place was easily surprised, and himself, with some difficulty, made his escape to Toledo <sup>o</sup>. The Moors instantly furnished it with all things necessary, and a numerous garrison; and having recommended the support of it to the alcaide of Calatrava, to whom it served as a barrier, returned home in triumph <sup>p</sup>. The emperor was very much

(R) The emperor, after the taking the fortress of Orja, returned, as we have said in the text, in triumph to Toledo; where, as soon as the rejoicings for his success were over, he applied himself during the winter to regulate the concerns of his civil government, to redress grievances, to determine disputes amongst his nobility, and to make the proper provisions for settling and securing his conquests. We mention this once for all in a note, that the reader may form some notion of this monarch's administration, who, at the three great feasts, but more especially in the winter, caused his prelates and nobility to resort to his court; where, by his authority always, and very often in his presence, they heard and decided differences of every kind; and, when this was over, took the emperor's instructions with regard to the particular trusts reposed in them, as to their respective governments (1).

(1) Chron. Adefons Imperat.

affected at this news, and therefore sent immediate orders to build a new fortress over-against that of Mora, and to place in it a good garrison, under the command of Don Martin Fernandez, to which new castle they gave the name of Piedra Negra, or the Black Stone<sup>a</sup>. As for Muna Alonso, he was so much ashamed of his late disgrace, that, putting himself at the head of such forces as his friends were content to furnish him with, he made repeated inroads, in order to recover his reputation; and the emperor, who was naturally of a mild disposition, did not send for him to reprimand him, as he expected, for so capital an omission, but willingly allowed him leisure to repair his fortune<sup>r</sup>.

Coria, after a short siege, is recovered from the Moors by the emperor. As the Moors had lately received great reinforcements, and seemed to threaten some expedition of importance, the emperor, being first well apprised of the strength of his frontiers, ordered Don Roderic Fernandez to make an excursion from Toledo, and with a good body of troops that were under his own command, and were intended for the war in Portugal, he suddenly invested Coria, which hitherto had defended itself against all attempts by the strength of its situation, and the care taken to keep the garrison always complete, and in good order. It was for this reason, perhaps, that they were less alarmed than otherwise they would have been at the news of this siege, which the emperor prosecuted with great judgment; for, having made a breach on one side of the place, and finding the enemy numerous, and bent upon an obstinate defence, he remained quiet till famine had brought the Moors so low, that they offered to capitulate, in case they were not relieved in thirty days; to which he consented<sup>s</sup>. But the governor of Toledo, being informed of the situation that things were in, made his irruption just at this juncture, which put it out of the power of the alcaides of Cordova and Seville to succour the place; which, at the close therefore of the thirty days, surrendered; upon which the emperor caused the breach to be immediately repaired, filled the magazines with provisions of all sorts, and, leaving a strong garrison, returned to Salamanca; and then sending for Muna Alonso, commended his services highly, and declared him lieutenant to Don Roderic Fernandez in the government of the city and kingdom of Toledo<sup>t</sup>, rewarding his good, and passing by the ill consequences that had attended his imprudent behaviour.

Irruption into the Moorish territories, by Don Muna Alonso, with great success. THIS promotion inspired Don Muna Alonso with so warm a desire of signalizing his gratitude, as well as his courage, that, on the first of March, in the ensuing year, he made an incursion, with nine hundred horse and a thousand foot, into the territory of Cordova, where his troops acquired a great booty<sup>u</sup>. But the alcaides, Aben-Azuel and Aben Ceta, intending an expedition of the same kind, had just joined their forces, when they had intelligence, of Don Muna Alonso's retreat, whom they followed with such diligence, that they quickly came up with him, and surrounded his troops, laden with booty, with forces far superior to those which he commanded. Don Muna divided his forces into two battalions, and, having recommended themselves to the protection of God, began the fight with great courage, which they prosecuted with such intrepidity, that the Moors were not only beaten, but both the alcaides slain, and their heads carried in triumph to Toledo: where, after they had for some time been placed on the palace, the empress caused them to be taken down, and sent to Cordova in a silver box, that they might be restored to their wives, in remembrance of the civility she had received from those alcaides in their life-time<sup>v</sup>.

He is intrusted with Martin Fernandez to block up the Moors in the castle of Mora. THE emperor having assembled a numerous army, and being on the point of making an irruption into the enemies country, sent orders to Muna Alonso and to Martin Fernandez to put themselves, with a strong corps of troops, into the fortrefs of Piedra Negra, with strict injunctions to cover his own territory from the incursions of the enemy, and to hinder them from making any additions to the castle of Mora. On the other hand, Texefin-ben-Ali, monarch of the Moors in Africa and Spain, had sent express orders for providing the fortrefs of Mora with every thing necessary, and for augmenting the works of that place; with the performance of which service, his viceroy charged Farax Adali, alcaide of Calatrava, who, after making all the preparations necessary for that purpose, marched towards Mora with a numerous body of troops. Muna Alonso, in pursuance of the emperor's instructions, issued with a small troop of horse from the fortrefs of Piedra Negra to scour the country, and by accident picked up a straggling Moor, who gave him intelligence of the alcaide's approach. Upon this, advancing to an eminence, he met the van of the Moorish troops, and charged them so briskly, that he drove them back in confusion upon their main body; of which when he had taken view, he returned to the fortrefs to consult with his colleague. On his report, Martin Fernandez proposed marching out and meeting them in the field; to which Muna Alonso readily consented. When they had proceeded as far as the walls of Agudor, they found the Moors drawn up in good order, whom they attacked with great spirit, and were received with <sup>a</sup> much firmness. The dispute was sharp, and by no means decisive, both parties finding it requisite to retire, in order to gain a little repose. But Muna Alonso, perceiving that his colleague was wounded, advised him to retire to Piedra Negra, with such as were in the same condition, or had lost their horses, to take the necessary measures for the security of the place; while he, with the remainder of their forces, should endeavour to give a check to the Moors, in case they attempted to attack it by surprise <sup>z</sup>.

FARAX ADALI, having received a reinforcement, marched speedily to find out the Christians; who, perceiving their great inequality in number, marched to an eminence, called Pegna de el Zeirbo, where they might have some advantage of ground. The Moors quickly invested them; and, after harassing them with distant attacks, at length charged them on all sides with such fury, that, being already weakened and fatigued, they were quickly broken and cut to pieces; which, however, had not happened so soon, if their gallant leader had not been slain at the beginning of the general attack. The alcaide, as soon as his body was found, caused his head, his left arm, and his right leg, to be cut off, and sent to the widow of Aben Azuel at Cordova, who was to transmit them to the widow of Aben-Ceta at Seville, by whom they were to be conducted to the king of Morroco; the rest of the dismembered body he restored to the Christians; who, with sorrowful solemnity, caused it to be buried at Toledo. The emperor received this unwelcome news at Talavera, to which city he was returned after a glorious campaign; which, however, did not console him for the loss of this gallant commander, which he resolved to revenge, and repair the ensuing year, and gave orders that all his forces should assemble for that purpose early in the spring <sup>z</sup>.

At the time Don Alonso deliberated on the proper object of this expedition, his subjects complained to him so loudly of the disturbance given them by the Moorish garrison in the fortress of Mora, that he determined with himself to pluck that thorn from their sides before he made an irruption into the enemies country; and, having accordingly invested the place, he proceeded to the siege in form; but the garrison, perceiving little or no hopes of relief, thought proper, by an early capitulation, to procure for themselves the best terms they could; by which means this place came again into the hands of the Christians <sup>z</sup>. It was, in all probability, some intelligence that the emperor received during the time he was in camp before Mora, which induced him to alter his plan, and to assemble all the forces of Castile and Leon towards the middle of the month of May, in the neighbourhood of Najara, with a full resolution to reduce the monarch of Navarre so low, that it should not be in his power to disturb him, and his brother the prince of Arragon, in haste. But when he was on the point of entering that king's dominions, Don Garcia sent some of his prelates and nobility to inform him of his great respect for his person, his sincere desire to live with him upon good terms for the future, and his inclination to marry Donna Urraca, the emperor's natural daughter <sup>z</sup>. This proposition disarmed the emperor, who, as he had nothing in view but to be quiet on that side, readily granted all he asked; and, having dismissed his troops, returned to Leon; to which city came the empress Donna Berengara, with most of the nobility of the two kingdoms of Castile and Leon: thither also came the princess Donna Sancha, the emperor's sister, bringing with her her beautiful niece Donna Urraca; and soon after arrived Don Garcia, attended by the flower of his nobility <sup>b</sup>. The marriage was celebrated with all imaginable pomp and magnificence, on the 24th of June; the emperor gave his daughter a large sum of money, made very rich presents to the king of Navarre and his nobility at their departure, and sent several persons of the first quality to accompany them to Pampeluna <sup>c</sup>. These rejoicings over, the emperor returned to Toledo; and, in the month of September, made an irruption with all his forces into the Moorish territories, ravaged the country as far as Granada and the sea coast, and returned with an immense booty, and a prodigious number of slaves, to his capital, in the beginning of winter <sup>d</sup>.

The affairs of the Moors at this time were in the utmost confusion; for Texefin-ben-Ali found himself so distressed in Africa, that instead of yielding his subjects in Spain any assistance, he was continually requiring such supplies from thence as exhausted them; insomuch that the Spanish Moors determined at length to throw off the yoke, and to render themselves once more independent. It was with this view that they demanded of the emperor Don Alonso, Zafadola his vassal, on account of his being descended from their antient kings of Cordova, to whom they joined Mohammed, who was sprung from the same blood, and put them in possession of a great part of the country <sup>e</sup>; while the viceroy, Aben Gama, could only preserve the castle of Cordova, the city of Seville, and two or three other places; and soon after one Haben Fandi, a pretended saint, seized Cordova and Calatrava; while Jaen, Granada, and Murcia, remained to Zafadola; Seville, and the rest of Andalusia, to Aben-Gama; Mortala, Valentia, a

 assistance from the emperor, who sent three of his generals with a considerable body of forces to his aid, with whom, after they had done him much service, he quarrelled, and attacked them with his Moorish troops, but was quickly beaten and taken prisoner; and the soldiers, not being able to agree whose prisoner he was, killed him to put an end to the dispute<sup>g</sup>. Aben Gama took this opportunity to recover Cordova, which he did, and obliged Haben-Fandi to fly to Andujar, and soon after delivered it up to the emperor Don Alonso, from whom he re-to besiege and render himself master of Calatrava, a place of great importance; and by which he acquired the command of the best part of La Mancha, which removed the Moors b so much farther from Toledo.

By the assistance of the French, Genoese, and Pisans, the emperor takes Almeria.

THE distractions of the Moors induced the emperor to hope for success in an expedition of still greater importance, which was the reduction of the city, fortress, and port of Almeria, at that time by much the strongest place the Moors had in Spain; from whence their priva-teers, which were exceedingly numerous, not only troubled the coasts inhabited by their Christian neighbours, but gave equal disturbance to the maritime provinces of France, Italy, and the adjacent islands. But for the reduction of this place a maritime force, superior to that of the enemy, was absolutely necessary, which induced him to negotiate supplies from his brother-in-law the prince of Arragon, the duke of Montpellier, the republic of Genoa and Pisa, who gave him the strongest assurances, that if he took the proper measures for investing the c place by land, their squadron should not fail to block up the port by the first of August<sup>h</sup>; and Don Alonso, relying on this engagement, was no sooner reinforced by the troops of Navarre, than he entered upon this great undertaking with all the forces of his dominions, and invaded Andalusia in the beginning of the month of May (S). He first of all reduced Banos and Gaz- lona, and then proceeded to invest Baeca, which made a vigorous defence, and did not surrender before the middle of June. He put into the place a strong garrison, commanded by Don Manrique de Lara, and, marching through the territories of the Moors, invested Almeria on the land side completely by the first of August, his confederates, with four fine squadrons lying before the bay. The city being strongly fortified, having a noble castle, a numerous garrison, and being excellently provided with every thing necessary, made a gallant and glorious d defence: but at length the emperor took it by storm, on the 17th of October<sup>i</sup>, putting all the inhabitants to the sword who were found in arms; after which the victor distributed the best part of the plunder amongst his allies, whom he sent away thoroughly satisfied; and the Genoese particularly, who acquired here that emerald vessel<sup>k</sup> which still remains in their treasury, and is esteemed invaluable; yet the emperor, who remained master of the place, and delivered his subjects from the continual apprehensions they were under from this nest of corsairs, was by much the greatest gainer, and very wisely looked upon this campaign as the most glorious, as well as the most advantageous, with which Providence had favoured his arms.

THE joy which this important acquisition gave to the Christians, however great, did not great a loss, but more especially Aben-Gama, who felt so sensible a regret on this account, that from the apprehension of the consequences that might, or rather must attend it, and despairing of any other method to ballance it, he projected, contrary to his faith and duty,

(S) It is supposed by some, that the place, since called Almeria, rose upon the ruins of the antient town of Abdera; though others conceive, that Abdera lay somewhat farther to the east (1). It lies within a fine bay, at the mouth of a pleasant river, close by the sea shore, and was in those days all that it is said to be in the text; and, upon its reduction under the power of the Christians, became a bishoprick; whereas at present it is very little better than a village, but indif-ferently inhabited, and has nothing to testify so much as the probability of its former greatness, except it be certain circumstances that cannot be lost or effaced even by the indolence of the Spaniards. What these are, an ingenious countryman of our own thus elegantly describes (2): "Its climate," says he, "is so peculiarly " blessed, that one really wants words to express its " charms and excellence. Its fields and meads are " covered with flowers all the year round; they are

 " adorned also with palms, myrtles, plane trees, oranges,
 " and olives; and the mountains and promontories near
 " it are as noted for their producing a great variety of " precious stones, insomuch that the next promontory
 " to it is called the Cape of Gates, which is a corrup" tion from the word agates, the hills thereabouts a" bounding in that sort of precious stones, as well as " in emeralds and amethysts, granates, or coarse rubies,
 " and extreme curious alabaster in the mountain of " Filaures. And what is also very singular, there is a " considerable river that runs directly under the town,
 " and then immediately discharges itself into the sea."
 Such is the site of Almeria, which was once so strong and magnificent a place.

- a of the emperor <sup>1</sup>. In order to effect this, he threw himself into the strong city of Jaen, and sent Don Alonso a message with great secrecy, that if he would advance towards him with a small body of chosen troops, with as much privacy as possible, he would open the gates, and admit him into the city, as he done into Cordova <sup>m</sup>. The emperor was very near falling into the snare; but some of his nobility, to whom he communicated this proposition, dissuaded him earnestly; so that he sent Don Manrique de Lara, with part of his garrison, to demand of the Moorish chief the performance of his promise; and he had no sooner admitted that nobleman into Jaen, than he attempted to secure him, and those who attended him: but the populace, either not understanding his scheme, or fearing the resentment of the emperor, raised a tumult, in which Aben-Gama was stabbed <sup>n</sup>, and Don Manrique, and those
- b who were to have been the victims of his treachery, were either permitted to withdraw by the inhabitants, or found means, in the midst of this confusion, to open a passage for their escape <sup>o</sup>; by which disappointment, and the death of the Moorish governor, the disturbances amongst the infidels were very much increased, as in some places there was scarce any form of government left (T).

- THE year following began with mourning; for on the third of February died the empress Donna Berengara, extremely regretted by Don Alonso and all his subjects; and her body was interred with all the pomp and ceremony due to her high rank in the apostolic church of St. James at Compostella <sup>p</sup>. In the beginning of March the emperor held the great assembly of estates at Leon, where he declared his sons Don Sancho and Don Ferdinand kings <sup>q</sup>, the former of Castile, the mountains of Burgos, Biscay, and Toledo; the latter of Leon, Asturias, and Galicia, according to their antient limits; which remarkable event some historians place earlier, and some later; but public inscriptions, and their signatures to privileges and charters by this new title, are the circumstances which have determined us to this date <sup>r</sup>. The new dynasty of Almohedes, which, after overturning that of the Almoharides in Africa, had likewise gained most of the places they possessed in Spain, and particularly Cordova, treated the few remaining Christians in Andalusia, according to their bigotted maxims, with unrelenting severity; so that, in a very short space of time, all who worshipped God according to the lights of the Gospel, were either transported to Africa, or utterly extirpated; which cruelty, joined with the sending over several bodies of Moors, and the known ambition of the new conqueror of Morocco, obliged the emperor not to wait till the Mohammedans were in a condition to attack him, but to prosecute those expeditions, by which he had hitherto so successfully weakened these implacable enemies <sup>s</sup>.

- As soon, therefore, as the assembly of the estates was over, he gave instructions to his principal nobility to make their levies in the winter, and to bring their respective quotas into the neighbourhood of Toledo early in the ensuing spring. Count Manrique, who commanded the forces of that kingdom, in obedience to the emperor's command, took the field in the beginning of the month of March, and was very speedily joined by the king Don Garcia, at the head of a chosen body of his forces; the count Ferdinand Perez de Trava appeared at the head of the Galicians; those of Asturias and Leon were led by Don Ramiro Frolaz; Don Guitterez Fernandez was at the head of the Castilians; and Don Ponce brought the whole strength of the country of Estremadura <sup>t</sup>. The emperor put himself at the head of the army as soon as it was assembled, entered the enemy's territories, and proposed to besiege Cordova; but received intelligence in his march, that the enemy had formed the like design

(T) We are assured by some eminent historians, amongst whom we may reckon Mariana, that the emperor had received a former specimen of the temper and fidelity of Aben-Gama, who, at the time that he surrendered Cordova into the hands of that prince, suffered him, at the instance of Don Raymond archbishop of Toledo, to re-consecrate the cathedral, esteemed the largest and finest in the whole kingdom; and this only with a view that he might not leave a garrison behind him, which might have put him under great difficulties. But when the emperor had once lost this opportunity, Aben-Gama took care he should not recover it, by repairing the fortifications, and placing there the best part of his forces (1). He had, therefore, good reason to doubt his sincerity at Jaen; but as that also was of much importance, the emperor was exceedingly desirous of making the most of these confusions while they lasted: he was very near being made the victim of his own ambition. It is very uncertain how Don Manuel de Lara, and those who were with him, escaped, which, the nature of this adventure considered, we cannot think strange. Amongst the singular events, however, attending this enterprize, we may discern, in the death of Aben-Gama, that sooner or later fraud becomes fatal to itself; and that he, who is intent upon over-reaching his neighbour, finds himself, when he least expects it, the miserable contriver of his own destruction (2).

against Toledo, and, upon news of his invasion, were in full march to attack him. Don Alonso immediately made the proper dispositions to receive them; and it was not long before the Moorish army appeared, and charged the Christians with great fury. Their impetuosity at first occasioned some disorder; but as the troops of Don Alonso and Don Garcia were men accustomed to service, they quickly repaired this disaster; and perceiving that the enemy began to relent, attacked them in their turn on all sides with such firmness and intrepidity, that the Moors were quickly broke, and those in the rear began a precipitate retreat towards Cordova <sup>a</sup>. The emperor and the king of Navarre pursued them so vigorously, that the whole army was obliged to have recourse to the same measure, and, not without very great loss, retired into that city, which the Christians quickly invested. But the emperor, perceiving that the siege would be long and bloody, and that when it was over his forces would not be in a condition to undertake any thing of importance, and perhaps find it no easy matter to preserve the place, he very prudently raised the siege <sup>b</sup>. He then marched to Jaen, which was in no condition to resist so great a force, plundered it <sup>c</sup>, and would have proceeded to Seville, if the French, who had promised to send him a fleet to assist him in the reduction of that city, had not obliged him to put an end to a campaign already sufficiently glorious. At his return to Toledo, he found the archbishop Don Raymond dead, who was succeeded by Don John; and on the 21st of November, the same year, Don Garcia king of Navarre ended his life at Pampluna, soon after his return thither, to the great regret of his father-in-law <sup>d</sup>.

The infant Don Sancho of Arragon married to Donna Blanca.

A. D. 1151.

In the beginning of the ensuing year the emperor caused great preparations to be made for solemnizing the marriage, long before concluded, of his son the infant Don Sancho with the infanta Donna Blanca, daughter to the deceased, and sister to the reigning, king of Navarre; which was accordingly performed at Najara, on the 24th of February <sup>e</sup>, with very great magnificence. At the same time this marriage was celebrated, Donna Urraca, queen dowager of Navarre, returned to her father's court, and received from him the principality of the Asturias, the government of which she was to hold by way of appennage from the crown, for her subsistence, in a manner suitable to her birth; from whence we find her commonly stiled by the antient Spanish writers, Donna Urraca the Asturian <sup>f</sup>. There was the same year an interview between the emperor and the prince of Arragon; but those who infer from thence that a league was then made between these princes, for the destruction, or at least the conquest, of the kingdom of Navarre, seem to be mistaken; since, on the one hand, it is highly improbable that the emperor should meditate the ruin of a prince so nearly allied to him; and, on the other, it is not consistent with facts, since we find nothing of the execution of this league, either within the compass of this or the next year. It is indeed true, that the emperor left the Mohammedans undisturbed for about eighteen months, and then made an irruption into Andalusia, where the infant Don Alonso gained great reputation, by defeating a body of Moors <sup>b</sup>, who attempted to disturb the emperor in his siege of Jaen; which, however, he found so strongly fortified, and so well defended, that he was obliged to raise it; and, leaving the army, returned to Toledo, while his troops continued to harass the Moors, though without any remarkable success, even in the depth of winter, which disabled them from making incursions in the spring, according to custom. <sup>d</sup>

Other marriages of the emperor, and in the imperial family.

A. D. 1153.

THE emperor having judged it expedient to marry a second wife, and the king Don Sancho of Navarre, having signified his desire of espousing the infanta Donna Sancha, the emperor's daughter, the town of Soria was made choice of as the most convenient for the celebration of both their nuptials. The princess, of whom the emperor had made choice, was named Rica, the daughter of Ladislaus the second, king of Poland, and the princess Inez of Austria, who, being conducted thither, the emperor espoused her on the fourth of June, in the presence of the kings of Arragon and Navarre: the king Don Sancho, when he married the infanta, was, according to the custom of those times, made a knight by his father-in-law, and reconciled to Don Raymond of Arragon, at least for the present <sup>c</sup>. Some time after Louis the seventh, king of France, concluded a marriage with Donna Constance, the emperor's daughter, having been a little before divorced from his first queen Elconora duchess of Aquitaine <sup>d</sup>. These marriages seem to have occupied the attention of the court, and to have prevented the war from being carried on against the Moors with the same vigour as in the former years. However it was still kept on foot, and served to hinder those infidels from undertaking any thing of consequence against the Christians, in conjunction with their intestine disputes, which at this time were as high and fierce as ever; and perhaps the not attacking them might increase them. <sup>e</sup>

- a BUT, as soon as the situation of his affairs would give him leave, the emperor, with a numerous army, passing through that part of La Mancha which belonged to the Moors, and traversing the Sierra Morena, after taking several places of small force, set down before Alcázar, which was so well fortified, that it had escaped hitherto, though besieged by numerous armies. Yet this monarch took his measures so well, and his reputation was so great, that, after a gallant defence, the besieged judged it expedient to provide for their own safety, by a timely capitulation, which was granted them <sup>c</sup>. We have good reason to believe, that the emperor had set his heart very much upon this conquest, since, while he lay before the place, he had the news, that his son-in-law king Louis, and his daughter Constanza, were arrived in Spain, with a design of visiting the tomb of the apostle St. James at Compostella. He sent
- b to compliment them, and to desire, that, after they had performed their devotions, they would repair to Toledo, where he promised to meet them; which he did after the conclusion of the campaign, and entertained them with great magnificence, and caused them to be accompanied, at their return, by the two kings his sons, and by Don Sancho king of Navarre <sup>e</sup>. On the 11th of November, the same year, the king Don Sancho of Castile had a son born to him, who was named Alonso, and, in process of time, became one of the greatest princes that ever reigned in Spain; but the queen Donna Blanca, his mother, died a few months after <sup>g</sup>. This, as it created great grief in the imperial family, so it seems to have been fatal to her own; for the emperor having consented to a match between Don Alonso, son to Don Raymond of Aragon, and his daughter Donna Sancha, who was hardly out of her
- c cradle, was prevailed upon, in consequence of this alliance, to invade the kingdom of Navarre <sup>h</sup>.

A. D. 1056.

- WE know little of the progress of that war, at least with regard to the emperor, who seems to have been diverted from it by the news of a powerful invasion meditated by the Moors. He resolved to prevent this, by marching with all his forces into Andalusia, accompanied by his son Don Sancho king of Castile, and by the principal lords and prelates of his court, amongst whom was the archbishop of Toledo. He advanced directly towards the enemy, whom he attacked with the utmost vigour, and, after an obstinate and bloody resistance, totally defeated them with great slaughter <sup>i</sup>. But before he had time to prosecute this glorious victory, he found himself attacked by a disease, which made him sensible that his
- d end was quickly approaching. He quitted, therefore, the command of the army to his son Don Sancho, and set out on his return towards Toledo. His distemper, however, continually increasing, he stopped at a little place called Fresneda, where, on the 21st day of August in the year 1157, he resigned his soul to his creator, being assisted in his last moments by the archbishop of Toledo <sup>k</sup>. He was indisputably one of the greatest monarchs Spain ever had to boast of. He extended his dominions from the mountains of Biscay to those of the Sierra Morena, had the singular honour of receiving the homage of the kings of Navarre and Aragon, and of acquiring, in consequence of that, the glorious title of emperor <sup>l</sup>, which has indeed been ascribed to some of his predecessors, but without due proof. He loved, and was beloved by, his nobility; but at the same time he justly acquired, by his paternal
- e care and strict maintenance of the laws, the title of the father of the commons, whom he protected from all oppression, and rendered far more happy and easy in their circumstances, than they had formerly been. He was a consummate and successful general, and withal the ablest politician of his time; and did more towards the recovery of Spain out of the hands of the infidels than any of the princes who had reigned before him, his grandfather of the same name only excepted. He was highly respected by his neighbours, and even by the Moorish princes, amongst whom Mohammed Abenzel king of Murcia became his vassal but a few years before his death <sup>m</sup>. His son, Don Sancho, no sooner understood that he had breathed his last, than he quitted the army to attend his corpse to Toledo, where it was interred in the royal chapel of the cathedral, with a pomp suitable to the melancholy occasion <sup>n</sup>.
- f In one respect this great prince may be esteemed more happy than his ancestors, that all his great actions were both fairly and fully recorded, in a Latin chronicle that bears his name, and was written in or near his time, which is that we have cited after Ferreras, and has supplied us with many particulars, and rectified many dates, that must otherwise have remained perplexed or doubtful.

Several advantages gained by the Moors upon his demise.

As soon as the funeral of the emperor was over, Don Sancho repaired to Burgos, where he <sup>a</sup> was unanimously acknowledged and received as king of Castile, his brother Don Ferdinand being, with equal unanimity, admitted to the sovereignty of the kingdoms of Leon, Asturias, and Galicia <sup>o</sup>. But, like young princes, they were more attentive to the ceremony and pomp of their inaugurations, than to the high and arduous functions of kings. In consequence of this, though the death of Don Alonso did not affect the civil government, yet it had a very great influence on their military affairs. The Moors were no sooner acquainted with it, than they flattered themselves the fortune of Spain was departed; the terror impressed by his name wore away, and, assembling in crouds, they offered themselves to their commanders; who, making a proper use of this alacrity, fell upon Pedraches, Andujar, Baeza, <sup>b</sup> and all the places they had lately lost, which they recovered with great facility, and drove the Christians, in one autumn campaign, out of all that the emperor had acquired in Andalusia; upon which happy success, they addressed themselves to Abdulmenon king of Morocco, beseeching him not to let slip this favourable opportunity of retrieving the honour and the dominions of the Moors. He received this application so favourably, and promised such speedy and prodigious succours, that the Knights Templars, who held the town of Calatrava as a fief from the crown, resigned it, as a place they should not be able to defend; upon which Don Sancho published an edict, in which he offered to give that place to any of his nobility who would undertake to maintain and support it; the consequences of which will be hereafter seen at large <sup>p</sup>.

Generous and prudent behaviour of Don Sancho king Castile to his brother.

Don Ferdinand was hardly seated on the throne of Leon, before he found, like most young <sup>c</sup> kings, his person besieged by flatterers, to whom he was but too accessible; so that the first acts of his government were such as had an evident tendency to overturn it; for, in consequence of the bad advices given him, he discarded Don Ponce de Minerva, and most of the old officers and statesmen that had been the friends and favourites of his father; who, finding themselves removed from all their employments, retired to the court of Burgos, and were received with extraordinary respect and kindness by the king of Castile <sup>q</sup>. Don Sancho was no sooner acquainted with the motives which had induced them to take shelter under his protection, than he marched, with a considerable army, into his brother's dominions; of which Don Ferdinand no sooner received intelligence, than he set out to meet his brother with a small retinue; for they had hitherto lived together with so much friendship and affection, <sup>d</sup> that he could not apprehend any danger in the presence of one to whom he had been always dear. He met him at the abby of Sabagon, just as he was going to dinner; and the brothers, as soon as they had embraced, sat down to table <sup>r</sup>. After they had done, Don Sancho told him, "that he was glad to see him in that condition; for that, finding his " principal nobility retired out of his dominions, he apprehended he stood in need of his " assistance. He added, that their father was a wise man, as well as a great prince; that the " former enabled him to make choice of such officers and counsellors as raised him into the " latter condition; and that he had given him little in giving a kingdom, if he had not " likewise left him these; that he must therefore take them home with him, listen to their " advice, discard his flatterers, and rely upon it, that, if his own forces were not sufficient, <sup>e</sup> " himself and his Castilians were ready to assist him upon any proper occasion." Don Ferdinand taking all this in good part, Don Sancho left him his old servants, and returned into Castile with his army <sup>s</sup>. The king of Navarre conceived this a fit time to recover the province of Rioja, which he looked upon as with-held from him by force, and which therefore he had a right to reduce, whenever it was in his power; but Don Sancho had intelligence of his design before he marched against his brother, and therefore appointed the count Don Ponce to command the troops intended for the defence of that province; in which command he behaved in such a manner, that the king of Navarre thought proper to retire into his own dominions, without coming to action.

He composes all differences with the king of Arragon, and concludes with him a treaty.

UPON his return into his own territories, the first thing the king of Castile did, was to put <sup>f</sup> the monarchs of Arragon and Navarre in mind, that the former was his uncle, the latter his brother-in-law; that, besides this, he had never offended either; and that it would not commend them in the sight of God or of man, to take advantage of that invasion with which the Moors threatened his dominions; but that, if they conceived any injustice on his side, he was ready to meet them either together or apart, and to give them any reasonable satisfaction. Both monarchs accepted this proposal; in consequence of which he had an interview with the king of Navarre at Almazan, where a peace and defensive alliance was con-

- a cluded between them †. He went thence to Osma, where he met his uncle Don Raymond, who expostulated freely with him on the acquisitions made by his father at the expence of the crown of Arragon; alleging, that the emperor ought to have been content with his homage, which he rendered him freely, and not have curtailed his dominions. Don Sancho told him, that what he liked he would keep, and what he disliked he would restore; and accordingly consented by a treaty, that all the country on the right of the river Ebro should belong to the king of Arragon as in times past, upon condition that he did homage to the king of Castile, and assisted him with his sword drawn at his coronation; which conditions were readily accepted, and Don Raymond promised him a choice body of his troops †. About this time St. Raymond abbot of Vitero undertook the defence of Calatrava, without any other
- b force than that of another monk, whose name was Diego Velasquez, who, as well as himself, had borne arms many years before they wore frocks; and without any other fund than that of their zeal and piety. The king granted the fortrefs without scruple; and, in the space of a few weeks, they, by their sermons, raised 20,000 men, and the means of subsisting them; upon which St. Raymond gave the rule of the Cistercian order a military turn, from whence arose that order of religious chivalry, which has been since distinguished by the name of Calatrava † (U).

- ABEN-JACOB, the son of Abdulmenon king of Morocco, having brought over a great number of Moors from Africa, began to make vast preparations for attacking the kingdom of Toledo; upon which the inhabitants of Avila and the Estramadurians, with the consent of
- c Don Sancho, assembled a great body of troops, with which they fell into the district about Seville. Aben-Jacob, as soon as he received intelligence of this, joined his forces with those of Dalegen and Aben-Gamar, and marched immediately to attack the Christians. The action was obstinate and bloody; but at length victory declared on the side of the Christians, and the Moors were not only beaten with great slaughter, but lost also their two generals Dalegen and Aben-Gamar; so that the victory was equally glorious and complete †. But the joy they received from thence was of short continuance, since, on the last day of August 1158, Don Sancho king of Castile breathed his last at Toledo, when he had worn the crown but one year and ten days †. His body was interred near that of the emperor his father; his loss was sincerely deplored by all his subjects, and by his allies; his actions, even in so short a
- d space, having raised such hopes as could not have been easily satisfied; so that, how immature soever his death might appear to his people, it came at a juncture favourable to his glory (X).

(U) In respect to points that depend upon records, there is a degree of certainty superior to most others; and therefore we find almost all the historians agree in placing the institution of this order anno 1158. This whole transaction is very fully and very elegantly related by Mariana, who observes, that the Knights Templars dishonoured themselves extremely by so base a proceeding; which, however, so far discouraged the nobility, that notwithstanding the offers made, and the temptation of so rich and noble a seignory, there was not one of them who had he courage to accept the king's offer, and undertake the defence of the place; which reduced that monarch to the necessity of promising it to any who would engage to keep it. Don Diego Velasquez, an old experienced officer, who had taken the Cistercian order, framed in his own mind a scheme for compounding the two professions he had himself sustained; and being strongly persuaded the thing might be accomplished, importuned Don Raymond abbot of Vitero to challenge the king's promise, which at length he did. Diego Velasquez procured from John archbishop of Toledo, in whose diocese Calatrava lay, a large sum of money; which enabled him to repair the fortifications. He then preached to the young nobility, that instead of retiring into convents, to pass an idle and inactive life, it would be far more glorious in the sight of God and man to dedicate themselves to the service and defence of their faith and country, in a manner suitable to their birth and breeding; and having, by this means, drawn eight or nine thousand men together, he insinuated to the common people the great strength and happy situation of Calatrava, now so well fortified, and provided with such a garrison, as afforded them a prospect of greater security than in most other places; adding, that the delightful villages along the Guadiana, under its jurisdiction, might be easily repaired, and be held from the knights upon very moderate terms; by which he brought together ten or twelve thousand citizens and peasants; and in the course of a few years so fully executed his plan, that the order had an ample revenue, and the people from whom it arose thought themselves happy. In this conjuncture, therefore, a better expedient could not have been desired; and pope Alexander the third, by his bull in 1164, declared as much: but, as Mariana well observes, by degrees this noble institution has degenerated; the commanderies, which were formerly the reward of military merit, being frequently bestowed upon minions and favourites. Modern writers assure us, that the order has at present thirty-four commanderies and eight priories, which produce an annual revenue of 120,000 ducats. The knights wear on their upper garment a red cross, to distinguish them from other orders: and as that of St. James is distinguished by the epithet of the rich, and that of Alcantara is stiled the noble, so this of Calatrava is intitled the gallant, which, how it accords with its original institution, is not easy to discern.

(X) This young monarch was surnamed el Desfado, or the Desired, and is justly allowed to have the most unspotted character in the whole Spanish history. It is given us in few words by the archbishop of Toledo and the bishop of Tuy; the latter tells us, that in religion

THE crown of Castile devolved on his son Don Alonso, then but three years of age, whom <sup>a</sup> his father left to the care of Don Gutierrez de Castro, whom he declared sole regent <sup>2</sup>, and forbid the removing any of his father's governors or officers before his son was at full age, unless from some indispensable cause. This appointment excited the envy of many of the most puissant nobility, but more especially of the house of Lara, of which Don Manrique was the chief, and who perhaps had not forgot the misfortunes of Don Pedro, at the beginning of the emperor's reign <sup>3</sup>. Don Gutierrez, however, deserved all the confidence his master had reposed in him: he was a nobleman far advanced in years, but not infirm; of great prudence, and of untainted probity. He committed the education of the king to Don Garcia de Aza, the son of Don Garcia de Cabra, who was killed at the battle of Ucles with the infant Don Sancho, and this notwithstanding he was brother by the mother's side to Don Manrique de Lara, who from the beginning had declared himself his enemy, and who quickly corrupted Don Garcia, and engaged him to put the person of the young king into his hands, contrary to his honour, and in breach of that trust which had been reposed in him <sup>b</sup>. Don Gutierrez laboured all that was in his power to have this matter compromised, and the person of the young king restored; but finding this impracticable, he was about to have recourse to arms, when Providence withdrew him from all these troubles to eternal rest <sup>c</sup>, though his competitor would not allow his corpse peace in the grave.

His uncle the king of Leon claims the regency, but at length compromises the dispute.

Don Manrique de Lara, and the lords of his family and faction, thought themselves now in a good measure secure, from having the sole government of the kingdom, during a long minority, disputed with them; and in order to make this absolutely sure, they took the only <sup>e</sup> step that could render it precarious, which was breaking through the king's will, and depriving Don Ferdinand, and all his brothers, of their respective employments <sup>d</sup>, merely because they were of the family of Castro, and the nephew of the deceased regent, who thereupon applied himself to Don Ferdinand king of Leon, who, at their request, declared himself tutor and regent of his nephew, and with a numerous army entered the kingdom of Toledo, where the people very readily submitted, and even the inhabitants of the capital, upon the first summons, opened their gates <sup>e</sup>. The king, encouraged by this success, entered Castile; and Don Manrique, and the lords of Lara, perceiving an unwillingness in the people to fight against the uncle of their sovereign, retired to the fortress of Soria, carrying the young prince with them. At length finding themselves menaced with a siege, they entered into a negotiation with the king, and offered to deliver up the person of their young king to his uncle upon certain terms; but this was pure amusement; since, as soon as king Ferdinand listened to their request, they sent the king out privately, and carried him from place to place with so much secrecy, that Don Ferdinand was at last obliged to come to their terms, which was to keep the best part of the kingdom, as well as the king, in their possession, and to leave the rest to be administered by him. A compromise that was by no means acceptable, either to the populace or to the nobility <sup>f</sup>.

A. D. 1159.

This treaty broken, and Castile invaded by the kings of Leon and Navarre.

THOUGH this agreement was more in favour of the faction than they could either desire or expect, yet they were so far from being contented with it, that Don Ferdinand was no sooner retired into his own dominions than they attempted to dispossess him by force of those <sup>e</sup> places which they had put into his hands. But though the king of Leon was in all respects a good-natured prince, yet he resented this behaviour so much, that in the month of March following he advanced with an army against them, gave them battle, and defeated them, which threw their affairs into great confusion <sup>g</sup>; and towards the close of the year the Moors entered Castile, and gained some advantages. On the other hand, Don Sancho king of Navarre, judging no time so proper to revive his pretensions to the country of Rioja, entered it with a powerful army, and reduced the best part of it, before Don Manrique and his associates were in any condition to provide for its defence <sup>h</sup>. But as soon as they were able to draw a competent number of troops together, and found that he was engaged in a war with the Mohammedans, they entered that country in their turn, and recovered it again in as <sup>f</sup> little time as it was lost. Other expeditions of the like kind happened in succeeding years he was sincere, and gallant in the field, distinguished by the sweetness of his temper, and adorned with every royal virtue. He adds, that he was alike dear to the populace and to the nobility, because he made it the whole study of his life to please God and good men. Mariana assures us that he died of grief for the loss of his wife, queen Blanch, and at the very time when he should have marched against the infidels, having assembled, for that purpose, a numerous army, better provided, in all respects, than any body of troops had been by most of his predecessors.

a with various fortune ; but upon the whole Don Sancho of Navarre kept almost all the places that he claimed <sup>1</sup>.

It might be naturally apprehended, that the Moors would not fail to lay hold of so favourable an opportunity to repair the losses they had sustained, and to recover at least some of the important places that had been taken from them by the Christians ; more especially, as they were sure of constant and considerable supplies from their countrymen in Africa, and saw the power of the Christians as much divided, depressed, and distracted, as they could wish ; and yet it does not appear, that they made any great advantage of so favourable a juncture. The Spanish historians have not given us a very clear account of this matter <sup>k</sup> ; but as far as we can judge from a comparison of facts, it may be ascribed, at least in a great measure, to three different causes. The first was, that though the Christian princes were not well agreed amongst themselves, yet they did not employ their arms against each other ; so that the forces destined for the protection of the frontiers of the kingdoms of Castile and Toledo were not withdrawn : and though they seldom acted offensively, yet being commanded by able officers, it is likely they would have defended themselves with spirit, if attacked. A second cause, was the new militia established on purpose to act continually, either offensively or defensively, against the infidels, by which we mean the new orders of chivalry ; for, besides those already mentioned, there started up at this time another, which proved of double advantage to the Christians. There was, in the kingdoms of Leon and Castile, a considerable number of wild debauched young gentlemen, who, by indulging their passions, had rendered themselves so obnoxious to the law, that they had no security but what they derived from their swords. These people had lived long in the mountains, and had been gradually brought under the command of Don Pedro Fernandes, who being both older and wiser than when he took up this dangerous trade, bethought himself of an expedient to set things right again, and to reconcile himself and his dependents to the civil government. The method he took was this ; he bound all who submitted to his authority by oath never to injure any Christian, but to devote themselves to the protection of their country against the Moors ; and having converted the rule of St. Augustine into a military institution, he made it that of his new order, which, with the licence and under the protection of the king Don Ferdinand, assumed the apostle St. James for their patron, and had lands given them by the crown <sup>l</sup> for their support (Y). Another cause was the civil wars amongst themselves, in which some of the Christian princes wisely took part ; and by constantly assisting the weaker side, without enquiring into the merits of the dispute, kept their quarrels on foot, and contributed not a little to weaken

(Y) It is true, that some writers carry the institution of this order much higher, viz. to A. D. 827 ; and it is also true that many who have rejected this date as fabulous, are nevertheless persuaded that there is evidence sufficient to prove this order of chivalry actually subsisted A. D. 1030, and must have been instituted some time, though they cannot say how long, before it. But, notwithstanding these authorities, we agree with Ferreras, and in good measure also with Mariana, that the true and genuine origin of this order of knighthood ought to be placed where it is in the text ; and that Don Pedro Fernandes, called also, from the place of his birth, Don Pedro de Fuente-Enclalada, which is a town in the diocese of Astorga, was its founder and first grand-master. In order to give the reader some satisfaction upon this head, it will be requisite to represent to him, though very succinctly, the true state of the case. When the tomb of St. James at Compostella first became famous, and from the spirit of devotion that reigned in those those times drew gradually a vast resort of pilgrims thither, it was found requisite to erect a kind of hospitals or public places of reception for these pilgrims at every proper stage, from the borders of France to the city of Compostella. This was Forno, taken by the canons of St. Eloy, who likewise took care of these hospitals, and of such as lodged in them, by which they acquired the good will of the neighbouring nobility, who furnished them liberally with money for so pious and prudent a work. But amongst all these hospitals, that in the suburb of the city of Leon, dedicated to St. Mark, was by far the largest and best endowed. In these troublesome times, however, the pilgrims, in spite of all the charitable pains taken for their relief and support, were liable to great inconveniences from the excursions of the Moors, and from the robberies that were frequently committed on the road ; and this it was that induced Don Pedro Fernandes de Fuente-Enclalada, when he had formed his companions into some degree of order, to make a tender of his services to the canons of St. Eloy, to cover and protect these pilgrims in their passage : as this again induced the pope upon granting his bull of confirmation to assign the hospital of St. Mark, in the suburbs of Leon, for the capital residence of the grand master and his knights ; and it is from confounding those knights with the old canons that those difficulties have arisen as to the original of this institution. The ensign of this order is a cross, terminating like the blade of a sword, the hilt crostled and fashioned after the ancient manner ; whereupon it was called La Orden de SanTiago de la Espada, as also Ordo militaris Sancti Jacobi ensigeri à qualitate insignium. And the reason why this ensign is always painted red rather than any other colour, is thus given by Don Rodrigo Ximenes archbishop of Toledo. Rubet ensis sanguine Arabum. But these knights assumed not only the sword in form of a cross, but also the symbol of St. James, which, though it cannot be directly determined what it is, yet it seems to be the escallop shell : for that the escallop is generally among the Spaniards taken for the badge of St. James, and worn by pilgrims in their voyages to his sepulchre at Compostella. At present there are eighty-seven commanderies of the order of St. James in the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, which yield an annual revenue of two hundred and seventy thousand ducats, and about threescore commanderies in the kingdom of Portugal, which are also of great value.

both. To all which we may add, that Don Alonso king of Portugal employed his arms against them all this time, and not without success, the king of Arragon also making occasionally some prædatory incursions.

Urraca of

A. D. 1163.

Don Ferdinand king of Leon, finding himself exceedingly disturbed by the intrigues of the family of Lara, and that he was in continual danger of losing the places he held in the name of his nephew, caused a negotiation to be set on foot with Don Manrique, in which he shewed so strong an inclination to compromise their differences, that this nobleman at length invited him to Soria, where he had a conference with his nephew, and adjusted every thing with Don Manrique<sup>m</sup>. He took advantage of this calm, in order to repair and settle several great towns in the heart of his dominions, as well as on the frontiers, which were either fallen through time to decay, or else were but indifferently built and peopled at first; and to this he attended with so much care and vigilance, that they were very soon in as good a condition as he could wish. He granted also new privileges to the people, and neglected no means that could be devised to make his dominions flourish, and his people happy. Amongst other methods that were thought necessary for this purpose, one that was held of the greatest consequence by his father's old ministers, was his speedy marriage; that by allying himself with some powerful prince, he might the better secure assistance in case of foreign invasion, and defend his people from the miseries that might be apprehended from an unsettled succession. Don Ferdinand, moved by these suggestions, cast his eyes upon the princess Donna Urraca, daughter to Don Alonso king of Portugal, and accordingly demanded her in marriage. Don Alonso very readily consented to the match, and soon after sent the princess to Leon with a splendid retinue, where she was espoused by the king Don Ferdinand with great solemnity, and to the universal joy of the people of both nations, who concluded that this must of necessity keep the two kingdoms in friendship and peace<sup>n</sup>.

As soon the ceremonies of the marriage were over, the king Don Ferdinand resumed the cares of government with his usual application; and casting his eyes upon Merobriga and Bletisa, places large and considerable in antient times, though they were then little better than heaps of ruins, he gave orders that they should be rebuilt and fortified. It is evident enough, that he meant this to strengthen his territories on that side against Portugal, and took a very convenient time to do it. But the people of Salamanca, who considered these places as lying within their jurisdiction, and not at all desirous of seeing them in a better state than they were, assembled several thousand men, with an intention to prevent, by force, the execution of the king's project. The king Don Ferdinand had acquired more experience, and was upon better terms with his nobility, than in the first part of his reign, and would not therefore submit to the dictates of the populace; but drawing out the forces of Leon, Tamora, and Astorga, marched against the rebels, defeated them in a bloody engagement, and then proceeding to Salamanca, chastised those who had been the authors of these troubles; after which things remained very quiet<sup>o</sup>. As soon as these places were restored and in some measure peopled, the king laid the plan of taking several others from the Moors; but first of all thought proper to conclude an alliance with the king of Navarre, that in case his nephew, whom he discerned to be of a very brisk and active temper, should give him any disturbance, he might not be without an ally capable of making a diversion in his favour; and this precaution being taken, he added Alcantara, Albuquerque, and Elvas, to his dominions, without meeting with any great resistance from the enemy, or disturbance from his neighbours<sup>p</sup>. But let us now return to the affairs of Castile (Z).

Don Manrique de Lara paid so little regard to the soft councils given him by the king of Leon, that instead of endeavouring to compose amicably those disputes that had been so fatal to the interest of the young king his pupil, he bent all his endeavours to inflame the mind of the young prince against the family of Castro, and at length raised an army, with which he

(Z) The town of Bletisa, which, after it was rebuilt, as the reader has seen in the text, received the name of Ledesma, stood upon the river of Tormes, and was so happy in point of situation, that, ever since the time of which we are now writing, it has been looked upon as a place of great consequence, and its fortifications kept in good repair. Merobriga lies south from thence, and within four leagues of the frontiers of Portugal, upon the little river Agujar, in the midst of a spacious plain, equally fertile and pleasant. It received the name of Ciudad Rodrigo, from the nobleman under whose direction it was repaired, and very quickly became so populous as to be made the seat of a prelate as well as a garrison. It has continued to flourish ever since, and has been always a principal rendezvous, or a place of arms, for the Spanish forces, when that crown has been engaged in a war with Portugal.

- a marched to dispossess Don Ferdinand de Castro of the government of Toledo, and his friends of the places they possessed; and to give the better colour to this he carried the prince with him<sup>9</sup>. On the other hand, Don Ferdinand de Castro opposed force to force; and marching with a numerous and well appointed army, met that of his competitor between Garcinarro and Huete, where, after an obstinate and bloody action, Don Manrique being killed, his forces fled and left Don Ferdinand master of the field of battle<sup>1</sup>. Yet notwithstanding this great blow, Don Nugnez de Lara, brother to the late count Manrique, chiefly by the influence of the royal person, soon raised another army, and laid siege to the castle of Zurita, which was very gallantly defended by Lope de Arenas, placed therein by the Castro's, and had not been taken at last, if one of the governor's domestics had not, for a sum of money, basely undertaken, and as barbarously executed, the murder of his master<sup>2</sup>. The pecuniary reward in all probability came from the minister; but the young king Don Alonso thought so eminent a service should be accompanied also with a royal reward, for which reason he ordered his eyes to be put out<sup>3</sup> (A). This method having succeeded in a place of less consequence, it was judged expedient to practise the same arts with regard to Toledo; and a person of distinction in that city having been prevailed upon to let in the king's troops secretly, Don Ferdinand Ruyz de Castro had the first notice of this treachery from the acclamations of the people, at the sight of their young king: upon which, having no other resource left, he mounted his horse immediately, and, attended by a few friends, made his escape into the territory of the Moors<sup>4</sup>. The capital thus taken by surprize, the rest of the cities, castles, and towns, in the kingdom of Toledo, opened their gates, and submitted to the king, or rather to Don Nugnez de Lara, who governed all things with almost royal authority<sup>5</sup>. About this time deceased John, archbishop of Toledo, and was succeeded in that high dignity by Cenebruno, who had been tutor to the young king Alonso, a person eminent for his learning and great abilities<sup>6</sup>. Mohammed, king of Valencia, became at this time vassal to the king of Castile<sup>7</sup>.

- It quickly appeared that Don Ferdinand, king of Leon, had formed a right judgment when he fortified his frontiers on the side of Portugal, for notwithstanding he had married the daughter of Don Alonso, that monarch made a sudden irruption into Galicia, and possessed himself of Limmia and Turon, into which he put strong garrisons<sup>8</sup>. The next year, elated with this success, he marched with a numerous army and invested Badajoz, upon the news of which Don Ferdinand, who had assembled a good army at Ciudad Rodrigo, marched to its relief. It is necessary to observe, that this city was in the hands of the Moors, but in all probability was a seignory held by homage from the king of Leon, who therefore found himself, from principles of justice as well as policy, interested in its defence. Yet before he could arrive within sight of the place it was surrendered; upon which Don Ferdinand took a resolution of besieging the king of Portugal in his new conquest, which Don Alonso no sooner perceived, than he endeavoured to draw out his forces into the field. Though he was then between seventy and four-score, he was himself on horseback, and pushing forward at the head of his guards to get out at the gate, struck his leg with such vehemence against one of the bolts as shattered it to pieces. This accident occasioned such confusion, that the troops of Portugal were easily beaten, and Don Alonso taken prisoner<sup>9</sup>. He was exceedingly mortified by this disgrace, and had no reason to expect very kind treatment from his son-in-law, after the usage he had given him, and therefore made him large offers to procure his liberty. The king of Leon behaved towards him with the most profound respect, and the greatest affection possible; he desired him to lay aside thoughts of business and attend to his cure; but finding him restless and impatient, he assured him that he expected nothing more than to have

(A) We have a large account of this siege, and of the most remarkable passages therein, by Mariana, who gives us amongst other particulars this, that the governor Don Lopez, being driven to extremity, offered to treat; and that Don Nugnez de Lara, and another great general of the king's, went into the place upon his parole, and were immediately arrested; upon which recourse was had to that expedient, by which, as we have shewn in the text, the place was taken. The traitor stabbed his master while he was shaving him, and made his escape out of the town, before the death of the governor was known. By laying all these circumstances together, there seems to be good reason to suspect that this conspiracy was both formed and executed, during a cessation of arms; and perhaps some incidents forged, in order to save the reputation of Don Nugnez de Lara, and his associates; for if it had been as Mariana represents it, one cannot easily account for the besieged suffering these persons, who were in their hands at the time this treacherous murder was committed, to escape unhurt; to which we may add, that there was evidently in this transaction, something that so much wounded the king's honour, as induced him to hazard the imputation of cruelty, rather than not testify to his subjects that it was a measure which, though he might adopt, he could by no means approve.

things put into the same condition as before the war, and that they might live in peace and a friendship for the future, to which the king of Portugal most willingly assented, and before his cure was perfected returned to his own dominions, which was the reason that he remained lame during the rest of his life <sup>b</sup>. As soon as the Portuguese had evacuated the place, Don Ferdinand ordered his troops to quit it likewise, and receiving the homage of the Mohammedan governor, he left it in the same situation as before the war begun. He then returned to his capital of Leon, and applied himself assiduously to the affairs of his civil government, which he brought into better order than they had ever been in the times of his predecessors, who, by having more extensive territories, were less at leisure to look into things of this nature for the ease and benefit of their subjects <sup>c</sup>.

A. D. 1169.

THE disputes between the Almohades and the independent Moors of Spain, if these could <sup>b</sup> be properly so stiled, who were the subjects of Mohammed, king of Valencia, who was the vassal of Don Alonso of Castile, still continued <sup>d</sup>. The king of Morocco judged it impossible for him to prosecute the war against the Christians with any great effect, while any of the Moors disputed his authority; and on the other hand, the Christians judged it infinitely more expedient for them to act against the Moors as auxiliaries of Moors, than as direct enemies, till it should be in their power to crush them effectually by a general confederacy. The people of Castile, and more especially the partizans of the house of Lara, were very desirous that the young king should marry, though he was not at this time above fourteen; and as this was a point of great concern to the nation, an assembly of the states was called at Burgos to settle this and other weighty affairs <sup>e</sup>. In consequence of their deliberations, ambassadors were sent <sup>c</sup> to Henry the second, king of England, at that time in Guienne, to demand in the name of Don Alonso the princess Eleonora his daughter, by the duchess of Aquitaine of the same name <sup>f</sup>. While this treaty was on the carpet, the young king had an interview with the king of Arragon upon the frontiers, in which all old disputes were settled, and a new treaty offensive and defensive made between the two crowns, with an exchange of fortresses on both sides, for the better security of its being punctually performed <sup>g</sup>. At the same time, the king of Castile, as he was not at this juncture upon very good terms with the king of Navarre, stipulated with the monarch of Arragon for the safe passage of his queen, which was cheerfully granted and performed <sup>h</sup>. The king, as soon as he heard of her arrival in Arragon, sent the archbishop of Toledo, the count of Lara, and several persons of the first distinction to receive her, met her <sup>d</sup> in person at Terrazona, where their marriage was solemnized in the presence of the king of Arragon and the prime nobility of both nations; after which the king and queen of Castile proceeded to Burgos, being every where welcomed by the loud acclamations of their subjects <sup>i</sup>; and in the month of August in the succeeding year the queen was brought to bed of an infant, who was named Donna Berengara, after her great grandmother <sup>k</sup>.

In order to give a new turn to his affairs in Spain, Joseph king of Morocco sent over a very numerous body of troops, which, joined to those he had before, were put under the command of Omar, esteemed one of the ablest officers that had in this age commanded the Moorish armies. He marched with them against the king of Valencia in person, and at the same time sent a strong detachment to besiege Santaren, which had been many years in the possession of <sup>c</sup> the king of Portugal; but against the former he was able to do little through the assistance that he received from the king of Castile; and the forces before Santaren were attacked and defeated by the Portuguese monarch, who obliged them to raise the siege and retire in great disorder <sup>l</sup>. This advantage was no sooner obtained, than Don Ferdinand king of Leon, appeared in sight of the city with a numerous army, which alarmed the king of Portugal much more than the former invaders. He was, however, soon out of his pain, upon receiving a message from his son-in-law, to compliment him on his victory, and to assure him, that he came with no other view than to lend him his assistance; upon which under the like circumstances he might always depend. This was so acceptable to the Portuguese, that they could not help testifying their satisfaction in the warmest terms possible, and it likewise made a very favourable impression <sup>f</sup> upon the Christians throughout Spain in general <sup>m</sup>.

THESE misfortunes, however, irritated Joseph, king of Morocco, to such a degree, that he took a resolution of carrying on the war in person; and in the summer of the ensuing year invaded the territories of Don Alonso of Castile, and besieged Huete, which he reduced to the last extremity; but upon the approach of the king Don Alonso with the whole force of his dominions, he thought proper to retire into his own territories; where, having intelligence of a the death of his old enemy Mohammed, king of Valentia, he made himself some amends for his former disappointment, by an irruption into his countries; where, without much difficulty, he conquered the kingdom of Murcia, and added it to his empire<sup>a</sup>. He might have done more, if the situation of his affairs in Africa had not obliged him to return thither; and he might have been prevented from doing so much, if the kings of Arragon and Castile had not turned their arms against the king of Navarre, though with little success; except harrassing A. D. 1172: his dominions, out of which they were at length obliged to retire, without making themselves masters of one considerable place, or coming to any action<sup>b</sup>.

UPON the return of Josepb, king of Morocco, into Africa, Aben-Jacob was appointed his lieutenant, and commander in chief in Spain; who, to signalize the first year of his government, made an irruption into Portugal, where he besieged Torres-Novas, and took it by assault<sup>c</sup>. He then suddenly entered the territories of Leon, of which the king, Don Ferdinand, no sooner received intelligence, than he marched with a body of troops he intended to have sent to the assistance of his father-in-law, and threw himself into Ciudad Rodrigo, just time enough to prevent that place from being invested. He was quickly convinced that the army of Aben-Jacob was much more formidable than he imagined; and what chagrined him most, was, that Don Ferdinand Ruyz de Castro had a share in this expedition, with a very considerable corps of brave men, who had followed his fortune. The king apprehended his condition to be very dangerous, if he should be shut up in a place scarce able to contain his troops; and therefore took a wife, as well as generous resolution, of first trying his fortune in the field<sup>d</sup>. The enemy were much embarrassed with the spoil they had taken in Portugal, and had separated their army into several bodies, with a view to prevent any relief from being given to the place; so that being suddenly attacked by Don Ferdinand, they were quickly thrown into confusion, which, in a short time produced a total defeat<sup>e</sup>. The king improved this victory, by making such offers to Don Ferdinand Ruyz de Castro, as induced him to quit the party of the Moors, and to depend upon the protection of the king of Leon, who received him with great affability and kindness, and assigned him lands sufficient for the subsistence of himself and all his dependants<sup>f</sup>.

THE kings of Castile and Arragon were still busied in their war against the king of Navarre, a prince far inferior to them in force, but superior in his knowledge of the art of war; by which he kept them from making any conquests that were worth maintaining, and still preserved those places which had given birth to these disputes, in spite of repeated invasions; in which, though the confederates promised themselves much, they were able to effect little. At length, as he wisely foresaw, they grew dissatisfied with each other, and from secret murmurs and complaints broke at length into open hostilities, begun by the king of Castile, who retook one of the castles which he had yielded as a pledge for the due performance of treaties; but continued by the king of Arragon, who at length declared he would have nothing farther to do with the Castilian. As the highest proof of his resentment, he refused to celebrate his marriage with the Infanta Donna Sancha, daughter to the emperor Alonso, aunt to the king of Castile, and sister to the king of Leon; and, to shew how much he was in earnest, sent ambassadors to Constantinople, to obtain the princess Eudoxia, daughter to the emperor Emanuel<sup>g</sup>. This not only alarmed the court of Castile, but that of Leon also; Don Ferdinand making no secret that he could not be a tame spectator of such an insult offered to his sister; so that the king of Arragon had now the war with Navarre still open, and himself upon bad terms with the kings of Castile and Leon; the consideration of which soon brought him to alter his measures, though even then with some degree of reluctance and discredit.

IN the mean time, the old quarrels between the families of Castro and Lara revived, and that to such a degree, as to disturb the peace of the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, almost all the noble families in both taking part either on one side or the other; but, which was thought very extraordinary, the count Don Osorio, though Don Ferdinand Ruyz de Castro had married his daughter, took part with the house of Lara, and actually joined himself with his vassals to the friends of that family, when a resolution was taken to determine, once for all, these implacable resentments by a general action, at a place assigned in the province of Tiero de Campos<sup>h</sup>. It is true that Mariana<sup>i</sup> represents this war, as if it had been between the uncle and the nephew; but all the antient historians consider it in quite another light<sup>k</sup>. It may be, that a great part of those who attended Don Ferdinand de Castro, might be subjects of the king of Leon; and it is very probable they were; but this might be out of respect to his person, or from a liking to his cause, which, from the beginning, the king Don Ferdinand had espoused. However this may be, the battle was fought on the spot assigned, and at the day appointed, not only with great vivacity and spirit, but with all the rage and fury that inveterate hatred could inspire. In the end, Don Ferdinand de Castro gained a complete victory<sup>a</sup>, the count Don Alvaro and the count Don Oso being killed upon the spot, and the count Don Nugnez de Lara and the count Don Roderigo Guiterrez were made prisoners, whom Don Ferdinand generously dismissed, that they might take care of the funerals of their friends (B). He shewed not long after that his resentment was not at all abated, by repudiating his wife for her father's offence<sup>z</sup>, notwithstanding he had paid for it with his blood; and the king of Leon, that he might attach him the more strongly to his service, gave him in marriage Donna Tiennetta, the natural daughter of the emperor, and his own sister<sup>2</sup>. A circumstance which, compared with that monarch's own match, will shew he was no despicable politician. b

Kings of Castile, Arragon, and Navarre refer their differences to Henry the Second king of England.

THE king of Arragon, perceiving that his own subjects were extremely offended at his breaking off the match with the Infanta Donna Sancta, and being informed that the courts of Leon and Castile meditated an invasion of his dominions, suddenly altered his purpose, and demanded that princess as his wife, to which Don Alonso readily assented, and the marriage was solemnized on the eighteenth of January, at Saragossa<sup>b</sup>, in the presence of the pope's legate, and of all the prelates and nobility of that kingdom. This naturally engaged them to return to their former measures, in respect to the king of Navarre, upon whom they continued to make war for several years, but with as little success as before; till at last, upon the repeated interpositions of the clergy and nobility, all the three kings were prevailed upon to suspend hostilities, and to refer the matters in dispute, once for all, to the decision of the king of England, to whom each of the kings sent ambassadors, properly instructed to support their respective pretensions; and the king accordingly, after a solemn hearing of all parties, pronounced a very equitable award, with which, however, none of them were satisfied<sup>c</sup>; tho' after some new disturbances, they were at length contented to determine things amongst themselves, upon pretty near the same conditions which the king had prescribed, after wasting much of the blood and treasure of their subjects to no purpose, unless it was to serve the interests of the Moors (C).

THE king Don Ferdinand of Leon had lived for many years in the greatest harmony with his queen, and, for all that appears to the contrary, was inclined to live with her according to the laws of God and of his kingdom during his life; but the pope's cardinal legate at his court, having found out that the king and queen stood in an equal degree of relation, or, in other words, were both great grand children to the king Don Alphonso the Sixth, he gave notice of it to his master, who thereupon enjoined the king to put away his wife, tho' he had by her a son, the Infant Don Alonso, d

(B) This passage in the Spanish history, shews us the true temper of the Gothic nation; and it would be no difficult matter to prove, that this method of determining great quarrels by combat was in general use, under the notion of an appeal to God. It is true, that the relation given us by Mariana is certainly inconsistent with this notion, since he makes it a war between the two kings, and speaks of Don Ferdinand de Castro as acting only in quality of governor and commander in chief of the king of Leon's forces; who, he asserts, gave him his sister in marriage, as the only suitable reward for so great a service. We have observed in the text, that this is against the authority of all the old historians, some of whom must have been perfectly acquainted with every circumstance that attended this fact, and could be under no temptation to misrepresent it, though this alone sufficiently justifies the preference we have given them: yet it may not be amiss to observe, for the reader's satisfaction, that Mariana does not contradict them more than he contradicts himself; for had this been a war between the two kings, how come we to have no account of its causes, commencement, and of its conclusion? How came Don Ferdinand to resent so much his father-in-law's being in the field, when that was his duty? and lastly, which is indeed the strongest of all, both in point of fact and because it is related by Mariana himself, how came Don Ferdinand de Castro to set Don

Nugnez de Lara at liberty, after exacting from him an oath that all former quarrels should be buried in oblivion? These are circumstances that evidently prove it was not a public, but a private quarrel; and therefore Don Ferdinand de Castro, after so glorious a victory, thought himself at full liberty to put an end to it, for which he is very justly commended by this historian.

(C) This remarkable embassy and reference is taken notice of by our ancient historians, particularly Roger Hoveden, who assures us, that there were several lords sent by each of the kings to support their pretensions. The king of England having called together his prelates and peers, appointed the first Sunday in Lent, A. D. 1177, to have this matter fully discussed before them; and after having heard all that could be alleged on either side, and collected the opinion of the bishops and nobility, met together for that purpose, he decreed that the king of Navarre should restore to the monarch of Castile certain places which he had taken from him; and that the king of Castile should make the like restitution, and should also pay, for ten years together, the sum of three thousand marvadies in gold, in compensation for the expences of the war. This judgment of award appeared very equitable to the ambassadors on both sides, who signed it; and having finished the business of their embassy, returned again into Spain, to render an account of their proceedings to their respective masters.

- a who was to be the heir of his dominions<sup>d</sup>. It is said that the king demurred a little to this, and that he even went so far as to keep his wife a year, notwithstanding all the exhortations and even menaces of the pope; nay, it is even asserted that he was not brought to a compliance till his subjects felt the thunder and lightning of Rome, by the kingdom's being put under an interdict: then, for his subjects ease and his own, he parted with his wife Donna Urraca<sup>e</sup>; and about a year after, espoused Donna Theresa the daughter, though some historians call her the widow, of Don Nugno de Lara<sup>f</sup>. This is more particularly mentioned, because there is not the slightest hint in any ancient historian, that this monarch was the least dissatisfied with his wife, or entertained any distaste of his son, but quite the contrary; so that if there was any thing in this transaction repugnant to morality or the laws of God, it must not be ascribed to the humour, appetite, or policy of Don Ferdinand, but to the pope's absolute will and pleasure, which, though a powerful and independent monarch, Don Ferdinand durst not resist.

- Don Alonso, king of Castile, no sooner found himself freed from the war of Navarre, by the reference to the king of England, which had been accepted by all parties, than he resumed his former intention of imitating his illustrious predecessors, by turning his arms against the infidels. With this view he caused great magazines to be erected at Toledo, where, having assembled a numerous army, and amongst the flower of the several orders of knighthood, he marched into the enemies country, and laid siege to Cuenca, a place seated on the top of a hill, at the confluence of two little streams, which, after they have joined their waters, form the river Xeucax. Strong as this place was by situation, the Moors had rendered it much more so by labour and art; so that it held out till provisions were scarce in the Christian camp, and till the monarch of Morocco was apprised of the fidelity as well as of the distress of his subjects, upon which he directed levies to be made, throughout all his dominions in Spain, for their relief<sup>g</sup>: the king of Castile, in this situation of things, thought it requisite for him to ask the assistance of Christian princes, upon which, his old ally, the king of Arragon, marched with a body of good troops, and joined him before Cuenca. The Moors advanced with their forces in order to raise the siege; but believing that too hazardous an undertaking, they made an irruption into the district of Toledo, and marched directly towards that capital, as if they meant to besiege it. But the alcaides Don Gudiel and Don Alonso prevented this, by marching out with such forces as the city could raise, and giving them battle on the twenty-eighth of July, in which they obtained a glorious victory, or rather their fellow citizens, for both those brave men fell in the field<sup>h</sup>. The garrison of Cuenca, notwithstanding they had been so long and so hard pressed, and that by this blow they were deprived of all hopes of relief, held out to the twenty-first of September, and did not even then surrender, but in consequence of a good capitulation<sup>i</sup>. The king of Castile, to manifest his just sense of the friendship and service rendered him by the king of Arragon, released him from the homage due to the crown of Castile, for the city of Saragossa, and all the territory on that side the Ebro lying next to his dominions<sup>k</sup>.

- We are told by some historians<sup>l</sup>, that while the king, Don Alonso, was employed in the siege of Cuenca, his uncle Don Ferdinand, king of Leon, invaded and made himself master of some part of his dominions; which may be true, but is certainly very improbable. Upon this, the king of Castile, in conjunction with the king of Portugal, entered the dominions of Leon, and committed great outrages (D). The king, Don Ferdinand, engaged the Infant Don

(D) There is a passage related by Mariana, which happened during the siege of Cuenca, that well deserves the reader's notice. Don Alonso, king of Castile, finding the place hold out so much longer than he expected, left the king of Arragon before it with the army, and returned to Burgos, in order to hold an assembly of the states, his finances at that time being in much disorder. In this assembly, by the advice of Don Diego de Haro, who seems now to have gained an ascendancy in the king's favour, and whose sister was married to his uncle the king of Leon, he proposed, that since the people were already exhausted, and that if any tax was laid upon them it could not be levied so soon as the public exigence required, the nobility should for once, and without creating a precedent, consent to a small imposition upon themselves, which being immediately paid, Mod. Hist. Vol. VII.

might supply the demands of the army. The states were on the point of consenting to this proposition, when Don Pedro de Lara stood up, and declared he would defend the immunities of the nobles of Castile to the last drop of his blood, and that those would follow him who were of his opinion. Upon this he went out, attended by the majority of the assembly; by which the king's proposition was totally defeated; and it seems the nobility conceived this bold opposition so great and so well timed a service, that they resolved to perpetuate the memory of the obligation they were under, by giving Don Pedro and his successors a splendid dinner annually upon the day on which this transaction happened. Mariana relates this story with great spirit, though he censures it as an indecency to the crown; other historians have perhaps expressed their sentiments more

A. D. 1178. Don Sancho, of Portugal, who intended to have besieged Ciudad Rodrigo, and totally defeated his army, but discovered a great unwillingness to engage with his nephew, of whose proceedings he immediately complained to the king of Arragon, who had been guaranty of their last treaty, which surely he would not have done if himself had broke it. On the other hand, the king of Arragon sent two prelates, and a gentleman of his court, ambassadors to Castile, in order to demand of the king the castle of Ariza, and to forbear all hostilities against the king of Leon, threatening that, if he did not, he would join with his own troops those of his uncle<sup>m</sup>, which seems to render it certain that Don Ferdinand was not so much in the wrong as historians suppose him to be, and an additional proof seems to be furnished from the conduct of the king of Castile, who complied with his friends request, by which the peace of Spain was once more restored, at least amongst the Christian powers, at a very critical juncture<sup>n</sup>. a b

Don Ferdinand present at the glorious victory of Santaren.

In order to strengthen that harmony which reigned at present between the two nations, Don Ferdinand, king of Leon, and Don Alonso of Castile had an interview at Tordesillas, in order to remove all subjects of jealousy and dispute<sup>o</sup>. About this time died Donna Theresa Lara, queen of Leon, and soon after Donna Tiennetta, the wife of Don Ferdinand de Castro, by whom she had a son of the same name, commonly stiled Don Ferdinand the Castilian<sup>p</sup>; and the year following, Don Ferdinand espoused Donna Urraca Lopez<sup>q</sup>, the daughter of the count Don Lope de Haro, one of the principal lords in the province of Biscay; and on the twentieth of April was born at Burgos, Don Sancho, son to Don Alonso, king of Castile<sup>r</sup>. That monarch made, for several years together, incursions into the territories of the Moors, with great success, and in one of them he made himself master of Alarcon, by which Cuenca was so well covered, that he thought fit to erect it into a bishop's see<sup>s</sup>. About the same time Don Ferdinand, king of Leon, besieged and took Caceres from the infidels, so that it is evident, whenever the Christian princes were at peace among themselves, they never failed to carry the terror of their arms into the countries still subject to the Moors<sup>t</sup>. On the twenty-fourth of July, Don Ferdinand was likewise present, as an auxiliary to the king of Portugal, at the glorious victory of Santaren, when the whole force of the Moors, commanded by their monarch Joseph, was totally routed without fighting<sup>u</sup>. The death of that monarch by a fall from his horse just as the battle began, intimidated his subjects to such a degree, that they immediately quitted the field of battle to place all their safety in flight, which afforded the Christians an opportunity they did not neglect of quitting scores with the Moors, for their recent severities<sup>v</sup>. c d Repeated expeditions of Don Alonso of Castile, against the Moors in Andalusia.

Don Alonso of Castile had the misfortune the next year to be beaten by the Moors, in the neighbourhood of Sotillo in Estremadura<sup>x</sup>, which however did not hinder his taking the field again in the succeeding spring; and, after having enriched his troops with a great booty, he returned triumphant, and went afterwards to an interview with the king of Arragon, with whom he concerted the means of continuing the peace which had already lasted for some years amongst the Christian powers, and of prosecuting the war against the infidels, points which these two princes had equally at heart, and, by concurring therein, contributed greatly to their own reputation and the good of their subjects<sup>y</sup>. The next year Don Alonso was in the field again, and made himself master of some small places; but his chief design seems to have been the security of his own dominions, by keeping the Moors in such a state of apprehension and distraction, as might hinder them from undertaking any thing to the prejudice of his territories, without which it would have been impossible for the people to have enjoyed that degree of peace and safety, that was necessary to cultivate and improve their lands. e

In the autumn of this year, Don Ferdinand, king of Leon, went to pay his devotions at the tomb of the apostle St. James<sup>z</sup>, in the church of Compostella; and at his return to Benavente, which is ten leagues from Leon, found himself extremely indisposed: he lingered however through the remaining months of that year, and to the twenty-first day of January in the next, when he breathed his last, to the great regret of his subjects. Mariana says, that he f more strongly by burying it in silence. We thought it inconsistent with our duty, either to follow his example in deciding, or theirs in concealing, and have therefore stated the fact, and leave our readers to judge for themselves.

a was fitter for the general of an army, than for the government of a kingdom<sup>a</sup>: but if we consider his actions, we may, with equal reason, believe that there have been very few kings fitter for both; for he was a prince of great virtue and generosity, and as remarkable for piety as for valour. He left at his death three sons, Don Alonso by his first queen the Infanta of Portugal, with whom, as the reader has seen, the pope forced him to part, and Don Sancho and Don Garcia by Donna Urraca, who survived him<sup>b</sup>. Mariana, and after him other historians<sup>c</sup>, have suggested, that, at the time of his decease, Don Alonso was upon the point of flying into Portugal, being weary of the continual ill-usage of his mother-in-law, who reflected on him for his mother's misfortune, and pretended to treat him as a bastard; but this is very improbable, since even these historians allow that his mother-in-law's hatred arose from his father's affection to him; neither does it appear that the pope pretended to bastardize the issue of those marriages, which they declared null on the score of consanguinity. The body of Don Ferdinand was buried in the cathedral of St. James, near that of his mother Donna Berengara, and of his grandfather Don Raymond<sup>d</sup>. His successor was present at the solemnity, and some days after went to pay a visit to his mother-in-law, with whom it appears that he was inclined to live at least upon fair terms, notwithstanding her intentions, to have deprived him of the succession, to have placed her son Don Sancho on the throne of Leon, and to have bestowed the crown of Galicia on Don Garcia, are said to have been generally known; so that the moderation of the young monarch deserved to be highly admired<sup>e</sup>. But as he was universally acceptable to the people, and sure of support from the crown of Portugal, there seems to be good reason to doubt whether the queen Donna Urraca Lopez could ever entertain such notions, more especially considering the age of her children, and her having no protector capable of affording her the least degree of assistance toward the execution of such a design. It is therefore more than likely that these conjectures took rise from succeeding events, with which, when the reader is acquainted, he will be enabled to form a better judgment.

THE king of Castile held this year the general assembly of the states of his kingdom at Carrion, to which, through a desire of expressing his great affection for his cousin, and that, according to the custom of those times, he might be made a knight by a monarch in so high reputation for wisdom, courage, and all other royal virtues, the king of Leon resorted; and having in that assembly, purely from a spirit of politeness and complaisance, kissed the hand of the king of Castile as he took his seat, this was afterwards wrested into an act of solemn homage, and was the true cause of that distaste which quickly succeeded to this superabundant kindness between these princes<sup>f</sup>. The next year however they acted as confederates against the Moors, and with great success, recovered out of their hands abundance of places in Estremadura; not content with which they passed the Sierra Morena, and wasted all the territory of Seville with fire and sword to the sea side. One would have imagined that nothing could have contributed, more than the issue of this campaign, to convince the monarch of Castile of the expediency of living upon good terms with his cousin of Leon; yet this was so far from being the case, that it proved the cause of a rupture between them; for though the latter had shared in the danger and fatigue, yet the former kept all the conquests, though some of them, from their situation, were very convenient for his cousin, and of little consequence to him. This was resented by Don Alonso of Leon, like a young man; for he immediately sought the friendship of the king of Portugal, with the same zeal that he shewed in embracing that of the king of Castile, and, as the strongest proof of his sincerity, married the Infanta Donna Theresa<sup>g</sup>, who was his cousin German, by the mother's side, without reflecting on what had happened to his father.

AMONGST other circumstances that contributed to inspire the king of Castile with unreasonable haughtiness, one was, that the emperor Frederic Barbarossa had concluded a treaty of marriage between his son prince Conrad, and the infanta Donna Berengara, daughter of the king of Castile, and had sent the young prince into Spain, that their nuptials might be celebrated at Toledo<sup>h</sup>. Don Alonso received him in that city with the utmost magnificence, and with all the marks of respect he could desire, signed the contract of marriage which had been before subscribed by the emperor, and made his intended son-in-law a knight. Yet, after all this was done, the nuptials did not take place<sup>i</sup>. Most of the Spanish historians<sup>k</sup>, for the honour of their country, ascribe this to the Infanta's terror of so long a journey, a distaste to the climate of Germany, and a prejudice against the manners of the people: but Ferreras<sup>1</sup> has assigned, if a not a more certain, at least a more probable cause: he observes, that Donna Eleonora, queen of Castile, was, during the stay of prince Conrad, brought to bed of the Infant Don Ferdinand, which entirely spoiled the scheme of the German prince, who, as the king of Castile had no male issue living, expected to have succeeded him in the throne, in consequence of his marriage; of which, perceiving that there was now little hopes, he took leave of the king, the queen, and the Infanta, and returned into Germany<sup>m</sup>. Soon after this, the monarch of Castile presuming on his cousin's youth and his own great power, committed acts of hostility in the kingdom of Leon; of this the king of Arragon was no sooner informed, than he made an irruption into Castile; upon which Don Alonso turned his arms against him, but with very indifferent success. By the interposition of the nobility and prelates of both kingdoms, the peace was quickly renewed, upon a<sup>n</sup> promise that the king of Castile should do nothing to the prejudice of his cousin of Leon, whom, because he had injured, he hated.

Don Alonso, his queen Theresa, and four prelates excommunicated, and his marriage null'd. THE pope's legate in Spain, cardinal Gregory, who was sent to promote peace amongst the Christian princes, gave a singular specimen of his abilities that way, by insinuating to the kings of Leon and Portugal, that the marriage of Don Alonso with the Infanta Donna Theresa was void, and that therefore they ought to part; but none of the parties inclining to obey, he summoned a council at Salamanca<sup>o</sup>, in which the point was determined as he would have it; but the bishops of Leon, Astorga, Salamanca, and Zamora, who did not assist at this council, protested against the decree, alleging, that marriages of this sort were not prohibited by the divine, or even by the ecclesiastical law, but by the civil, and for certain political reasons; and that therefore c princes, who had a power of establishing this law, must likewise have the power of dispensing with it. The cardinal legate effectually refuted this pernicious doctrine, by excommunicating the four prelates, and threatening both the kings of Leon and Portugal with an interdict; and very soon after he carried his threats into execution<sup>p</sup>, which were attended with most dreadful consequences, the people in both kingdoms being extremely provoked at the obstinacy of the king of Leon, who, in spite of the express will and pleasure of the pope, would needs live with his wife. That monarch in vain sent the bishop of Zamora to Rome, to prevail upon the pope to remove the impediment as to the legality of his marriage; the pontif would hear nothing upon that head, but, at the earnest suit of the bishop took off his excommunication and the interdict, allowing divine service and the sacraments to be administered every where, d except in the presence of the king and queen of Leon<sup>q</sup>, who were left to the most desperate courses, if their own piety had not guarded them.

Archbishop of Toledo's expedition against the Moors excites a dreadful war. DON Alonso, king of Castile, was all this while engaged in continual expeditions against the infidels; and this very year had sent a potent army, under the command of Don Martin, archbishop of Toledo, into Andalusia, where he had acted with unexampled severity, destroying the corn and the vines, tearing the olive-trees up by the roots, putting multitudes of men, women, and children in chains, sweeping away all the cattle; and to complete this scene of destruction, laying every village and open town he passed through in ashes. The reader must not imagine that we are guilty of any exaggeration, for we transcribe not only the fact, but the very words, from a Spanish historian<sup>r</sup>. The report of this cruel proceeding was no sooner brought to Jacob Aben Joseph, king of Morocco, than he wrote a letter to the king Don Alonso, in which he expostulated on this new way of making war, in a manner barbarous beyond all example; to which Don Alonso gave so haughty an answer, that the Moor immediately published the Gacia<sup>s</sup>, which answers to our croisade, and insures to every Mussulman, who either kills a Christian or is killed himself, a plenary absolution from all his sins, and an immediate entrance into Paradise. This called every man that was able to bear arms into the field, and the king of Morocco himself, coming over with a prodigious army from Africa, ordered a general rendezvous of the whole forces of his empire at Seville<sup>t</sup>. Don Alonso of Castile, upon this, condescended to ask the assistance of the kings of Leon and Navarre, representing it as a war of religion, and in which the common cause of all the Christians in Spain was at stake; as they were convinced of the truth of the fact, they did not enquire f nicely into the cause, but readily promised him, not only all he asked, but that they would march with all the forces of their respective kingdoms, to join him at Toledo, and began immediately to make the necessary levies for that purpose, not doubting that this confederacy would secure both his and their own dominions.

The king of Castile obliged to ask succours, JACOB ABEN-JOSEPH found his army so numerous, that he was obliged to order part of them to rendezvous at Cordova, where having joined them with the rest of his forces from both places of great strength, and which might have found employment for some time, even <sup>prudently be-</sup> for his prodigious army <sup>fore he re-</sup> <sup>ceived: h. m.</sup> But the king of Castile, who had assembled all his forces, advanced, without waiting for his allies, within a small distance of the enemy. The principal officers of his army suggested to him that he ought either to retreat in time or fortify his camp, since both the kings of Leon and Navarre were within a few days march, and not adventure on a battle with such a vast disproportion of forces. But the king could not be brought to relish these wholesome counsels; he had treated the Moors with contempt, and to retire before him would be a perpetual disgrace: besides, he was unwilling to share the honour of a victory, and he looked upon his troops and himself as invincible. On the eighteenth of July, the b two armies came in fight, at a small distance from the town of Alarcos, and the engagement quickly began. The Christians behaved with great intrepidity; but after a warm and obstinate dispute, they were overborn by numbers <sup>w</sup>. Don Alonso perceiving that they began to give way, and apprehending the loss of that high reputation which he had acquired, grew perfectly furious, and would have thrown himself into the midst of the enemy, but the nobility about his person restrained him, and carried him off by force <sup>x</sup>. The Moors upon this occasion gained one of the completest victories that history records <sup>y</sup>. There fell upwards of twenty thousand Castilians upon the spot, amongst whom was the flower of the nobility: the military orders, their camp and their baggage fell likewise into the hands of the enemy, and the shattered remains of the army retreated with difficulty to Toledo, and shut themselves up c under cover of the extended fortifications.

- Don Alonso had scarce entered this city, before the king of Leon arrived with a numerous <sup>Dignified conse-</sup> army: he went immediately to visit his cousin, and mildly expostulated with him the imprudence <sup>quences of his</sup> of his conduct <sup>z</sup>. The Spanish historians, for the honour of their country, have unanimously sup- <sup>defeat at Alar-</sup> pressed the answer of the monarch of Castile; but it is nevertheless certain, that he endeavoured <sup>cos, and inso-</sup> to throw that blame, which belonged wholly to himself, upon the two kings <sup>lent behaviour</sup> <sup>afterwards.</sup> <sup>a</sup>, and this in such coarse terms, that Don Alonso of Leon immediately quitted Toledo, and returned into his own dominions, ravaging those of Castile as he passed; and the monarch of Navarre did the like <sup>b</sup>. Upon this, the king of Castile, having provided for the security of Toledo, repaired <sup>A. D. 1195.</sup> to Burgos, leaving Jacob Aben-Joseph to make the best use of his victory, who reduced Cal- d atrava and Alarcos, though with some difficulty, and afterwards made a furious irruption into Portugal, where he murdered all the Monks and ecclesiastics that fell in his way, and wasted all the country with inexpressible barbarity, as far as appears from the histories of these times, in which Don Roderic de Ximenes, then bishop of Sigüenza, and afterwards primate of Toledo, flourished: he met with little or no resistance; for the Christian princes were more intent on punishing the insolence of the king of Castile, than cautious in protecting their own dominions, which, how gross soever the provocation they had received might be, was beyond all doubt to the full as inexcusable. At length they were awakened from their lethargy, and began, though a little too late, to assemble their forces, and to provide for the chastisement of an enemy, who, in respect to them, had met with nothing that could justify the brutality e of his behaviour.

- THE kings Don Alonso of Leon, and Don Sancho of Portugal, no longer able to resist <sup>Invasions the</sup>
the importunities of their subjects, submitted to the papal decree, and the Infanta Donna <sup>kingdom of</sup>
Theresa of Portugal, queen of Leon, returned home to her father, leaving behind her the two <sup>Leon, while</sup> princesses, her daughters; and there is reason to believe, that this event threw the affairs of <sup>his own domi-</sup> that kingdom into great disorder <sup>nions are ra-</sup> <sup>vaged by the</sup> <sup>Moors.</sup> <sup>d</sup>. This induced the king of Castile, who had now collected a great body of forces, to fall with them into the kingdom of Leon; though the Moors, with the miramamolin at their head, had actually invaded his own dominions, penetrated as far as Toledo, and remained ten days before that city, which, however, they found so well fortified, and the people so much disposed to make a vigorous resistance, that at length, loaded f with pillage, and sated with revenge, they thought fit to retreat <sup>e</sup>. In the mean time, Don <sup>A. D. 1196.</sup>
Alonso of Castile took many places of small strength in the kingdom of Leon, ruined one of the suburbs belonging to the capital which was inhabited by Jews, and at last besieged the city of Astorga, but without effect; which provoked him to such a degree, that he wasted all the open country with as little mercy as if he intended to copy, in his cousin's dominions, the dreadful lesson which had been set him by the infidels in his own <sup>f</sup>; and having done this,

he returned to Toledo, with an army laden with spoils taken from their fellow Christians, a through a country miserably ruined by the infidels, merely for want of that defence; which it was his and their duty to afford <sup>g</sup>.

They overrun the kingdom of Toledo again, but at length retire into their own territories.

It might be naturally apprehended that his own reflections, the advices of great and good men about him, joined to the clamours of the common people, which were loud, in proportion to the evils they had endured, must have wrought upon the mind of the king of Castile, and brought him back to a just sense of things. It happened however far otherwise; he spent the winter in negotiating with Don Pedro, king of Arragon, and prevailed upon him to send a strong corps of auxiliaries to assist in his next campaign, while the king of Leon on the other side was indefatigable in raising forces in Galicia to resist him; so that it looked as if the Christian princes had acted in concert with the Moors, and were bent upon each other's destruction <sup>h</sup>. In all probability this had been brought about, if the Moorish emperor, Joseph, had not taken the field with an army so numerous, as to threaten the conquest or destruction of the king of Castile's dominions; which constrained that monarch to suspend his resentment against his cousin, that he might prevent the loss or total ruin of his own countries. He did not find himself in a condition, even with the succours of Arragon, to act offensively against the Moors; and experience had taught him not to hazard battles with a handful of troops against thousands. He did therefore what it became him to do; he put stout garrisons into all the strong places in his territories, and kept himself in the mountains, with a flying camp, which prevented the Moor from taking any place of importance, though he attempted several; and at length, his army being much reduced by fatigues and sickness, was compelled to retire into Andalusia, with many slaves and booty, but with diminished forces, and their reputation rather declining than increased <sup>i</sup>. So little did he profit by his important victory.

A peace concluded between the two kings of Castile and Leon.

As soon as his territories were delivered from the Moors, Don Alonso of Castile, having drawn out part of his garrisons, fell, with a potent army, into the dominions of Leon, where he took some places of no great strength, and ruined all the open country <sup>k</sup>. The king of Leon having an army not at all inferior to his, marched towards him, with a design to give a check to his proceedings by a battle. The person upon whose advice and abilities he chiefly relied, was his cousin, Don Pedro Fernandez de Castro, the son of that great hero of the same name, who had commanded the forces of the king his father, who had served the Moorish emperor Joseph, and who, it is even more than probable, was at the head of a corps of Mohammedan auxiliaries at this very time, and by him he was dissuaded from fighting <sup>l</sup>. He observed that the event of a battle was in all respects uncertain, except one, which was the ruin of both parties, let the victory fall where it would, since the Moors were ready and waited to take the advantage. He proposed therefore a treaty, to which, though the king was backward, he found the nobility and prelates of Castile were unanimously inclined. He went therefore to Valladolid, in person, to negotiate with queen Eleanor, and having proposed a marriage between the Infanta Donna Berengara, and Don Alonso, king of Leon <sup>m</sup>, the treaty was quickly concluded, and the marriage soon after solemnized in the same place, though the king of Castile was not present; and shewed thereby, that, what he did, he did with reluctance, against his own sense of things; for in his temper united qualities that rarely meet, hastiness and obstinacy.

The former concludes a peace also with the miramamolins of Africa.

A. D. 1197.

At the entrance of the ensuing year, the king of Castile found himself freed from all apprehensions of the Moors, by an application from their monarch, either for a peace or a long truce; the reason of which was, that his affairs had taken a wrong turn in Africa, where several of his governors had revolted, and set up for themselves. The king of Castile was not ignorant of this; and yet he acted as if he had been so; and concluded a peace with the Moorish prince, upon the very same terms, that might have been prudently accepted when he was in the full career of his victories <sup>n</sup>: the reason of this was, that the king of Castile meditated, in conjunction with the king of Arragon, to over-run the territories of the king of Navarre, who, from the sense he had of the implacable enmity of these two monarchs, had suffered himself to be strangely deceived by the Moorish emperor, who pretended to give him his daughter in marriage, and with her all his dominions in Spain <sup>o</sup>. This war the two kings accordingly prosecuted, but with little success, though they had great superiority, as will be shewn in another place.

Pope Innocent III. insists upon the annulling the marriage of the king of Leon.

In the mean time Pope Innocent the third, succeeding Celestin in the see of Rome, took umbrage at the marriage of the king of Leon with his cousin the Infanta of Castile, and sent peremptory instructions to his nuncio to part them, and, if they refused to part, to put the kingdoms of Castile and Leon under the censures of the church; which the nuncio, less vio-

- a lent or more afraid than his master, was not inclined to do; but gave time for the two kings to send their ambassadors to Rome, in order to pacify, if possible, this haughty successor of St. Peter<sup>p</sup>; but notwithstanding this was attempted, with all imaginable humility, the pope remained fixed to his point, and sent fresh orders for separating the king and queen, or for putting all the churches in Castile and Leon under an interdict; the very thoughts of which, it was well known, would terrify the common people almost to madness, and consequently expose the state to such dangers, as were most likely to fright, even crowned heads, into obedience<sup>q</sup>. The arms of Castile were this year more successful in Navarre, the king of that realm being absent in Africa, and had reduced the city of Vitoria, and some other places of importance, to a state of such distress, that a kind of provisional capitulation was made, dependent upon the orders of the king of Navarre for their surrender, which orders soon after arrived, that monarch being at this time in no condition to vindicate his own rights, or to defend those of his subjects, which left it in the power of Don Alonso to gratify his ambition in a very extensive degree<sup>r</sup>: so that this ancient and once powerful kingdom was reduced within an hair's breadth of destruction.

A. D. 1198.

- THE satisfaction he derived from thence must have been very much heightened by an honourable event, in respect to his family, which fell out soon after, and which, for some particular reasons, we are obliged to represent at large. John, king of England, finding himself under a necessity of making a disadvantageous peace with Philip, king of France, his mother, queen Eleanor, contrived to lessen the discredit of this transaction, by a very singular expedient, which she no sooner proposed, than it was by all parties very readily embraced<sup>s</sup>. According to her scheme, the places conquered by France were to be restored to her son, who was then to make a voluntary cession of them, as the dowry of his niece, the Infanta Donna Blanca, or, as the French call her, Blanche, who was to marry prince Lewis heir apparent of the crown of France; and to carry all this into execution, she offered to go herself into Spain, to fetch the young princess<sup>t</sup>. Upon her arrival at the court of Castile, she was received by Don Alonso, her son-in-law, and by her daughter queen Eleanor, with all possible marks of respect and affection, and her proposal readily accepted, the young princess put into her hands, whom she carried to her son, the king of England, in Normandy, where the peace being signed on the twenty-second of May, the marriage was celebrated on the twenty-third, at a place called Purmor, in that duchy, the ceremony being performed by the archbishop of Bordeaux; the reason of which was, that the king having incurred the displeasure of the pope by a divorce, the kingdom of France was then under an interdict<sup>u</sup>. The marriage thus concluded, the young princess was conducted to the court of her father-in-law, there to be brought up, till such time as herself and her spouse were of a fit age to consummate<sup>v</sup>; which circumstance seems to be a sufficient refutation of that notion, which passed for ages as a point of true history, that this Infanta was the eldest daughter of Castile, and with which some very eminent French writers seem at this day very unwilling to part<sup>w</sup>; notwithstanding the clear proofs that may be brought of the contrary. But the following history will shew nothing like it was surmised in some ages after the event.

A. D. 1200.

- e THE same year Don Alonso, king of Leon, had, by the Infanta Donna Berengara, his son Ferdinand; the day of his birth is no where recorded; but it is certain he was born before the month of August, and baptized with great solemnity in the cathedral church of Leon, to the great joy of both courts<sup>y</sup>. About this time the disputes between the king of Leon and his mother-in-law produced a kind of rupture; for the late king Ferdinand, having bestowed upon her some fortresses of great importance to the safety of his dominions, Don Alonso did not think it consistent, either with his dignity or interest, to leave them any longer in her hands, and therefore demanded them<sup>z</sup>. On the other hand, the queen dowager Donna Urraca, by the advice and with the assistance of her brother Don Diego Lopez, fortified them; and that nobleman also applied himself to the king of Castile, in hopes that he would have interposed with his son-in-law, to prevent things from coming to extremities. But that monarch, either judging the thing in itself unreasonable, or being unwilling to take part in any thing against his son-in-law, rejected this demand; and the places not long after were taken by the king of Leon, which so highly provoked Don Diego Lopez, that he retired to his own estates, exceedingly exasperated against both kings, and consequently disposed, whenever any occasion should offer, to sacrifice his duty to his resentment<sup>a</sup>. Such was the situation of things in Spain, at the opening of the thirteenth century, when the Christians were indeed become more potent than in former times, but were as little united as ever.

Kings of Castile and Leon join their forces against Don Diego Lopez de Haro.

DON Alonso of Castile was extremely provoked at this haughty behaviour in one for whom <sup>a</sup> he had done so much, and for whose sake he had disobligeed so many ; but his resentment, in some measure, received a justification from Don Diego's wasting his country, as soon as he found himself safe in Navarre, with a considerable body of desperate people, who had followed his fortunes. His insurrection became in a short time so formidable, that the king of Castile requested the assistance of his son-in-law to reduce him ; accordingly both princes took the field, at the head of a numerous army. Don Diego had not forces sufficient to give them battle ; but having fortified Estella in Biscay, and provided it with all things necessary to sustain a siege, after harrassing the royal armies in the field, he gradually withdrew his forces thither. The two kings invested the place, and battered it with great fury, and as soon as the breaches were practicable, made repeated assaults, but to no purpose ; so that in the end <sup>b</sup> they were constrained to raise the siege <sup>b</sup>. About this time, the kings of Castile and Arragon concluded a truce for three years with the king of Navarre, in order more at leisure to negotiate a peace.

A. D. 1201.

The king of Leon obliged to part with his second queen, by the pope.

1204.

THE steadiness shewn by Don Alonso, king of Leon, in keeping his queen, contrary to the decrees of pope Innocent the third, so provoked that zealous head of the church, as to induce him to execute what he had threatened, by putting the kingdom of Leon under an interdict, upon which a schism arose, some of the bishops adhering to the king, and some to the pope <sup>c</sup>. But the king of Castile prevented this thunder from falling on the heads of his subjects, by declaring that he was ready to receive the Infanta, his daughter, whenever the king of Leon should think fit to send her home. While things continued in this state, queen <sup>c</sup> Eleanor of Castile was brought to bed of a son, on the 14th of April <sup>d</sup> ; and not long after this, in pity to their subjects, and, so far as appears, without any distaste or dispute between themselves, the king and queen of Leon resolved to separate. The pope, in consideration that the marriage was entered into and consummated on both sides with sincere and laudable intentions, declared the children legitimate : these were the infants Ferdinand and Alonso, and the infantas Eleonora, Constantia, and Berengara. As for the dowry which had been settled by the king of Leon, the infanta Berengara generously gave it up. All these great points being adjusted, Alonso, king of Castile, threw in a proposition, too weighty and too reasonable to be rejected ; this was, that the infant Don Ferdinand, and his daughter's eldest son, should (in case of his brother's demise) be declared heir apparent of the kingdom of Leon <sup>e</sup>. An <sup>d</sup> assembly of the estates was accordingly called, who unanimously swore to the succession ; and this ceremony over, queen Berengara returned to her father's court, leaving all her children at that of the king her husband <sup>f</sup>. Thus, through the pious application of the papal power, Don Alonso was once more declared a single man, though with two wives living, and six or seven children (E).

Which, in spite of all precautions taken to prevent it, occasions a war.

AT the time of the concluding the truce between the kings of Castile, Arragon, and Navarre, Don Diego Lopez de Haro was restored to his old master's favour, who also interceded for him with the king of Leon. The great military skill which he had shewn in defending Estella, had its merit even with those monarchs, against whom he defended it ; and they could not help esteeming and admiring the courage and conduct of this nobleman, tho' exerted against them. <sup>e</sup> The case is singular enough to deserve notice ; but, besides this, it is necessary that we should have an idea of the character of Don Diego. It is uncertain whether he commanded in that war, which, at the solicitation of Philip Augustus of France, Don Alonso, king of Castile, carried

(E) It may not be amiss to observe here, that, so long as the common people had amongst them a real spirit of religion, the interdict was such a weapon as no prince, however potent, could resist. It was so called, because it implied a prohibition of all public worship, and the administration of all sacraments, so that, while it lasted, a whole Christian nation was deprived of every kind of spiritual comfort. But by having recourse to this violent remedy too often, the popes very much weakened its force, and by degrees brought the people, not only to despise that, but to be very cold and indifferent even as to the essentials of religion, which is the necessary and inevitable consequence of pious frauds and ecclesiastical tyranny. While the old Gothic church subsisted, Spain was exempted from every thing of this kind ; for, though the church made use of censures, and sometimes excommunicated persons of high rank, and sometimes considerable bodies of people, yet this was always for their own offences ; whereas the interdict punished multitudes, for the crimes, or the supposed crimes of individuals, contrary, not only to the practice of the primitive church, and to the whole current of the scriptures, but also to the common sense of mankind. However, since they had submitted to the papal authority, and were resolved at all events, to adhere to the spiritual monarchy, as it was styled, of Rome, the Spanish kings found themselves as much and as effectually subjects, or rather more so, than their people were to them ; for these monarchs were by no means absolute, they governed according to the laws and customs of their country ; whereas the pope governed without law, or, which came to the same thing, was believed to have a power of declaring those laws, by which he would be pleased to govern.

- a on in Aquitaine against king John of England, of the reality of which we cannot doubt, though passed over in silence by the English and French historians; since we find it recorded by two grave Spanish prelates, who lived in those times<sup>z</sup>. The birth of the Infant Don Henry might possibly lessen the respect which had been hitherto paid by Don Alonso of Castile to the king of Leon; and this was still more diminished upon his sending back his daughter, though with her own consent, and with great reluctance on the part of that king. That this was really the case, appears from the refusal of the Castilian governors to surrender the places assigned for the queen's dower, which she had relinquished by an act of her own, and this act confirmed by the Pope<sup>h</sup>. The king of Leon resenting this, attempted to reduce them by force, which gave beginning to a war that lasted for three years, but with the interposition of some
- b truces; and at this period, his affairs making it necessary, the king of Castile shewed a desire of peace, and that it might be well kept left the terms of it to the king of Leon<sup>i</sup>. This afforded that monarch an opportunity of shewing, that, when he parted with his queen, he did not part with his affections for her. He had stipulated the delivery of the places in question, and he had made a war to acquire them; now he was left to dictate the peace, he consented that the best part of them should remain in the condition they were, and that the Infanta Donna Berengara should enjoy the revenue<sup>k</sup>. About this time, the king of Castile gave his second daughter Donna Urraca in marriage to the Infant Don Alonso, prince of Portugal; and at the request of Don Roderic Ximenes, the historian, founded a university at Palencia, which in the succeeding reign was, as some say, transferred to Salamanca<sup>l</sup>. 1208.
- c THE truce was now on the point of expiring, which the king of Castile had concluded with the miramamolin, and it was this that made Don Alonso so extremely solicitous to put an end, not only to the wars, but to the quarrels and disputes amongst the Christian princes in Spain. It was with this view, that he prevailed once more with the kings of Arragon and Navarre to meet him; and the great generosity he shewed in abandoning several places of great importance to the last of these princes had an extraordinary good effect; so that at length they parted perfectly good friends, with mutual promises of assistance and support against the Moors<sup>m</sup>. Things being thus settled, Don Roderic Diaz, grand master of the order of Calatrava, for so it was still called, though the place was in the hands of the Moors, made an irruption into their territories, and by taking several places began the war. The next year, the Infant Don Ferdinand received the order of knighthood with great ceremony, in the cathedral church of Burgos, that he might be qualified, according to the notions of those times, to take the field<sup>n</sup> with his father, against the infidels; who, while they were preparing to resist the Castilians, found themselves suddenly attacked by the king Arragon, who made this summer some conquests at their expence. Don Alonso of Castile did not take the field till the following spring; and then, with a numerous and gallant army, advanced as far as Alcala, which place, when he had reduced, he proceeded next to over-run the best part of the kingdom of Murcia, in which he met with no considerable resistance, till the extreme heat of the season obliged him to retire<sup>o</sup>. Mohammed, then king of Morocco, had assembled a numerous body of troops in Andalusia; and having passed the Sierra Morena, invested Salvatierra, the residence for the present of the knights of Calatrava. Though the town was not very strong, the knights defended it so well, that they had time to give Don Alonso notice of their distress, and that without a speedy relief it was impossible to preserve the place. Upon this the Infant Don Ferdinand was sent with a very strong detachment to make an irruption into the Moorish territories on the side of Estremadura, which he performed very gallantly, but it did not produce what was expected, the miramamolin persisting in the siege; so that the prince returned to his father's camp in the month of August, and the place having no other relief to expect, was surrendered in the ensuing month<sup>p</sup>. This certainly chagrined the king of Castile not a little; but an event which followed soon after affected him much more. The royal infant, either over fatigued by the operations of the campaign, or from some other cause, fell ill of a fever soon after his return with his father to Madrid, of which he died there October 14, A. D. 1211, to the universal sorrow, not only of his royal parents and the court, but of the whole nation in general<sup>q</sup>. 1210.
- f THE king could not allow himself much time to grieve, as he had certain and indisputable intelligence, that the miramamolin, having pacified the troubles in Barbary, had brought the whole force of his empire together, with an intention to conquer the kingdom of Toledo, at least. Being sensible from experience, that the power of Castile was by no means capable of supporting him against such an enemy, he sent the bishop elect of Segovia to Rome<sup>a</sup>, the archbishop Don Roderic and other bishops into France, while himself managed a conference with the kings of Arragon and Navarre, in which he obtained from them all that he could desire or expect<sup>a</sup>. Don Sancho, king of Portugal, dying about this time, was succeeded by his son Don Alonso<sup>a</sup>, who involving himself in some disputes with the king of Leon, the monarch of Castile could not promise himself much help from either of those princes, with the want of which, however, he might dispense, since multitudes inrolled themselves for this holy war in France, Italy, and Germany, the pontif at Rome using the same methods to excite Christians in all places to enter into the Spanish war, as in other croisades, and with better reason.

The monarchs
of Spain have recourse to a croisade for their defence.
A. D. 1212.

THE rendezvous of the Christian troops was appointed at Toledo, about Easter; but it was a considerable time before so numerous an army, and that too composed of so many different nations and languages, could be brought into any tolerable order. Don Pedro, king of Arragon, with the forces under his command, arrived on Trinity Sunday; the foreigners in a short time after; and to prevent the inconveniences that must have happened, if they had been admitted into the city, all these forces were encamped in the field, as soon as they arrived, which did not however, hinder the foreigners from falling upon the Jews in the suburbs, and committing many other irregularities, which cost the king of Castile a great deal of trouble to correct<sup>a</sup>. At last, on the twentieth of June, the army began to move, the Ultramontans or foreigners, from beyond the Pyrenees, had the van, composed of ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot, under the command of Don Diego Lopez de Haro; the king of Castile and the king of Arragon moved next, but in separate bodies, that they might not incommode each other; the rest of the army formed a rear-guard, and took post upon the frontiers<sup>a</sup>. The first place that felt the weight of their arms was Malagon, which the foreigners took by storm, and put all the Mohammedans therein to the sword. The next place they attempted was Calatrava, in which there was a very good garrison, commanded by the alcaides Abenaliz and Almoad, officers of great reputation, and who lost none of it by their behaviour upon this occasion. The town notwithstanding being attacked on all sides, was quickly taken by assault; but the Moorish generals retired into the citadel, which being strong and well supplied, they made a gallant defence; at length they offered a capitulation, in case they had leave to retire where they pleased, which the foreigners violently opposed, professing, that they meant to give no quarter to any infidels: but the kings of Castile and Arragon were of another mind: they knew the importance of the place, and of the magazines which were in it, and therefore they readily signed the capitulation; and Don Diego Lopez de Haro, with his own troops, escorted the Moors till such time as they arrived in a place of safety<sup>a</sup>. The strangers were so much offended at this instance of moderation, and the not giving up the place to be pillaged, that, pretending they were not able to endure the heats which began to come on, they decamped with their forces, in spite of all the sollicitations and prayers of the Christian monarchs, and marched back towards Toledo, the troops under Arnold, archbishop of Narbonne, and Tibaud Blacon, only excepted<sup>a</sup>.

Gain some small places in their march towards the Moorish army.

THIS loss, tho' it diminished, did not discourage, the Christian army, or the kings who commanded it, and who soon after attacked and reduced Alarcos, and other small places. While they were thus employed, the king of Arragon received a considerable reinforcement, which gave the army fresh spirits; and before their rejoicings on this subject were over, Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, with most of the nobility of his kingdom, and a very gallant corps of troops, joined them likewise; upon which, being again in motion, they advanced to Salvatierra, where they made a general review of the army, and resolved to march on towards the enemy, notwithstanding the desertion of the foreigners<sup>a</sup>. This resolution was indeed very gallant and heroic, but at the same time extremely hazardous, as they had that rugged ridge of mountains, stiled the Sierra Morena, to pass, before they could reach the infidels, who they knew waited for them, and would be sure to give them all the trouble that was possible in their passage. The Moorish monarch Mohammed, who, from his wearing a turban of that colour, had acquired the surname of the Green, acted through this campaign like an able general, and an officer of great experience<sup>a</sup>. He had drawn together his forces early in the neighbourhood of Jaen, amounting to fourscore thousand excellent horse, and a body of troops so numerous, that no historian has ventured upon a calculation. He advanced slowly, as he heard of the progress of the Christians, resolved not to waste his forces in skirmishes, or to venture a general and decisive engagement, before the fatigue of the several sieges and the usual heats should have abated the ardour of the enemy. At length he took post at Baeza<sup>b</sup>, marked out the

a field of battle as his leisure, and caused all the narrow passes in the mountains to be occupied by strong detachments, with express orders to his officers to maintain their respective posts as long as it was possible; so that, all things considered, it seemed almost an impracticable project for the Christian army to reach that of the Moors, and still more impracticable to defeat troops more numerous than their own, that had served long, and with great reputation, fresh, well supplied with every thing, and in posts of their own choosing, and of consequence very advantageous.

THE Christian army arrived at the foot of the Sierra, on Thursday the 12th of July, when a Pass the Sierra small corps of troops, under the command of Don Diego Lopez, after a brisk dispute, possessed themselves of the pass of Muradel, and the next day, after an obstinate resistance, drove the Moors from some of the eminences about it; but perceiving that the pass was very narrow, of a considerable length, and the enemy in a condition to cut them off as fast as they appeared at the opening on the other side, they judged it impossible to pursue their design, and at the same time could not bear the thoughts of returning to Toledo, without seeing an enemy. In this distressed situation, a person altogether unknown, but who from his appearance seemed to be a shepherd, desired to speak with the kings, and after some importunity was conducted into their presence. He proposed to shew them a passage hitherto very little known, and which never had been passed by any army, through which they might march without difficulty, and at the same time without being observed by the Moors. The monarchs were very desirous of accepting so seasonable an offer; but at the same time afraid to trust to a guide whom nobody knew. At length, Don Diego Lopez and Don Garcia Ramiro, offered to follow him with a corps of troops, and he led them according to his promise, by a winding passage, which has ever since borne the name of the Royal Passage<sup>a</sup>, to the summit of the mountains, where they found a fair and spacious plain, where the whole army might be ranged conveniently in order of battle.

ON Saturday the 14th of July, the Christian army, in consequence of this happy discovery, took possession of the plain beforementioned, and disposed their troops in proper order; the Moors were infinitely surprised when they beheld them in so advantageous a situation; but as soon as they had recovered themselves a little, neglected nothing that might have provoked them to fight immediately; but in this they were disappointed, for the Christians having secured the advanced posts, and provided in the most effectual manner possible, in case of an attack, rested that day and the next, which they spent in devotion, and preparing themselves, in a Christian manner, for whatever event Providence might design them. On the 16th, in the morning, the whole army was disposed in order of battle, the right wing was commanded by the king of Navarre, who, besides his own forces, had some battalions of Castilian troops, the foreigners under the archbishop of Narbonne, and the volunteers; the king of Aragon and his forces were on the left; Don Alonso of Castile in the centre, his troops being divided into four brigades, the first commanded by Don Diego Lopez de Haro, the second by Don Gonzales de Lara, in which were the troops of the military orders, the third by Don Roderic Diaz, composed of the flower of the Castilian nobility, the last was under the king in person, who had about him all the prelates, and the whole force of the kingdom of Toledo. The Moors were likewise disposed in very exact order, and in the center the choicest troops were covered by a strong barricade of iron chains; the miramamolín was there in person, dressed in a rich robe, with the khoran in one hand and a sabre in the other. The battle was begun by Don Diego Lopez de Haro, and soon after both the wings engaged. This attack was made with all imaginable vigour, and the Moors received them with the utmost intrepidity. The dispute continued long, without any sensible variation of fortune; but the losses of the Moors being continually supplied with fresh troops, the Christians began to lose ground in every part of the line. The Moors perceiving this, made a great effort, which had a very sensible impression, insomuch that Don Alonso of Castile cried out, that there was nothing now left, but to secure the honour of the nation, by dying gloriously; and was on the very point of throwing himself into the thickest of the enemy, if the archbishop Roderic of Toledo, and Don Ferdinand Garcia, had not restrained him. The latter told him things were not yet desperate, if he did not make them so, by precipitation, and advised him to support his retiring troops by seasonable and well disposed supplies. This had its effect, and the Christians having recovered their spirits, pushed the infidels in their turn, broke them, and advanced to the barricade of iron chains, where things were in danger of taking a new turn, the infantry being unable to do any thing. But the king of Navarre, at the head of his own cavalry, attacking them in full career, with a desperate resolution, leaped the barricade, and having driven the Moors from their first posts, opened a passage for the Castilians<sup>k</sup>. It was then no longer a battle, <sup>a</sup> but a carnage. The miramamolin, by the persuasion of his brother, quitted the field; and the Christians pursuing their flying enemies, continued the slaughter till it was night: the army then took possession of the enemies camp; and the archbishop of Toledo, assisted by all the bishops and ecclesiastics, sung Te Deum<sup>l</sup>. The next day, Don Diego Lopez de Haro made a distribution of the spoils, and gave almost the whole to the auxiliaries and strangers, telling the Castilians, that they were sufficiently rewarded by the victory itself, since all the advantages derived from it would be theirs; and, which is not a little singular, his conduct met with universal applause<sup>m</sup>. The Moors lost upon the field, and in the pursuit, 200,000 men; the Christians, if you will believe archbishop Roderic, but 25, and but 150 in the course of the whole campaign<sup>n</sup> (F).

Consequences attending this memorable battle, and return of the kings of Arragon and Navarre.

AFTER the army had rested three days, they resumed their progress, and reduced all the country as far as Baeza, which they found slighted and without inhabitants, except a number of infirm and aged people, who had taken shelter in the great mosque, to which they cruelly set fire<sup>o</sup>. They marched from thence to Ubeda, a place of strength, to which the remains of the Moorish army and most of the inhabitants of Baeza had retired, and to which the Christians laid siege. They met there with a stubborn and obstinate resistance, yet on the side of the Arragonian attack, things were pushed so far, that the besieged offered a million of crowns, by way of ransom<sup>p</sup>; but the prelates persisting in opposing all capitulations, the besieged found their safety in despair, behaving afterwards with such desperate resolution, that famine and diseases breaking into the camp, all the three monarchs concurred in opinion, that the only proper step to be taken was, to raise the siege, which they accordingly did; and, having put strong garrisons into their new conquests, repassed the mountains, and continued their march to Calatrava<sup>q</sup>. There they met the duke of Austria, with a great number of troops coming to their assistance, who finding their campaign over, joined his forces to those of the king of Arragon, who here took leave of Don Alonso of Castile, in order to return into his own dominions<sup>r</sup>. Don Alonso, accompanied by Don Sanchez, king of Navarre, proceeded to Toledo, into which city they entered in triumph; and at the departure of the last mentioned monarch, Don Alonso, as a mark of his gratitude and esteem, restored to him fifteen of the most considerable places that he had taken during the long war; he also instituted an annual festival on the 16th of July, which was stiled the triumph of the holy cross, and it was long <sup>c</sup> kept with great solemnity, through both the kingdoms of Castile and Leon, in memory of an event which, in a great measure, determined the fate of the Moors in Spain<sup>s</sup>.

Don Alonso's sacrifices, in order to settle a lasting peace with the crown of Leon.

WHILE Don Alonso of Castile was employed in this important war, the troops of the king of Leon, under the command of Don Pedro Fernandez, recovered all the places that had been conquered by the Castilians<sup>t</sup>. After this, the king of Leon turned his arms against Portugal, where the king, Don Alonso, was labouring to dispossess his sisters, one of which was Donna Theresa, once queen of Leon, of the places which his father had left them by his testament for

(F) The date of this battle is fixed with great certainty, by the unanimous consent of historians, to Monday, July the 16th, A. D. 1212; as to the place, there is not, as we observed, the same concurrence; and yet such as are well acquainted with the country, may possibly find that the differences about it are but of very little consequence. Some stile it the battle of Muradal, from the pass of that name, through the Sierra Morena; others the battle of Losa, from a great rock of that name; but it is most commonly known by the title of, the battle of Toledo, from a little town of that name, in the open country, beyond the mountains. Some writers have reported, that, at the very beginning of the action, a most resplendent cross appeared in the heavens, a sure presage of victory to the Christians: but this is not to be found in the letter written by the king of Castile to the pope, in that of Arnold, archbishop of Narbonne, or in the history of Don Roderic, archbishop of Toledo; and is, therefore, justly suspected by Mariana, as well as Ferreras. But it is unanimously asserted, that Dominic Paschal, the archbishop of Toledo's cross-bearer, and who, in process of time, became himself both dean and archbishop of the same diocese, passed several times through the enemy's line, without receiving any hurt. Some have attempted to assign a physical reason, why no blood appeared upon the field of battle; viz. from the heat of the weather and the dryness of the soil. Some have also corrected the numbers said to be slain in this battle, and instead of 25 Christians, would have us read 25000. This, however, is utterly irreconcilable to the archbishop of Toledo's relation, who maintains the fact to be true, however incredible it may seem: he adds farther, that the quantity of spears, javelins, and arrows, found upon the field, was so great, that they served the Christian forces for two days, as fuel for dressing their provisions, though during that space they burnt nothing else. The value of the spoil was immense, as we may guess from the number of horses, which are said to have amounted to 35,000. But the most signal advantage of all was, the breaking the power of the miramamolin, which revived that spirit of independency natural to the Spanish Moors, put them upon revolting, setting up separate principalities, and destroying each other, which made their total expulsion a work much easier to the Christians than otherwise it would have been, and opened a way also to the declension of this dynasty in Africa, which weakened the Mohammedan power in general.

- a their subsistence. It was at the request of these distressed princesses, that the king of Leon made a diversion in their favour, offering, however, to retire, if Don Alonso of Portugal would desist from his enterprize. But that king, who from his infancy hated his brothers and sisters, marched against him with a superior army, and forced him to battle, in which, however, the king of Leon was victorious, and would, perhaps, have availed himself in another manner of his success, if the apprehensions of being attacked by the king of Castile had not withheld him<sup>u</sup>. Don Alonso of Castile behaved upon this occasion with great magnanimity; for, instead of committing any hostilities, he invited him to Valladolid, and there, in a personal conference, convinced him of the necessity of their living upon good terms, in order to which, he not only relinquished all the places he had taken, but gave him several others that he knew
- b he much desired, together with the castles of Carpio and Monreal, in the territory of Salamanca, upon condition that they should be demolished, and a considerable town and district in Asturias, merely because it lay conveniently for him<sup>w</sup>; so that the king of Leon left him in sentiments of the most perfect friendship; and Don Alonso of Castile thought a secure peace very cheaply purchased by these sacrifices, being desirous only of extending his dominions at the expence of the Moors, and by making a proper use of the great advantage he had gained. It was in order to this, that he stipulated with the king of Leon, as an equivalent for the concessions he had made, that he should restore to the king of Portugal the places he had taken from him, and conclude a peace with that monarch, upon fair and equal terms<sup>x</sup>. Upon this peace, the Infant Don Pedro of Portugal, perceiving that he had no Christian court to
- c which he could fly, and dreading the implacable disposition of the king his brother, retired to the miramolin. On the other hand, that monarch, perceiving how much he was lessened in the opinion of his subjects by his late defeat, went over to Africa, where he passed the remainder of his days under that cloud which usually attends sovereigns that are unfortunate<sup>y</sup>.

- Don Alonso* of Castile took the field again early the next year, with a competent army, and having reduced Duegnos, at the foot of the Sierra Morena, and some other places, though not without resistance, soon after invested Alarcos, where the Moors had a good garrison, and flattered themselves that it was impregnable; but the king continued before it so long, and took such precautions for supplying his troops with provisions, that at length, on the 22d of May, the place was surrendered<sup>z</sup>. After putting a strong garrison into it, the king returned in triumph to St. Torcaz, where he met his queen, with the Infant Don Henry, his daughter queen Berengara, and her two sons Don Ferdinand and Don Alonso, and there kept his Whitsuntide<sup>a</sup>. Some other actions of less importance happened in this year, with different success; but the most remarkable event was, a great scarcity of provisions, arising from the excessive consumption made by the great armies the year before, and the people being also hindered, by the continuance of the war, from attending in a proper manner to the cultivation of their lands.
- As Don Alonso of Leon had made no diversion in favour of the king of Castile this campaign, and as, upon application to him the next year, he imputed his slowness to his defect of cavalry, Don Diego Lopez de Haro was sent to him with 600 excellent horse, and by the assistance of these
- e and his own infantry, he made himself master of Alcantara<sup>b</sup>, and had taken some other places, if the extreme heat of the weather had not obliged him to put his troops into quarters of refreshment. This was a great disappointment to the king of Castile, who thereby lost the opportunity of taking Baeza, which the Moors had repeopled and fortified, and which he besieged for three months, till sickness and famine obliged him to retire<sup>c</sup>. Soon after the return of the king of Leon from his campaign, his heir apparent the Infant Don Ferdinand, whom he had by Donna Theresa of Portugal, died, and was buried in the cathedral church of St. James at Compostella, near the remains of Don Ferdinand of Castile, his grandfather<sup>d</sup>. This accident exceedingly afflicted his parents, and might well excuse the king, his father, for not making an autumn campaign. About this time, the archbishop Roderic of Toledo finished his fortress
- f of Milagro, now known by the name of Almagro, the capital of one of the districts in the province of La Mancha, into which he put a competent garrison, to restrain the incursions of the Moors, which he had hardly done, before it was besieged by an army of 5000 horse and and foot, under the command of a Moorish officer of great reputation; but the prelate, its founder, took such care to supply those within with all kinds of necessaries, that at length, not without great loss, the enemy found themselves obliged to raise the siege and to retire<sup>e</sup>.

THE king, Don Alonso of Castile, being still very solicitous about the affairs of his cousin the king of Leon, and apprehensive that he did not clearly comprehend what considerable acquisitions might be made to his own territories, by entering heartily into a war with the Moors, invited him to an interview at Placentia<sup>f</sup>. This was as readily accepted as proposed; but in his journey thither, Don Alonso of Castile was attacked by a malignant fever, of which he died at a little village on the way, on the fifth or sixth of August, in the year 1214<sup>g</sup>. He had the comfort of having his queen, and most of his children about him, as well as the archbishop Don Roderic and several other prelates, in his last moments; and by his will appointed the queen dowager Eleonora, regent<sup>h</sup>, during the minority of her son; but this provision, though very prudent, did not avail much, since she also died in the month of October the same year; in which also expired the two greatest men in Castile and Leon, Don Diego Lopez de Haro, and Don Pedro Fernandez<sup>i</sup>. Such a series of unexpected events had, as the reader will easily conceive, a very great effect on the minds of the people, and made way for those troubles and disturbances that very speedily ensued, and of which, if they had been under any settled form of government, and had acted with any proper degree of prudence, the Moors would certainly have availed themselves more than they did (G).

Henry succeeds his father in that kingdom in the 11th year of his age.

Don Henry, the young king of Castile, was in the 11th year of his age; and having lost his mother in two months after his father, the regency, according to the direction of the king's testament, devolved on the queen Donna Berengara, with the general satisfaction of the whole kingdom; the counts of Lara, Don Ferdinand, Don Alvaro, and Don Gonsales, only excepted. They were desirous of getting the person of the king into their hands; and in a short time, by insinuations of various kinds, drew many of the nobility, from motives of interest, into their notions. The great difficulty was, how to bring their scheme to bear; and it was in the management of this that they shewed themselves consummate politicians. They corrupted a servant who was much in the confidence of that princess, who persuaded her, that the nobles in general were highly displeased, that, since they had a child for their king, the care of that child should be confided solely to a woman; and that, therefore, out of respect to the king's safety and her own, the wisest thing she could possibly do was to call an assembly of the states, and leave the choice of a regent to them<sup>k</sup>. She did so, and, by the intrigues of the faction, Don Alvaro de Lara was chosen, under various restrictions, which, when he had taken an oath punctually to observe, the young king was delivered to his care, in order to his receiving a proper education. But no sooner was the assembly dissolved, than Don Alvaro broke through all the restrictions, governed with a rod of iron, and not only trampled on the liberties of the laity, but infringed likewise the immunities of the clergy<sup>l</sup>. His politicks were of a very extraordinary kind; for, in this first year of his regency, he contrived to secure an influence over the king, for life, by marrying him to the Infanta Donna Mafalda of Portugal, and with this view, leaving the king to the care of some of his friends in whom he could confide, he went, in person, to the court of Portugal, to negotiate this marriage. In this some writers say he succeeded; and it is on all hands agreed, that the court of Portugal came into it, and that the young princess was sent into Spain; but the Pope interposed, at the request of the nobility, and by his influence over the prelates caused the Infanta to be sent back into Portugal, where she became a nun<sup>m</sup>.

(G) This great monarch was, to speak correctly, Alonso the third, of Castile; for though, after the union of the two kingdoms under his grandson, Don Ferdinand, the succeeding kings were reckoned in the order of those of Leon, so that his successor was stiled Don Alonso the tenth, and not Don Alonso the fourth, yet this manner of computing did not or could not take place before. He was, at the time of his demise, in the 59th year of his age, and in the 56th of his reign. It is true, that the old historians differ about these dates, and that, even in the printed copies of Don Roderic's history, it is said to have been but the 53d year of his reign; yet we ought to consider that transcribers mistake in nothing so much as dates; and therefore we must not suffer ourselves to be misled by such slips of theirs, when visibly repugnant to the current of history. There is another difficulty that ought to be cleared, which relates to the occasion of that journey which cost the king his life; for in the printed copies of the archbishop of Toledo's history, it is said, that the king was going to an interview with the king of Portugal, his son-in-law, at Placentia; whereas Ferreras, whom we follow, asserts, that his design was to confer with the king of Leon, which seems to be much more probable, considering the place assigned for their interview, and the route the king took to go thither, notwithstanding that a modern historian tells us his disease was rendered mortal by his chagrin, on a message sent him by the king of Portugal, that he would not come out of his own dominions; which is exceedingly improbable, since we never hear that these monarchs had any difference; and the king of Castile had, but a very little before, given the king of Leon an equivalent out of his dominions, in order to induce him to restore to Portugal the places he had conquered. He is very highly commended by Don Roderic Ximenes, who knew him perfectly, and who, where there is occasion to mention them, has not dissembled his vices. We may, however, affirm, that he was much more indebted to experience than education; and that it may be very truly said of him, it was by reigning that he knew how to reign: perhaps, we may add to all this, that his misfortunes were the great instruments of his glory; that his being beaten put him into the road of victory; and that the close of his reign did honour to his memory, because it was very unlike the beginning. We are not, indeed, warranted to give him this character, from what is said of him in other histories, but we are led to it from facts; and truth is, of all other, the best authority in history.

Mariana

a Mariana says, that when the count Don Alvaro found it impossible to make her a queen, he would have made a merit of his endeavours in order to have espoused her himself, but that the young princess rejected his offer with contempt<sup>a</sup>.

As ecclesiasticks generally bear ill treatment with less temper than any other people, so, upon Don Alvaro's making free with the revenues of the church of Toledo, the dean of that cathedral, without ceremony, excommunicated him, which quickly obliged him to make satisfaction<sup>o</sup>. In order to appease the nation in general, he called an assembly of the states at Valladolid, at which the king and his sister Donna Berengara assisted; but the disputes rose quickly to such a height, and the behaviour of Don Alvaro was so imperious, that the queen Donna Berengara thought proper to retire to the fortress of Autillo, and was followed thither by some of the nobility of the first families in Castile<sup>p</sup>. The regent was very little concerned at this; but when he afterwards understood that the king himself was inclined to take the same route, he carried the young prince, under pretence of visiting his dominions, first to Segovia, then to Avila, and at length to Maqueda, in the kingdom of Toledo, where he kept him several months, and oppressed all the country in the neighbourhood to such a degree, that it was very near causing an insurrection, and, as it was, increased those clamours that had been loud enough before<sup>q</sup>. The regent Don Alvaro de Lara incurs universal hatred.

To stifle these, or at least to turn them from himself upon those who opposed him, Don Alvaro took a very bold step. He discovered that the queen Donna Berengara had sent a person very secretly to her brother, to enquire after his health, and to learn how he was used. This gentleman he seized, hanged him without any judicial process, and then produced a counterfeit letter from the queen, which he confidently insinuated contained instructions to poison the young king<sup>r</sup>. The scheme was well laid, though it did not take effect; for the archbishop of Toledo, and the people in general, instead of charging the queen with poisoning, charged him with forgery; and that so loudly, and with so little ceremony, that he found it necessary to shift his quarters, and to carry the king to Hueta<sup>s</sup>. He afterwards went from thence to Valladolid, where he assembled forces, and summoned Donna Berengara and the lords of her party to surrender all the places they held, upon pain of being treated as rebels. This put them under great difficulties; for though they were ready to defend themselves against the regent, and put him to the trouble of one siege, yet, when they found the king's person exposed in the army, they grew uneasy, and inclined rather to expose their own persons than his. The queen, in the mean time, applied to her husband, the king of Leon, and demanded either his assistance, or at least his interposition; but Don Alvaro was before-hand with her there, and proposed a match between the king and the Infanta Donna Sancta; so that, in all probability, he would either have carried his point, or a civil war must have broke out in Castile, if an unlooked for accident had not changed the face of affairs entirely<sup>t</sup>. The regent having carried the king to Palencia, lodged him in the episcopal palace; and as he endeavoured to gain his affection by indulging him in every thing, the young king was at play with some boys of his own age, in the court of the palace, when one of them throwing a stone upon the roof, dislodged a tile, which fell directly upon the king's head, and of this wound he died, June the 6th, in the year 1217, in the third year of his reign<sup>u</sup>. The young king Don Henry, killed by the fall of a tile upon his head.

THE regent would willingly have concealed the king's death, but that was impossible; and the queen Donna Berengara was no sooner informed of it, then she sent Don Lopez Haro and Don Gonsales Giron to the king of Leon, to desire him to send her son, the Infant Don Ferdinand, under pretence that she longed very much to see him<sup>v</sup>. The king made no difficulty; and the queen no sooner had him in her power, than she quitted the fortress, and went directly to Palencia, where all the nobility and prelates, who composed the late king's court, received her with all the duty and affection imaginable. She resolved from thence to go to Valladolid; but first some overtures were made to Don Alvaro de Lara, that he should return to his duty. He very modestly proposed, that the queen should immediately put her son into his hands, in which case he would be content to own him for his king; but that proposition being rejected, the court proceeded to Valladolid, where the people testified their loyalty and submission with all the joy imaginable<sup>w</sup>. The queen intended to have carried her son next into Estremadura, and had actually begun her journey; but the family of Lara had so effectually corrupted the inhabitants of most of the great towns, that they refused to open their gates; upon which, the queen and her son returned to Valladolid, where having called a general assembly of the states, and at the same time summoned every one of the places that were in the hands of the faction to submit, on pain of being declared rebels by the approaching assembly; this

THIS assembly was remarkably numerous, almost all the prelates and nobility in Castile being present therein, when they solemnly acknowledged the Infanta Berengara, in her own right, queen of the two Castiles, after which they proclaimed and swore fealty to her <sup>2</sup>. Her reign, however, was of very short continuance; for, by the advice of the principal nobility, she caused a kind of theatre to be erected before one of the principal gates of the city, upon which the Infant Don Ferdinand appeared in his robes of state, and the queen, his mother, at the head of a deputation of the prelates and nobility, having paid her respects and saluted him king, he was carried, with the acclamations of all the spectators, to the cathedral church, and there solemnly inaugurated, August the 31st, 1217 <sup>3</sup>. This scene of joy was strangely discomposed, by the news that Don Alonso, king of Leon, at the head of a great army, had entered Castile, by the advice and in company with Don Alvaro de Lara, to revenge the signal affront he had received, in having his son made a king without asking his consent. The queen sent the bishops of Burgos and Palencia to intreat him not to injure the subjects of his son, nor to disturb the dawn of his reign; but he would listen to no accommodation, and believing that he should surprize the court without resistance, continued his march directly to Burgos; but Don Lopez de Haro, having assembled a small body of good troops, threw himself into the city, and prepared every thing for a vigorous defence, upon which Don Alonso thought fit to retire into his dominions, expressing great indignation against such as had prevailed upon him to act in so unkingly and in so unnatural a manner <sup>b</sup>. This storm over, the queen sent to Don Alvaro, to demand the body of her brother, which he had clandestinely withdrawn and concealed; but which, with some shew of civility, he caused to be delivered to the bishops who brought the queen's message, and by whose order it was interred with great solemnity at Burgos <sup>c</sup>. About this time, pope Honorius the third wrote to the prelates in Spain, in regard to the Jews, in a manner becoming a Christian bishop. He permitted that some mark of distinction they should be obliged to wear; but desired that no force might be used to compel them to baptism; that they should be permitted the free exercise of their religion; and that the people should not be allowed to insult them when celebrating their feasts <sup>d</sup>. The knights of Calatrava finding the place in which they had fixed their residence very unwholesome, the grand master caused it to be removed to Salvatierra; but notwithstanding this, their original title remained, as it still remains, exactly the same.

THE lords who were addicted to the faction of Don Alvaro de Lara, or rather who were desirous of exempting themselves from the power of their sovereign, continued still to yield but a kind of precarious obedience, which obliged the king and his mother to raise an army, in order, once for all, to put the king into full possession of his dominions. The great difficulty they met with arose from want of money, which in some measure the queen removed, by selling her jewels. In order to strike at the root, the king marched to Herrera, where Don Alvaro himself was, with a strong garrison. The king's troops were but raw, and, it may be, indifferently clothed and armed. Don Alvaro, coming with a small body of horse to view them at a little distance, conceived so contemptible an opinion of them, that he advanced nearer and nearer, on purpose to insult them; but it cost him dear: for some of the nobility about the person of the king suddenly charged and took him prisoner <sup>e</sup>. He was much better treated than he deserved; for the queen offered him his liberty, upon his causing the places to be surrendered that were in the hands of himself and his dependents, which he accepted, and the agreement was punctually performed on both sides. After he recovered his liberty, he tried, for some time, to live in quiet, but speedily relapsed into his old intrigues; of which the king having intelligence, he marched against him instantly, with a body of troops, and he thereupon quitted Castile, and went to seek protection at the court of Leon <sup>f</sup>.

THE king Don Alonso received him kindly; and, though he had been deceived by him once before, suffered himself to be again seduced, and merely, from a persuasion that the enterprise would be easily accomplished, raised a powerful army, in order to invade Castile. His son king Ferdinand assembled another, still more powerful, with which he encamped in the neighbourhood of Medina del Campo, as being unwilling to act against his father, if it might be avoided. Don Alonso, less cautious, advanced into the territory of Salamancha, and invested a place of no great consequence, where some troops had taken post. While he lay before the place, Don Alvaro fell sick, and, being unable to come into the king's presence, the prelates laid hold of that opportunity to convince him of the injustice of the war, which in-

- a duced him to raise the siege, and to retire into his own dominions<sup>g</sup>: a circumstance that broke the heart of Don Alvaro de Lara, who, upon the march of the army, died at Toro; expressing, with his last breath, a strong desire that his body should be cloathed in the habit of St. James, and interred at Ucles<sup>h</sup>. As he left nothing behind him to bury him with, this had very probably been omitted; but coming to the ear of the queen, Donna Berengara, she sent a rich robe for his body, and a sum of money for defraying the expences of his funeral; an example of Christian charity that deserves to be remembered<sup>i</sup>. As for his brother, Don Ferdinand de Lara, whose conduct had been very equivocal during these troubles, he purchased the king's leave to quit his country by surrendering the places he held, and then he retired to Morocco, where he died in obscurity<sup>k</sup>.
- b THE archbishop, Don Roderic of Toledo, having procured from the pope a bull of croisade against the Infidels, caused it to be published throughout all Spain, and, by that means, assembled a great army in the neighbourhood of his city, with which he invaded the territory of the Moors, reduced some places of no great importance, and at length besieged Requena, which was strong both by art and nature, and had in it a numerous garrison: he persisted, however, in his design of taking it for more than two months, but, in the end, was compelled to rise from before it, with the loss of ten thousand men, to his great mortification<sup>l</sup>. The queen, Donna Berengara, had better success in the negotiation of a marriage for her son with the princess Beatrix, daughter to the deceased Philip duke of Suabia, and emperor of Germany, who, in her passage through France into Spain, was kindly received and magnificently entertained, by Louis the eighth and his queen Blanche<sup>m</sup>, which is an additional proof that they never formed any claim upon the Spanish monarchy. The princess Beatrix was met at Victoria by the queen, Donna Berengara, and, being conducted to Burgos, she was married on the feast of St. Andrew, in the cathedral of that city, to the young king Ferdinand, in the presence of most of the prelates and nobles of Castile, with the universal acclamations of the people<sup>n</sup>. About this time the knights of the order of St. Julian, by the consent and approbation of Don Alonso of Leon, took possession of Alcantara, and at the same time received a grant of all such places as they could conquer from the Infidels, to be held as fiefs from the crown of Leon<sup>o</sup> (H).
- c THE province of Rioja had been committed to the government of Don Roderic Diaz de los Cameros, who oppressed the people to such a degree, that many complaints were brought to the king, who thereupon sent for him to Valladolid; and having signified to him that he was not at all satisfied with his defence, that nobleman retired privately from court, fortified some of the strongest places in his government, and put garrisons into them<sup>p</sup>. The king, Don Ferdinand, assembled an army with full intention to chastise him; but the queen his mother interposed, and put the king in mind, that, during all their troubles, this nobleman had been faithful; upon which, in consideration of a large sum of money, he resigned his government<sup>q</sup>. About this time the affairs of the Moors fell into great confusion, several alcaides, or governors, revolting against Zeit Arax, the son and successor of Mohammed in Africa, those in Spain thought themselves at liberty to follow their example; and accordingly Aben Hut, who was descended from the kings of Saragossa, possessed himself of the kingdom of Murcia; and the best part of Andalusia<sup>r</sup>; Mohammed Aben Abdallah seized Baeza and the country round it; and the kingdom of Valentia was all that remained to Abuzeit, the brother of Mo-

(H) In the time of the emperor Trajan, the several nations that inhabited the country then called Lusitania, contributed their proportions towards building a most superb bridge over the river Tagus, which still remains a monument of the skill and magnificence of those times: this bridge is elevated 200 foot above the level of the water, and though it consists but of six arches, it is 617 feet in length, and 28 in breadth. There were formerly four tables of stone, upon which were inscribed the names of those at whose expence this bridge was built; three of these time and accident have overwhelmed, the fourth has escaped; and we learn from thence, the names of 13 of these nations. The two inscriptions that fix the date of this building to the emperor's sixth consulship are yet entire. The Moors, struck with the beauty of this elegant performance, as well as with the fertility of the country and the convenience of its situation, built there a town, to which they gave the name of Al-Cantara, i. e. the bridge. There are several other places of this name in different parts of Spain, which, upon a strict examination, will be all found to have derived that denomination from some eminent bridge belonging to them; as for this in Estremadura, which is by far the most considerable, we are told by Mariana, and all the writers who follow him, that it was given by Don Alonso of Leon, when taken from the Moors, to the knights of Calatrava; but more exact writers affirm, that it was bestowed upon Don Diego Sanchez, grand master of the military order of St. Julian de Peraro; but it is true that the knights of Alcantara bear a cross, resembling that of the knights of Calatrava; viz. each point ending in a Fleur-de-Luce, except that the cross of Alcantara is green. At present the order possesses thirty-three commanderies, three priories, and as many alcaydias, which produce altogether a revenue of about 80,000 ducats per ann.

Thus the very errors and mistakes of the Christians operated in their favour; and while they seemed to neglect their true interest, by allowing the Infidels time to rest and recruit themselves, they employed that time more to their own prejudice than if the war had continued; which seems, so far as the weak light of human understanding will permit us to judge, that Providence interposed in support of the faith professed, tho' very indifferently practised, by the Spanish Christians (I).

James, king of Arragon, espouses the Infanta Eleonora.

THE next year James king of Aragon married Donna Eleonora, sister to the queen Donna Berengara, and aunt to Don Ferdinand, king of Castile<sup>b</sup>. Among the numerous lords of the house of Lara was the count Don Gonsales de Molinas, who hitherto had lived peaceably, ut now, at the instigation of another Don Gonsales, of the same family, brother to the late Don Alvaro, he took up arms, and was joined by that old rebel, who had taken shelter among the Moors<sup>c</sup>. This obliged the king to march against him with a numerous body of forces; and the war, perhaps, had not been very quickly finished, if the queen had not caused an intimation to be given to Don Gonsales de Molina, that she intended to have married the Infant Don Alonso to his daughter. This effectually disarmed him; he constrained his cousin to quit the kingdom, surrendered all his places into the king's hands, was restored to them and to his favour, and soon after the royal Infant married his daughter<sup>d</sup>. On the twenty-third of November the queen Donna Beatrix was delivered of the Infant Don Alonso, who succeeded his father in his dominions, and, about three months after his birth, was acknowledged for his successor in a general assembly of the states<sup>e</sup>, the king being at that time determined to enter into a war against the Moors. This design was, however suspended, by the breaking out of a formidable rebellion in Galicia, for the suppressing of which his father demanded of him a considerable body of troops, which he very readily sent him, and by whose assistance the insurrection was suppressed<sup>f</sup>. The king of Leon, in the succeeding year, thought fit to establish an university at Salamanca.

John de Brienne, king of Jerusalem, espouses the Infanta Berengara.

DON Ferdinand of Castile, being informed that Don Alvaro Perez, who, on account of his having a share in the late troubles, had retired amongst the Moors, was an excellent officer, he caused it to be insinuated, that if he would return home he would not only pardon but employ him, which had its effect; and it was from him chiefly that he took his measures for the ensuing war<sup>g</sup>. His forces rendezvoused at Toledo, to which city he went; and, after a general review, he marched with them, attended by the archbishop Don Roderic, into the territory of the Moors; but, before he had advanced far, he was met by Abuzet, king of Valentia, who offered to become his vassal, whom he received kindly, and sent back with a promise that no hostilities should be committed against his subjects<sup>h</sup>. He then passed the Sierra Morena, ravaged the territory of Baeza, defeated a body of Moors who attempted to oppose his passage, and concluded the campaign by taking Quezada, which, with some other fortresses, he demolished<sup>i</sup>. While the king was in the field, John de Brienne, king of Jerusalem, arrived in Spain, in order to perform a vow he had made to visit the shrine of the apostle St. James. After he had accomplished this, he visited the court at Burgos, and there concluded a marriage with Donna Berengara, the sister of king Ferdinand, and soon after set out with her for the court of France<sup>j</sup>.

(I) We have given the reader several instances of men of very high quality, who, either out of ambition or resentment, or from terror or necessity, fled to the Moors. At this time there happened something still more extraordinary, which we have inserted in the notes, as it may serve to give the reader some kind of notion of the humour of the people in those times. The Infant Don Sanchez of Leon, younger brother of Don Alonso the ninth, and by his mother's side descended from the family of Haro, had given frequent marks of that sort of courage which is stiled ferocity, particularly in the battle of Toledo, where he served under the king of Castile as a volunteer. He had some difference, though we know not upon what ground, with the king's brother, which filled his mind with so much rancour, that quitting his court he went to Toledo, giving out wherever he passed, that he had received very advantageous proposals from the miramolin, that he had undertaken to carry him a numerous corps of brave fellows, and that such as would follow him might be sure of large pay. He picked up by this means 40,000 men, with whom he marched to Seville, where he pretended they were to receive their levy money. But arriving in the neighbourhood of this place, he thought proper to withdraw, having in reality received no such invitation, and with a handful of desperate men, who were in his secret, seized upon Cagnamero, an old abandoned castle in the skirts of the Sierra Morena. The gross of his followers, when they found themselves cheated, got back again into Portugal, Leon, and Castile, as well as they could; and as for the Infant Don Sanchez and his associates, they plundered, without distinction, both Christians and Moors. On the 23d of August, in the year 1220, as he was hunting a bear, the creature suddenly turned upon the unfortunate Infant Don Sanchez, and tore him to pieces. His people, if they were so disposed, had not much time to regret his loss; for the very next day the alcaide of Badajoz invested their fortress, attacked it without delay, carried the place by storm, and put every person they found in it to the sword.

- a THE king took the field early the next spring ; but had scarce passed the Sierra Morena, before he was met by Aben Mohammed, the son of Aben Abdallah, descended from the miramamolins of Africa, who became his vassal, and agreed to pay him the fourth part of his revenues ; for which, by way of security, he gave his son Abdul-Menin as a hostage, and put likewise into his hands the castles of Baeza, Andujar, and Martos, which put an end to the campaign <sup>a</sup>. Don Alonso, king of Leon, was, at the same time, in the field ; and being met by a numerous army of Moors, under the command of Aben-Hut, king of Seville, a general engagement ensued ; in which, after a warm and bloody dispute, the Christians were victorious, and Don Alonso returned into his own dominions, covered with glory, as his troops were laden with plunder <sup>c</sup>. The pope, towards the end of the year, sent a bull of croisade into Spain, to enable the kings of Leon and Portugal to carry on the war against the Infidels, in which they were engaged with the greater effect, for, as we have observed, the archbishop of Toledo had procured a bull of the same kind, on behalf of the king his master <sup>f</sup>.

Campaign of the king Don Ferdinand against the Moors.

A. D. 1225.

- As soon as the season would permit, the young monarch was again in the field, with the troops of Castile and Leon, though it does not appear that his forces were very numerous ; for his design was no other than to reduce the several places which the Moors still possessed, at the descent of the Sierra Morena, through the pass of Muradal ; and having accomplished this, and thrown into them strong garrisons, he retired, and put his forces into quarters of refreshment, which delivered the Moors from their fears, and hindered them from acquiring any just idea of that important plan he had formed for extending his own dominions, and curtailing theirs <sup>g</sup>.
- c The next year he returned, with a more potent army, into Andalusia, and demanded of Mohammed king of Baeza, the fortresses of Bergamilar, Salvatierra, and Capilla. The reader will observe, that there were many places of the second name, and there were also several of the third. That monarch, afraid of a war with so enterprising a prince, whilst he was at the same time in dread of all the rest of his neighbours, acquiesced under this demand ; and sent his orders to the commandants of the respective places to put them into the hands of the king of Castile ; and, till this could be done, he put the castle of Baeza into the king's hands, by way of security, who sent Don Gonsales, grand master of the order of Calatrava, to take possession of it, with a competent garrison ; upon which the Moorish monarch, who could not, with any decency, live in a city commanded by a Christian garrison, withdrew to Cordova, which was also in his possession, till the fortresses he had demanded were rendered to the king of Castile <sup>h</sup>. As for the two first, they were evacuated by the Moorish garrisons without any dispute ; but the last, having been used as a place of arms, and being consequently spacious, strong, and well supplied with provisions and military stores, the governor, who was a brave man, and had a numerous garrison, refused to obey his master's orders ; and, after some altercations, Don Ferdinand found himself under the necessity of besieging the place in form <sup>i</sup>.

He demands several fortresses from Mohammed, king of Baeza.

1227.

- As the people are but bad politicians, so the Moors of Cordova, instead of attributing the complaisance of their monarch to those which were in reality its proper motives, began to suspect him of holding a secret correspondence with the Christians, which quickly increased into a confident opinion, that he was himself a Christian in his heart, which determined them to put him out of the way, and submit themselves to Aben-Hut, king of Seville. A popular conspiracy can never long be concealed ; Mohammed therefore, having gained intelligence of their design, endeavoured to provide for his personal security, by retiring privately to a place of safety, in which he miscarried ; for, being pursued and taken upon the road, the conspirators, in pursuance of their original scheme, cut off his head <sup>k</sup>. The news of this revolution no sooner reached Baeza, than the inhabitants took up arms and besieged the castle, which the grand master defended with all the spirit and resolution that became a man of his rank. At the end of four months, Don Ferdinand took Capilla by storm, and put the whole Moorish garrison to the sword <sup>l</sup>. The grand master, and those under his command, were very near meeting with the same fate ; but, upon signifying his distress to Don Alvaro Perez, he fixed a short day for the sending him such a reinforcement as should enable him to raise the siege ; and accordingly, in the night preceding that day, Don Lopez de Haro entered the castle with a numerous detachment, and, as soon as it was light, in conjunction with the grand master and his garrison, attacked the posts of the infidels with such vigour, that in a few hours they were all forced, and the Christians became masters of the place. This was a conquest of great importance ; the city antiently called Vatia, standing on an eminence not far from the Guadaluquivir, and it was thought very remarkable, the Castilians recovered it on the feast of St. Andrew, to whom its church, in antient times, was dedicated <sup>m</sup>.

The pope declares null the marriage between the king and queen of Arragon.

A. D. 1228.

In the beginning of the month of March, in the succeeding year, Don Ferdinand laid the first stone of the new cathedral in Toledo, which is the same magnificent structure that adorns this city in our times <sup>a</sup>. The archbishop Don Roderic had a large share in this important work; and the materials being in readiness before it was begun, the undertaking, though great, was sooner completed than could well be imagined <sup>o</sup>. The king made also a short campaign, in which he ravaged the country about Jaen, in order to facilitate an enterprize, which was to be the business of the ensuing year. We have before observed, that James, king of Arragon, had married Donna Eleonora, sister to Don Ferdinand of Castile, by whom he was the father of the infant Don Alonso; but having at this time a legate from the pope at his court, that prelate discovered, or, as some writers hint, had it discovered to him by the king, that this princess and he stood equally related to the emperor Don Alonso, upon which a council was called of the bishops of Arragon and Castile, by whom the marriage was declared null, which the king bore with great moderation; but the queen, it is said, discovered a little impatience: however, the legitimacy of her son was provided for, and she returned again to the court of Burgos <sup>p</sup>. Don Alonso, king of Leon, took the field in Estremadura, and made himself master of Caceres, a place of importance, which himself and his predecessors had more than once attempted in vain. Some say that it was antiently called Casa Cereris, which has been corrupted into its present name <sup>q</sup>. Don Ferdinand of Castile was not so fortunate in the design he had been so long meditating; for, though he made a siege in form, and of some continuance, he failed in taking Jaen; but, by the advice of Don Alvaro Perez, he destroyed several places in its neighbourhood, and took such other steps as might make what he aimed at more practicable when attempted another time <sup>r</sup>.

Don Alonso of Leon gains a glorious victory over the Moors at Merida.

Don Alonso, king of Leon, resolved to pursue the war against the infidels with greater vigour than ever, as having nothing to fear from any of his neighbours, and cast his eyes upon Merida, a place of great strength and of great consequence, to the safety of which the Moors were very attentive; but, however, he attacked it so vigorously, that it fell into his hands before they were in a condition to relieve it <sup>s</sup>. He was scarce entered into possession, before Aben-Hut, the most powerful of the Moorish monarchs in Spain, appeared at the head of an army of 20,000 horse and 60,000 foot <sup>t</sup>. The troops of Don Alonso were much inferior in number, but as he had no choice to make, except fighting or being besieged in his new conquest, he judged the former preferable to the latter; and therefore, recommending himself to the intercession of the Spanish apostle and St. Isidore, he marched out and gave battle to the Moors, and, after a long dispute, gained a complete victory, and in consequence of it several considerable conquests <sup>u</sup>. His son, Don Ferdinand of Castile, impatient at his former miscarriage, besieged Jaen again with a very formidable army; but the Moors, who knew the importance of the place, and who saw how fast their affairs were declining, had in every respect provided so effectually for its defence, that the king was, prevailed upon by his officers, rather to raise the siege a second time, than ruin his army, which however he did with great reluctance <sup>v</sup>.

1230.

Dies in his journey to the tomb of St. James, at Compostella.

Don Alonso of Leon, immediately after his glorious campaign was over, went to visit the shrine of St. Isidore, and to return thanks to God for the victory of Merida. He intended to have done the same at Compostella, according to the religious notions of those times; but, in his journey thither, he was seized with the distemper of which he died, at Villa-nova de Serria, on the 23d of September, in the year 1230 <sup>x</sup>. By his testament, he directed that his body should be interred in the cathedral church of St. James, as near as might be to that of his father; and, which was very singular, he declared the Infantas Donna Sancha and Donna Dulcia, whom he had by his first wife the infanta Theresa of Portugal, coheiresses of his dominions, requiring several of the prelates and most considerable of the nobility by name to see his last will punctually executed <sup>y</sup>. He was a prince endowed with great virtues; but, at the same time, had great foibles; with respect to the former he was chiefly distinguished by the strictness of his government, in point of justice; and his great mildness in levying his revenue, which made his subjects rich, and himself exceedingly beloved. The inconstancy of his temper was his greatest failing, and in the course of his reign exposed him to many inconveniencies. He was unfortunate in both his marriages, though a good husband to both his wives; but the first remained ever mistress of his affections (K): and it is very remarkable, that though

(K) This king, Don Alonso the ninth, of Leon, died in the 43d year of his reign, and is very highly commended by the two great historians of Spain, who were his contemporaries. The point which gained him the greatest

<sup>a</sup> though both marriages were declared unlawful by the Roman pontiff, yet Donna Sancha by the first, and Don Ferdinand by the last, are both acknowledged saints by the church of Rome <sup>z</sup>.

THE manner in which he disposed of his dominions by his will, was very near producing a civil war. Galicia, and some part of Leon, declared for the infantas; but the far greater part of the kingdom for Don Ferdinand of Castile, to whose succession the states had solemnly sworn. Queen Theresa left Portugal to support the party of her daughters, and took shelter with them under the protection of the great master of the order of St. James <sup>a</sup>. The queen Donna Berengara, as soon as she heard of her husband's death, set out with all her family, and was overtaken by the king Don Ferdinand, on the road to Leon, into which capital they <sup>b</sup> were received with all imaginable marks of duty and loyalty, to confirm which dispositions in the people, the king published two edicts, one for remitting of taxes, and the other threatening with severe punishment such as should persist in rebellion <sup>b</sup>; notwithstanding which, many persons of great distinction remained firm to the infantas; and things at last had certainly come to extremities, if the two queens Theresa and Berengara had not settled them amicably, at an interview which they had for this purpose. There they agreed, that the king, Don Ferdinand, should give each of his sisters a large pension, in consideration of which they renounced their pretensions under Don Alonso's will <sup>c</sup>; and this reconciliation was so cordial on both sides, that the two queens fixed a time in the ensuing year for a second interview, that the whole royal family of Leon might have an opportunity of meeting and embracing each other <sup>d</sup>. A circumstance so singular, as hardly any thing of the like kind is to be met with in history, and which brings us to the close of this section, since, from the union of the two kingdoms of Castile and Leon, which was perfected by this agreement, they have never been divided, but have gradually drawn to them all the other sovereignties in Spain; those of the Christians by inheritance or marriage, and those of the Moors by conquest, as in the succeeding sections it will be our business to explain.

greatest credit, was his love of justice, of which he had a very right conception; for it was his sentiment, that the king ought to shew his regard by making the administration of it both honourable and profitable, that such as were chosen to decide suits might be under no sort of influence, and have no kind of temptation. He therefore expected that his judges should hear nothing, but when both parties were present, and that they should not, under any pretence whatever, take fee or reward. This made him beloved by the people, and feared by the nobility, who, though he had great faults, found it more difficult to raise disturbances against him than any of his predecessors; for the peasants, being frequently ill used by their lords, upon complaint in the king's courts, were certainly redressed, and this made his cause theirs. He was likewise much in the good graces of the clergy, and, with all his faults, he was sincerely pious; and though he discovered great ambition, in twice attempting upon his son's dominions, yet in this he was misled by flatterers, who made him believe, for a time, things, of which he was afterwards ashamed. His last sickness was very painful, and yet he bore it very patiently. Besides his legitimate offspring, he left behind him a natural son, Don Alonso, for whom he made a provision suitable to his rank, but without any prejudice to his lawful issue.
